"It certainly will not do to lay down the rule that, in every case, where incompetent or irrelevant testimony is admitted, and afterwards stricken out, with proper instructions from the court to the jury to disregard it, a new trial must be granted. On the other hand, it would, perhaps, be equally unsafe to say that in no such case should a new trial be granted. The character of the testimony, the circumstances under which it was offered and admitted, the nature of the case being tried, the other testimony in the case, and perhaps other matters which might be suggested, should be considered by the court in deciding whether the party against whom such testimony was admitted was so prejudiced thereby as to call for the exercise of the discretion to grant a new trial."

The "character of the case," "the circumstances under which it was offered and admitted," "the nature of the case being tried," "the other testimony in the case," and, we may be permitted to add, the effectiveness of the withdrawal, should be considered, etc.

The plaintiff's case depends absolutely upon his establishing the fact that, after he mounted the car to set the brakes, presumably knowing, or at least believing, that it was necessary to do so to prevent them from rolling out of the side track, with his hands on the brakewheel for that purpose, he was called away from that duty by the conductor, who told him that the cars would stand all right without setting the brakes; to hurry up and come down; that a passenger train was almost due, and that they must get the part of the train left at the hill into the side track, out of its way.

The testimony of Bing, to the effect that the engineer declared that the accident was due to the fault of the conductor in calling the plaintiff down from the car, was directed at the very nerve of the plaintiff's case; nothing could have been so effective as laying the fault at the door of the representative of the defendant on the spot—the alter ego of the railroad company—particularly in view of the erroneous ground upon which the testimony was admitted—that, as the plaintiff charged the injury to the negligence of the conductor and engineer, the statement of the engineer as to whose fault it was should be allowed. If the action had been against the engineer and conductor, and not against the railroad company, the declarations of the engineer exculpating himself and inculpating the conductor would not have been admissible.

The circumstances attending the withdrawal of the testimony from the jury's consideration show an entirely inadequate explanation and correction of the error. The remarks of the circuit judge were addressed, in the first instance, not to the jury, who were supposed to receive the explanation and correction, but to the stenographer, the clerical arm of the court, whose duty it was to take down the entire proceedings of the trial, and to strike out nothing, even upon the order of the circuit judge. It cannot be assumed that the jury would give the same attention to a direction by the judge to the stenographer that they would give to a direct, explicit explanation and correction given by him to them. The instruction given to them was simply by reference to what he had directed the stenographer to do; whether they heard it, heeded it, or understood it is a matter of conjecture. The erroneous testimony was not identified, as it should have been, by the name of the witness and the substance of his testimony, with an explanation to the jury of the error in admitting it, and a direction to erase it from their minds; the only identification indicated was erroneous, for there were no declarations of the conductor testified to, and the remarks of the circuit judge assumed the fact that declarations had been made; not that they had simply been testified to.

[8] It might be suggested that it was the duty of the appellant to call the circuit judge's attention to the insufficiency of his withdrawal of the testimony from the consideration of the jury. We do not conceive that such was the duty of the defendant. If an error in the admission of the testimony was made, as must be conceded, it was as much the duty of the circuit judge to correct it properly as to correct it at all, and as much the duty of the plaintiff's counsel to see that that was done as of the defendant's. While it is a salutary rule that an attorney should not be allowed to sit silent under an error which he ought to correct and take the chances of a favorable verdict or an appeal, this rule will apply in the present case to the opposing counsel as well; he should not be allowed to sit silent under an inadequate withdrawal and take the chances of an imperfect effacement of the testimony. The high character of the attorneys on both sides of this case forbids the imputation of an unworthy motive to either; we are discussing the matter entirely in the abstract.

The proponent of evidence vouches for its admissibility, and the utmost good faith is expected of him. The propounding of an improper question, to which objection is sustained, may lodge in the minds of the jury a possible answer, the effect of which may be difficult to eradicate; certainly, an improper question allowed to be answered is worse; and where the proponent has brought about this condition, he cannot justly complain that his adversary has not been alert and efficient in his efforts to neutralize the error.

In the case of Rookard v. Ry., 84 S. C. 190, 65 S. E. 1047, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 435, 137 Am. St. Rep. 839, certain inadmissible testimony was given before objection was made. This court held that there was no error in allowing it to remain in until counsel could have the opportunity to present the authorities, "for all the harm that could be done by its getting to the jury had already been done."

"Nor can we say that the error was cured by its 'admission, subject to objection.' That may be done in some cases when the court is to pronounce the judgment. But, in a trial by jury, such evidence may have its effect simply by being admitted at all." National Bank v. Anderson, 82 S. C. 538, 547, 11 S. E. 379, 383.

The circumstances under which the testimony was admitted and the nature of the testimony were calculated to make a deep impression upon the minds of the jury, and so lasting as not to be effaced except by an equally careful and impressive explanation and correction.

We have already referred to the importance of the issue of fact to which the testimony was directed. When the question of admissibility of the testimony came up, it appearing that the declarations of the engineers were made some 10 or 15 minutes after the collision occurred, the circuit judge promptly ruled that it was not a part of the res gestæ; but, responding to the suggestion of counsel for the plaintiff that, as the case rested upon the negligence of the conductor and engineer, the statement of the engineer as to the responsible cause of the collision was admissible, the circuit judge, after argument of counsel, admitted the testimony upon that ground. The impression created by this ruling, which was never corrected, except inferentially, necessarily was very great.

After stating the general rule that errors are cured by withdrawal, the court, in Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 567, 21 Sup. Ct. 474, 480 (45 L. Ed. 663), an exceedingly interesting case, says:

"But yet there may be instances where such a strong impression has been made upon the minds of the jury by illegal and improper testimony that its subsequent withdrawal will not remove the effect caused by its admission, and in that case the general objection may avail on appeal or writ of error."

In Oates v. U. S., 233 Fed. 201, 204, 147 C. C. A. 207, 210, Circuit Judge Woods, formerly an honored member of this court, declares as the judgment of the court:

"The exception to this rule is that the incompetent evidence will be regarded harmful, notwithstanding its subsequent withdrawal from the jury, if it was so impressive that it probably remained on the mind of the jury and influenced their finding."

That the testimony in the case was impressive at the time of its admission, there can scarcely be a doubt; that it probably remained on the mind of the jury, we must assume from the inadequate explanation and admonition of the circuit judge, and the consequent imperfect effacement. Where incompetent and improper evidence is calculated to make a strong impression upon the minds of the jurors, the error in the admission is not cured by a subsequent withdrawal of the evidence from the jury. Whittaker v. Voorhees, 38 Kan. 71, 15 Pac. 874.

"In an action by a servant against his master for injuries alleged to have been caused by defective appliances, the error of admitting in evidence a statement of the defendant's foreman is not cured by instructing the jury to disregard it." Whalen v. Gas Co., 32 N. Y. St. Rep. 48, 10 N. Y. Supp. 105.

It is held in Sulkowski v. Zynda, 160 Mich. 7, 124 N. W. 536, 136 Am. St. Rep. 414, that the admission of improper testimony is not cured by its exclusion the following day, "as the jurors must have had the evidence in mind during the remainder of the trial and argument of counsel."

Error in admitting incompetent evidence is not cured by giving an instruction which does not clearly indicate what evidence is to be disregarded. Swank v. Elwert, 55 Or. 487, 105 Pac. 901.

"The admission of irrelevant and incompetent testimony so hurtful to the litigant by reason of its effect upon the jury, relying upon the withdrawal of it to repair the damage, is a dangerous practice, and not to be commended." Elliott v. Ferguson, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 40, 83 S. W. 56.

In the Throckmorton Case, the court further says:

"There may also be a defect in the language of the attempted withdrawal, whether it was sufficiently definite to clearly identify the portion to be withdrawn. * * * In such a case as this and under the particular facts herein we think the names of the witnesses should have been given, and the specific evidence which was given by them and which was to be withdrawn should have been pointed out."

"In any event in order to effect a cure, the withdrawal must be as broad as the admission, sufficiently definite to identify clearly the evidence to be withdrawn, and so explicit and unequivocal as to preclude the inference that the jury may have been influenced thereby." 4 Corp. Jur. p. 989, § 2972.

Tested by these rules, it cannot but appear how inadequate the explanation and correction in this instance were; how diluted was the emetic compared with the strength of the poison.

We are mindful of the practical necessity in the conduct of jury trials to allow great latitude to the discretion of the presiding judge; it is essential to the administration of justice and the end of litigation. We appreciate the sentiment that justice delayed is justice denied. But in an instance of procedure which falls so far short of reasonable precautions to explain and correct an error, which at the time of its commission was of most serious consequence to the interests of a litigant, the error will be corrected in this court.

[9] 3. The Judge's Charge.—The first objection to the charge is that it was misleading, contradictory, and confusing upon the subject of the diminution of damages on account of contributory negligence, under the federal act. The rule approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ry. Co. v. Brown, 241 U. S. 223, 36 Sup. Ct. 602, 60 L. Ed. 966, which it declares is in practically the words of the statute, is this: In the event that the jury finds the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence, they must reduce his damages in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to him. Considering the portion of the charge immediately preceding that excepted to, and the defendant's request to charge which was allowed, in connection with the portion excepted to, the circuit judge committed no error of law. If the law, thus technically correct, was not, in the conception of counsel, sufficiently intelligible to the jury, the way was open for them to prefer a further request "clarifying any obscurity on the subject" which they deemed to exist.

[10] The second objection to the charge is alleged error in stating that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover although his negligence was gross, and that of the defendant slight. We find nothing in the act, and the appellant has cited no authority, which would indicate error in this proposition. While the statute makes no distinction between degrees of negligence it certainly does not debar plaintiff from all recovery in case his contributory negligence should be gross, and it certainly contemplates the possibility of the negligence of one being greater than that of the other. If, therefore, the plaintiff's negligence should be gross and the defendant's slight, the plaintiff would suffer most in the diminution of his damages. We do not see that the defendant has anything to complain of this.

The writer of this opinion was not a member of this court at the time the appeal was argued; it is his understanding from the records in his possession that the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth exceptions were abandoned.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remained to that court for a new trial.

GARY, C. J., FRASER, J., and BABB, Special Judge, concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). I dissent from the opinion of Mr. Justice COTHRAN. I see nothing in the exceptions to show such prejudicial error that a new trial should be granted. The opinion requires a circuit judge to measure up in learning, skill, readiness, and infallibility, that no judge I have ever practiced before or been associated with possesses. The opinion is manifestly unfair and unjust to the judge. It practically requires him, when he makes a mistake, to grant a new trial. He is not allowed to correct his mistakes, as Judge Bowman did in this case.

The plaintiff was injured December 14, 1917; a trial was had February 4, 1920. Certain evidence was admitted on the part of the plaintiff over objection. Later his honor told the jury to disregard it. The plaintiff finally got a verdict. I am not at all certain that his honor was not right in holding the evidence competent in the first instance, but when he concluded to strike it out, no exception was taken, and that goes out of the case. Next morning, when court convened and the case was ready to proceed, his honor turned to the official stenographer—and every one knows who has any experience in court and the trial of cases, how still the courthouse is when the judge speaks, and how alert and watchful the jurors who are trying the case are, as well as lawyers and litigants in the case—the judge then made his statement to the stenographer, and announced he had concluded to strike out the evidence, and told the jury to disregard it.

The jurors understood, and the lawyers on both sides understood, his honor, and, if the defendant's attorneys wanted further instructions on striking out this evidence, they should have asked for it; it was unjust to his honor not to do so, and later get an advantage, which is to result in a new trial. This plaintiff has been injured nearly four years, and can well complain of the law's delay and the uncertainties of courts of justice. To grant a new trial is a reflection on the intelligence and integrity of jurors. Jurors try to do what is right, and follow the instructions of the judge.

While a new trial should be at all times granted for prejudicial error, yet the error should have substance, and be actually prejudicial. In the present case, if his honor had harangued the jury at length, he could not have made them aware more fully than he did, that they were to disregard the evidence mentioned by him, and that it was not to be considered by them. And if attorneys were not satisfied with what he said, they should have asked him for further instructions.

I see no harmful error on the part of his honor. His error, if he was in error, was a trifling one, and a new trial, under all the circumstances of the case, is wrong, and works injustice and hardship on the plaintiff.

For these reasons I think the judgment should be affirmed.

MYERS v. STATE. (No 2419.)(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 12, 1921.
Motion to Rehear Denied Sept. 15, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §922(4)—Instruction not ground for new trial, as excluding documentary evidence from consideration.

On a trial for murder, an instruction that the jury are the judges of the law as well as the facts, in the sense, however, that they take the law from the court, the facts from the witnesses, apply the one to the other, and make up their verdict, is not error requiring a new trial, as excluding documentary evidence from the jury's consideration.

2. Criminal law §785(3), §922(3)—Instruction as to impeachment of witness inaccurate, but not ground for new trial.

An instruction that a witness might be impeached by proof of contradictory statements relative to matters connected with the case, and that if the witness be thus successfully impeached the question of what weight should be given his testimony was one for the jury, was inaccurate, but not ground for a new trial. (Affirmed by a divided court.)

3. Criminal law §511(2)—Requisites of corroboration of accomplice stated.

To justify a conviction for murder, the circumstances corroborating the testimony of an accomplice must be such as connect the prisoner with the offense, and it is not sufficient that the accomplice is corroborated as to time, place, and circumstances of the transaction, if there be nothing to show any connection of the prisoner therewith, except the statement of the accomplice.

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

John Myers was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Shipp & Kline, of Moultrie, and Wm. T. Townsend, of Cartersville, for plaintiff in error.

Joe M. Lang, Sol. Gen., of Calhoun, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

GEORGE, J. [1] 1. On the trial of the defendant, who was indicted for murder, the court charged the jury as follows:

"In all criminal cases you are the judges of the law as well as of the facts, in the sense, however, that you take the law from the court, the facts from the witnesses, apply the one to the other, and make up your verdict."

Held, that the charge is not error requiring the grant of a new trial, upon the ground that it excluded from the consideration of the jury certain documents introduced in evidence by the accused.

[2] 2. In one ground of the motion for new trial error is assigned upon the following charge:

"Some evidence has been introduced relative to the alleged contradictory statements heretofore made by the witness, Tom Gore. I charge you that a witness may be impeached by proof of contradictory statements relative to matters connected with the case; and if the witness be thus successfully impeached, the question of what weight should be given to his testimony is one for the jury."

Upon this assignment of error the Supreme Court is evenly divided, as in the case of Smith v. State, 150 Ga. 321, 103 S. E. 457, and the judgment of the trial court in overruling the motion for new trial on this ground stands affirmed by operation of law, though all the Justices agree that the charge given is inaccurate.

[3] 3. In Childers v. State, 52 Ga. 106, it was ruled that—

"In a case of felony, where the only witness implicating the prisoners in the crime, was himself avowedly guilty, the corroborating circumstances necessary to dispense with another witness must be such as go to connect the prisoner with the offense, and that it is not sufficient that the witness is corroborated as to the time, place, and circumstances of the transaction, if there be nothing to show any connection of the prisoner therewith, except the statement of the accomplice."

Applying this ruling, there was sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice to justify the conviction of the accused of the offense of murder. The court, therefore, did not err in overruling the motion for new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

UPMAGO LUMBER CO. v. MONROE & CO. (No. 2324.)(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 11, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 15, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error §1198—Rulings in accord with former decision not erroneous.

In a suit to enjoin interference with the operation of a sawmill in which defendants filed a cross-action for breach of a contract, where the auditor's finding in favor of defendants and the ruling of the court on exceptions thereto was in substantial accord with the ruling of the Supreme Court on a former appeal, no error was committed in refusing to recommit the case, in overruling the exceptions, or in entering judgment for defendants.

2. Reference §105—Exceptions of fact not approved need not be referred to jury in equity case.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 5141, providing that in law cases exceptions of fact to an auditor's report shall be passed upon by the jury, —and section 5142, providing that in equitable proceedings if the judge approve any exception of fact it shall be submitted to the jury, exceptions of fact need not be referred to a jury in an equity case where the judge does not approve them.

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by the Upmago Lumber Company against Monroe & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Clifford E. Hay, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error.

J. H. Merrill, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This case was here upon a former occasion. 148 Ga. 847, 98 S. E. 498. Headnote 3 of that decision is as follows:

"Treating the cross demand as for a breach of the contract, the measure of damages for the alleged breach in taking so much of the sawmill outfit as was owned by the defendants should be upon the basis of the fair market value of that property at the date it was taken, and not for any amount of money that may have been advanced by the defendants for the equipment, maintenance, or improvement of the property. Demands of the character last mentioned were set up in the answer, and the judge erroneously instructed the jury in regard to considering this in determining the amount of damages recoverable by the defendants. The measure of damages applicable as above stated would also apply to the value of buildings and other appurtenances erected by the defendants as a part of the sawmill outfit."

When the case was returned for another hearing, the defendants, Monroe & Co., in April, 1919, amended their answer and cross-action consolidating substantially what had been set out in the former answer, except that they sought to amend the cross-action so as to form a basis for the recovery of damages for the interference with the operation of the sawmill in connection with the tramway. The plaintiff demurred to the answer and cross-action as amended; and the auditor, to whom the case was referred, sustained the plaintiff's demurrer "to so much of defendants' amended answer except in so much thereof as seeks to recover the fair market value of the property owned by the defendants and taken by the plaintiff, and it is overruled as to the balance." The auditor found in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff and the surety on its bond in a certain sum. The court overruled the motion to recommit and to cite the auditor for contempt, and sustained the auditor in his findings of law and fact and entered judgment in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff and the surety on its bond for a stated sum with interest. To these rulings the plaintiff excepted.

[1] 1. In so far as the exceptions present questions for decision by this court, the trial judge did not err in refusing to recommit the case to the auditor, or in overruling the exceptions of law and fact to the auditor's report, and in entering judgment for the defendants against the plaintiff and the surety on its bond in a certain sum with interest thereon. The finding of the auditor and the ruling of the court on exceptions thereto is in substantial accord with the ruling of this court when the case was formerly before it.

[2] 2. This is an equity case brought by the plaintiff, praying for injunction and other relief; and in equity cases the judge need not refer exceptions of fact to a jury where he does not approve them. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5141, 5142; Mathewson v. Reed, 149 Ga. 217, 218 (2), 99 S. E. 854.

Judgment affirmed.

LONG v. FAULKNER et al. (No. 2136.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Boundaries — 33 — Abutting owner presumed to own fee in street, though dimensions only carry lot to street.

Suit was brought by S. M. Long against James Faulkner and David Bailey, alleged to be, respectively, the mayor and marshal of the city of St. Marys, to enjoin the defendants from their threatened interference with petitioner in the exercise of his right to gather the nuts from an old and large pecan tree growing in Osborne street, in St. Marys, 16 feet from a lot owned by petitioner and bordering on that street, which is 100 feet in width. On the hearing only the petitioner submitted evidence. The evidence in his behalf showed title in him by prescription to the lot abutting on Osborne street opposite the point where the pecan tree is growing, that the tree was planted by one of petitioner's predecessors in title; that defendants were threatening and preparing to prevent petitioner from gathering the nuts from the tree, and that both of the defendants were insolvent. Held:

The owner of the lot abutting on a public street or highway is usually presumed to own the fee of the soil under that half of the highway which is contiguous to his land, where it does not appear that the title to the fee is in the public. 4 R. C. L. 78, § 7, and cases cited in note 12. And the fact that the distances and dimensions of the lot, when ascertained or as designated, are sufficient merely to carry it to the side of a public street or highway, does not rebut such presumption. Id. note 17; 2 Elliott on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) 310, § 876, note 5. See Silvey v. McCool, 86 Ga. 1, 12 S. E. 175.

2. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 663(3)—Abutting owner has exclusive right to soil in street; abutting owner owns trees in street.

Such abutting owner has exclusive right to the soil, subject only, in general, to the easement or the right of passage in the public and the incidental right of properly fitting the street or highway for use and keeping it so. 2 Elliott on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) 311, § 876, note 6. In other words, such proprietor has all the usual rights and remedies of the owner of the freehold, subject only to the public easement (Id. note 7); and the trees growing thereon belong to him, unless needed to repair the way (Id. note 12).

3. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 663(3), 678 — Abutting owner owns trees in street; city may remove trees owned by abutting owner; abutting owner owns fruit of trees.

Where the fee to half of the street is vested in an abutting landowner, subject to the easement in the city for public uses, trees upon the margin, or near the sidewalk, next to the abutter, are his property, although it is within the power of the city to remove the trees in case of public necessity or convenience. City of Atlanta v. Holliday, 96 Ga. 546, 23 S. E. 509. If a tree is his property, it follows, of course, that he owns its fruit.

4. Interlocutory injunction erroneously refused.

Applying these rulings to the uncontradicted evidence submitted in behalf of the petitioner, the court erred in refusing to grant an interlocutory injunction.

Error from Superior Court, Camden County; J. P. Highsmith, Judge.

Suit by S. M. Long against James Faulkner and another. An interlocutory injunction was refused, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Cowart & Vocelle, of St. Marys, for plaintiff in error.

S. C. Townsend, of St. Marys, for defendants in error.

FISH, O. J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., disqualified.

LEE & BRADSHAW et al. v. ROGERS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Life estates  $\S$ 13—Tenant during widowhood may work trees for turpentine.

A tenant holding under a devise of land "during widowhood" has the right to use the land and pine trees growing thereon by hacking and otherwise working the trees for turpentine purposes, as against a person entitled in reversion, where prior to his death the testator used the land and trees for such purposes.

2. Waste  $\S$ 20—Whether manner of working trees for turpentine should be enjoined held a question of fact.

It is a question of fact whether the working of trees for turpentine purposes by a tenant for life is so injurious to the trees as will be prohibited at the instance of a person entitled in reversion, where the working consists of cutting series of streaks on the bodies of the trees extending through the bark in such manner as to make one exposed surface and in some instances more than one, depending upon the size of the tree, whereby crude gum is caused to exude at such exposed surfaces and deposit in metal cups attached to the trees and from which the gum is collected and carried away.

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by W. J. Rogers and others against Lee & Bradshaw and others. Judgment granting a temporary injunction, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

In 1894 Moses Dukes executed a will, and died in 1898. The testator left a widow and ten children. Item 1 of the will gave direction as to disposition of testator's body. Item 2 directed all just debts to be paid. Item 3 provided:

"I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sarah Jane Dukes, for and during her widowhood, all the property I own and possessed of: consisting of lands and tenements, horses, mules, cows, hogs, household and kitchen furniture, plantation tools, wagons, carts, buggies, carriages, all notes and accounts, cash and whatsoever."

Item 4 appointed testator's wife, Sarah Jane, sole executrix.

The will was probated in 1898. At the time of his death testator was seized and possessed of a tract of land known as the Dukes place, containing about 500 acres and comprising parts of lots Nos. 425 and 450 in the Thirteenth district of Brooks county, of which about 300 acres was woodland. On the 3d day of February, 1919, Sarah Jane Dukes, the widow of the testator (who had not again married), executed a lease to Lee & Bradshaw, turpentine operators, covering all of the timber on the land. The lease stated that it was "for all the purposes of boxing, working, and otherwise using said timber for turpentine purposes. * * * The above timber formerly worked by B. O. Wood. The life of this lease four (4) years from above date, for all virgin timber on above lot." The lessees entered upon the land and commenced to work all the timber thereon suitable for turpentine purposes by the cup method, which involved cutting streaks through the bark and sap of the tree so that it would exude gum; and attaching metal cups to the tree in such manner as to catch the gum. Subsequently and between the dates May 17, 1919, and August 20, 1919, inclusive, W. J. Rogers, having notice of such lease and operation thereunder, acquired by purchase several undivided interests amounting to six-tenths interest in all of the land. He was a son of Mrs. Mary Lizzie Rogers, a daughter of the testator, and purchased directly from some of the children, and in other instances from transferees of children and heirs of deceased children of the testator.

In October, 1919, W. J. Rogers and his mother, Mrs. Mary Lizzie Rogers, asserting title as tenants in remainder under the will of the testator, instituted an action against Lee & Bradshaw, to enjoin the working of the trees for turpentine purposes, on the ground that the trees were part of the realty and the working of the trees for such purposes was permanent injury to the trees and the land on which they were growing, amounting to waste, which the widow as a tenant during widowhood had no right to authorize. At the interlocutory hearing there was an issue, under the pleadings and evidence, as to whether the trees which defendants were working had been worked prior to the death of the testator and as to whether the manner in which the trees were being worked was injurious to the trees.

The plaintiffs' evidence was to the effect: That during the life of the testator the land had been worked for turpentine, but all trees that had been so worked were cut off for sawmill purposes before the death of the testator, and practically all of the trees that defendants are working are young trees that have grown up since the death of the testator; that B. O. Wood had worked the land for turpentine purposes, covering a period of six years which ended in 1918, which was subsequent to the testator's death; also, that the working of the trees extracted the sap to such extent as to be permanently injurious, and defaced the trees in such manner as to render them liable to burn and blow down, and consequently the use to which the trees were being put by the defendant was destructive of the estate.

The defendants' evidence was to the effect: That in the main the trees which they were working were being worked by the old "box" process at the time the will was executed, and were being so worked at the death of the testator, and had been continuously worked by successive lessees up to the time of the lease to defendants; that such "box process" involved cutting boxes in the tree into which the gum would run, the "box" serving the purpose of the metal cup employed in the new or "cup process"; that the old method of extracting turpentine was to cut a number of faces and boxes on the same tree, boxes being cut in such way as to catch and hold the gum that would flow; that even under this method the percentage of the trees that were killed was very small; that where trees have been worked by this old method and do not die, the reworking or back-boxing of them by putting streaks thereon will not injure them; that the taking of the gum from the trees is not injurious to trees or to the land; that each year the tree makes for itself a new supply of gum or sap, and contains as much gum the second year as it did the first, which is true of subsequent years; that the idea of putting a streak upon the tree is simply to scarify the surface so as to cause, at the proper season, the gum to flow from this wound into the cup that has been attached to receive it; that after the gum has run for one season this streak will heal up, and it will not run again the next year unless a new streak is placed upon it for the same purpose; that defendant's method of working the trees was by this "cup process," and was not injurious to the trees or land; and that all of the income of the estate left by the testator would be insufficient to support the widow, if she were not allowed the income derived from leasing the timber.

The judge hearing the case rendered a decision at chambers as follows:

"After consideration of the law and the evidence in this case, it is ordered and decreed that the defendants be restrained and enjoined from cutting, boxing, or putting streaks upon the timber described in plaintiff's petition, until the hearing. In so ordering, the chancellor is not so doing in the exercise of the legal discretion vested in him, but upon the ground that as matter of law the life tenant could not legally, in this case, lease the right to box, cut, and work the timber for turpentine purposes."

The exception is to this judgment.

Titus & Dekle, of Thomasville, for plaintiffs in error.

Branch & Snow, of Quitman, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. Under a proper construction of the judgment granting the interlocutory injunction, the trial judge did not consider the conflict of evidence, but, viewing the evidence in its most favorable light for the defendants, decided as a matter of law that they did not have the right, as lessees of the life tenant whose term had not expired, to work the trees growing upon the land for turpentine purposes. Under one phase of the conflicting evidence, the trees growing upon the land were being worked for turpentine purposes under leases executed by the testator at the time the will was executed and at the time of his death; and the manner in which the defendants are now working the trees for such purposes is less injurious to the trees than was the manner of operating under the old process which was in vogue during the life of the testator, and is not destructive of the trees. Under these circumstances, the correctness of the judgment involves two questions of law which it is proper to decide, both of which are controlling: First, has a tenant holding under a devise of land "during widowhood" the right to use the land and pine trees growing thereon, by hacking and otherwise working the trees for turpentine purposes, as against a person entitled in reversion, where prior to his death the testator used the land and trees for such purposes? Second, conceding that the land was not being so used by the testator, is the working by such tenant for turpentine purposes (which consists in cutting series of streaks on the body of the tree extending through the bark, in such manner as to make one exposed surface or more according to the size of the tree and causing the crude gum to exude at such exposed surface and deposit in metal cups attached to the tree, from which it is collected and carried away to be distilled and sold) so injurious to the tree that such use must be held, as a matter of law, to be waste as against a person entitled in reversion?

It is declared in the Civil Code, § 3684, that estates for widowhood are subject to the same rules as life estates. Among the rules applicable to life estates are the provisions of the Civil Code, § 3666, which is as follows:

"The tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property, so that in such use he exercises the ordinary care of a prudent man for its preservation and protection, and commits no acts tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion. For the want of such care, and the willful commission of such acts, he forfeits his interest to the remainderman, if he elects to claim immediate possession."

This law was included in the Code of 1863 (section 2235) which was regularly adopted by the Legislature, and also included in the several subsequent Codes, some of which have likewise been adopted by the Legislature; and consequently it has all the binding effect of a statute. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. State, 104 Ga. 831, 31 S. E. 531, 42 L. R. A. 518. This Code section was construed in Woodward v. Gates, 38 Ga. 205, 213, where it was said:

"This section of the Code declares that the tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property, so that, in such use, he exercises the ordinary care of a prudent man for its preservation and protection, and commits no acts tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion. In determining what amounts to waste, regard must be had to the condition of the premises, and the inquiry should be, did good husbandry, considered with reference to the custom of the country, require the felling of the trees, and were the acts such as a judicious,

Again, in Roby v. Newton, 121 Ga. 679, 682, 49 S. E. 694, 695, 68 L. R. A. 601, it was said.

"While the section of the Code does not use the terms 'permissive waste' or 'voluntary waste,' or the term 'waste' at all, still an analysis of that section will indicate that its author had in mind the distinction between the two classes of waste. It imposes upon the life tenant the duty of exercising the ordinary care of a prudent man for the preservation and protection of the estate, and the failure to do this is permissive waste; and it also prohibits the commission of any act tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion, and the commission of such acts is voluntary waste."

And in Belt v. Simkins, 113 Ga. 894, 896, 39 S. E. 430, 431, it was held that—

"A tenant for life who holds the estate without impeachment for waste is not liable at law to a remainderman for waste committed, though he may be restrained by a court of equity, at the instance of a remainderman, from committing further acts of waste in the future which are destructive of the inheritance, or are of a wanton and malicious nature."

In the course of the opinion it was said:

"One who creates a life estate for the benefit of another, either by will or by deed, may, if he sees proper, provide that the tenant for life shall not be held liable for waste. Such a tenant is characterized as a tenant for life who holds without impeachment for waste. No matter what may be the character of the waste committed, no one interested in the property has a right to call such a tenant into a court of law on account of his conduct. If a particular tenant exercises this power in an unconscientious manner, a court of equity may interfere to restrain him, and a waste committed by such a tenant which would be enjoined by a court of equity is called equitable waste; but a life tenant who holds the estate without impeachment for waste is not liable for acts of waste except those which are destructive of the inheritance or wanton and malicious in their character. Bisp. Prin. Eq. § 434; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (1st Ed.) 864; 12 Enc. Laws of Eng. 536; Dickinson v. Jones, 36 Ga. 105."

In applying this statute regard must be had for the provisions of the instrument creating the life estate and the nature of the property in which the life estate was given, and the use to which it was put at the time the will was executed and when it went into effect. If a testator, having nothing but a turpentine farm which was a going concern, bequeathed that to his wife during widowhood, it could hardly be said that the testator intended that she should take nothing under the will; yet that would be the effect if the trees on the farm could not be worked at all for turpentine purposes. The trees constituted a part of the realty (North Georgia

Co. v. Bebee, 128 Ga. 563, 57 S. E. 873), but not more than minerals in the land. By the great weight of authority in other jurisdictions a tenant for life may remove for his own profit minerals from mines which were open at the time the life estate was created. By analogy the same rule has been applied when the life interest related to timber estates. In Bartlett v. Pickering, 113 Me. 96, 99, 92 Atl. 1008, 1010, it was said:

"It is undoubtedly true that the general rule is that trees cut and sold are treated as principal and not as income, and that a life tenant is guilty of waste in cutting trees. But we think this rule is not applicable to trees on 'wild land' so called in this state, which is kept and held merely for the produce of salable timber. These lands are held for income-producing purposes, and the only income derivable from them ordinarily comes from the cutting and sale of marketable timber trees. The bequest of the income of the trust estate in this case, consisting, as it did, in considerable part of timberlands, contemplated, we think, that the income should be obtained from the cutting of trees, or the sale of the stumpage rights. See Drown v. Smith, 52 Maine, 141; McNichol v. Eaton, 77 Maine, 246; Honywood v. Honywood, L. R. 18 Eq. Cas. 306. A similar rule has been applied to the rights of life tenants in analogous cases of iron, coal, oil, and gas mines, opened in the lifetime of the testator, even when the exercise of the right might in time exhaust the mine, and practically destroy the estate of the remainderman. Gaines v. Green Pond Iron Min. Co., 33 N. J. Eq. 608; Sayers v. Hoskinson, 110 Pa. St. 44; Koen v. Bartlett, 41 W. Va. 559."

See, also, on the subject, Dashwood v. Magliac, 64 Law Times New Series, 99; Poole v. Union Trust Co., 191 Mich. 162, 157 N. W. 430, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 622; Rutherford v. Wilson, 95 Ark. 246, 129 S. W. 534, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 763; Swayne v. Lone Acre Oil Co., 96 Tex. 597, 86 S. W. 740, 69 L. R. A. 986, 8 Ann. Cas. 1117; Phillips v. Smith, 14 Mees. & W. 589; 21 C. J. 951, notes 64, 65; Ballentine v. Poyner, 3 N. C. 110; Beam v. Woolridge, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 17; Willard v. Willard, 56 Pa. 119, 128. In the report of the last-cited case, it was said:

"In considering the question of waste by a life tenant, respect must be had to the nature of the property. Here the evidence proves clearly that the tract was bought by Jacob and John as timber land, that this was its chief value, and that they were both engaged in cutting and rafting timber from it. The timber was the intended source of profit, and the parties treated it accordingly. It is difficult to draw a distinction in this respect between profits actually drawn by the owner from the timber where it is the source of profit, and profits drawn from opened mines. Timber is no more a fixed part of the realty than coal or other minerals, and yet a life tenant may mine without limit from opened mines."

In North Carolina the same principle has been applied where dower was set apart to a widow in lands on which the trees were being worked for turpentine purposes at the time of the decedent's death. Carr v. Carr, 20 N. C. 317. From the standpoint of the evidence tending to show that at the time the will was executed, and at the time of the death of the testator, the wooded lands of the testator were being worked for turpentine purposes, the widow would be entitled, under the devise, to work the land for such purpose during her widowhood.

[2] 2. If the lands were not so worked for turpentine purposes by the testator so as to bring the case within the principle above discussed, it would nevertheless be a question for the jury, under the conflicting evidence, to say whether the working of the trees was such a permanent injury to them as was beyond the rights of the defendants as lessees of the widow during the existence of her term. In a somewhat similar case it was said in Drake v. Wigle, 24 Upper Can. C. P. 405:

"It is a question of fact for a jury, what extent of wood may be cut down in such cases, without exposing the party to the charge of waste."

Again it was said in Campbell v. Shields, 44 Upper Can. Q. B. 449:

"It is a question for the jury whether the tapping of trees for sugar making has the effect of destroying the trees, or of shortening their life, or injuring them for timber purposes."

In the recent case of Gleaton v. Aultman, 150 Ga. 768, 105 S. E. 445, being a suit by remaindermen to enjoin the lessees of a life tenant from working the trees for turpentine purposes, it was held that the judge did not abuse his discretion in granting an interlocutory injunction. This was an implied ruling that the question of injury to the trees was one of fact. It follows that the judge erred in holding, as matter of law, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction.

Judgment reversed.

COBURN v. AMERICAN RY. EXPRESS CO.
(No. 100.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

Carriers §136—Refusal of nonsuit, and leaving to jury whether express packages were properly packed for shipment, held proper.

Under the evidence in action involving question whether packages which were stolen during the night after they were left with an express company, and which it claimed were not in condition for shipment, had been accepted by it for shipment, or whether its duties with respect thereto were only those of a warehouseman, held that the question whether the packages were properly packed for shipment was properly left to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by F. M. Coburn against the American Railway Express Company for loss of express packages, alleged to be worth $136.75, through robbery during the night after they were left with defendant. From a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

The plaintiff's evidence, in part, is as follows:

C. E. Vaughan testified: I was a drayman for myself on the 6th day of May, 1919, and delivered to the express company at Roanoke Junction two packages of merchandise for Mr. F. M. Coburn. I delivered these to John Scull, express agent. The packages at the time I delivered them were in good condition. He told me to leave the packages there—I laid them on the shelf there—and that he would give me a receipt for them in the morning when I come back, which he had been doing for months. I had been doing that for months. He received the packages and told me he would give me receipt the next morning. I left them laying on the shelf where he gives receipts. These packages were marked for shipment.

F. M. Coburn testified: I am the plaintiff in this action, and am a shoe merchant at Roanoke Rapids. On the 6th day of May, 1919, I delivered to Mr. Vaughan, to be carried to the express company office, at Roanoke Junction, two packages for shipment. The shoes and clothing were packed by me and Mr. King, the man who works for me. The packages were in good condition when delivered to Mr. Vaughan for transportation to the express office. I did not receive the packages back. I do not know what became of them. The next morning Mr. Coleman told me they were stolen. Cross-examination: Q. What did Mr. Coleman tell you that afternoon when he called you up over the phone? A. Mr. Coleman called me up around 4 or 5 o'clock and told me that the packages I had sent to the express office were not packed right and were in bad order, and that I would have to repack them before he could ship them. Mr. Coleman was hauling express, and I told him to bring them back to me. He had been hauling for me and I told him to bring them back to me so that I could repack them. I didn't have no way to send for them. I was in a big hurry, and I knew it was almost closing time, and I wouldn't have time to repack them then. I told Mr. Coleman to bring the packages back after he told me that they were not in shipping condition. It was late in the afternoon then. I told Mr. Coleman to bring them back, but only when he told me he could not ship them until they were repacked. When they left my place of business they were in good shape. The reason I did not get them was that it was late in the afternoon when he called me and told me that and it was almost closing time. These packages were all right, and marked for shipment when they left my store. Q. He told you that they were not packed correctly, and that he could not accept them for shipment? A. That was late in the afternoon, about closing time. Q. And you then told him to bring them back to you? A. He had been hauling express for me, and that was the reason I asked him to bring them back. Q. And you instructed Mr. Coleman to bring them to you? A. I told him I would take them back and repack them. I did not have any receipt for them, but I had sent stuff up there several times before, and receipt would be sent me the next day. They would be put there overnight, and send receipt for them the next day. He did not call me up over the phone, and tell me he could not accept the packages for shipment the same day they were left there until after dinner. Mr. Coleman was the general agent of the express company, and that day, when he went to the office and examined the packages, he found them in bad order, and called me up and told me he could not accept them for shipment, and I instructed him to bring them back to me, but he did not let me know anything about it until late in the afternoon, and it was about time to close up, and I would not have time to go after them. I told him to bring them back. I did not mean before they closed up, but I mean it would have been closing time before I could have gotten them myself. The express office was broken into that night.

Defendant offered the following testimony:

Deposition of H. G. Coleman, offered in testimony by the defendant and read: My name is H. G. Coleman; age 28, residence Boykins, Va., and occupation merchant. On May 8, 1919, I was employed at the time of the alleged loss of these goods at Roanoke Junction, N. C., as agent of American Railway Express Company. These goods were delivered to our office improperly packed, and were refused by us. F. M. Coburn was notified before closing time, notified by telephone. He or his clerk instructed us to hold shipment until he could come and properly pack the packages. This took place before the closing hour, which was 5 o'clock p. m. He had plenty of time to come and repack the goods before the office closed. The packages were left by a public drayman in the lobby, and were not placed in the storeroom; the freight office and the express office being in the same room. That afternoon the office was closed at the usual hour. Mr. Coburn had not come to repack the goods. About 8 o'clock the next morning it was discovered that the office had been broken open and robbed the night before. Upon investigation I learned that one case of clothing was taken, and one case robbed of everything except one suit of clothes. The other cases were robbed of several pairs of shoes. These goods taken were left by the public drayman for Mr. Coburn the afternoon before. No receipt was given for them.

Defendant's objection to the charge and the refusal of an instruction, as stated in its brief, is that the jury were allowed to pass on the question whether the packages were properly packed for shipment. Defendant claimed that this was not at the time of the robbery an open question, but that it had been determined by the agent and accepted by plaintiff, and that therefore defendant held the goods for the convenience and accommodation of plaintiff, he having agreed to receive and repack the goods without protest or claim that they were in proper condition for shipment.

Daniel & Daniel, for appellant.

PER CURIAM. The controversy on trial narrowed itself to a question as to whether the defendant had accepted the packages for shipment in its capacity as a common carrier, the defendant contending that its duties were only those of a warehouseman at the time of the loss of the goods. Upon this disputed question of fact, his honor submitted the case to the jury, and they have found in favor of the plaintiff.

There was an exception to the charge and the refusal to give one of plaintiff's prayers for instructions. Upon the record, we do not think these exceptions can be sustained. The motion to nonsuit was properly overruled. We have discovered no sufficient reason for disturbing the result.

No error.

STATE v. JONES. (No. 1.)

1. Criminal law §114(1)—Error assigned must appear in the record.

Although errors in the charge may be first assigned on appeal, the error must appear in the record.

2. Criminal law §112—Assignment of error held contradicted by record.

In the absence of a full charge to the jury, a statement of the record that the court, at the conclusion of the argument, charged the jury at length with respect to the case, and stated fully contentions of the state and defendant, to all of which there was no exception, contradicts an assignment of error that there was no charge as to manslaughter.

3. Criminal law §114(2), 114(14)—In absence of charge in record, no inference of error will be drawn, and burden of proof is on appellant.

Where the record is silent as to a part of the charge, the appellate court cannot draw an inference of error in refusal to charge as to manslaughter, since the presumption is that the instructions of the court were correct, and the burden is on the appellant to show the contrary, and the fact that defendant's counsel confined his argument to second degree murder, does not alter the case.

4. Criminal law §825(4)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt, if error, held not available, in absence of request for more definite charge.

An instruction to the effect that, if the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the homicide, they should find him guilty, while a general statement of the rule, if erroneous, is unavailable in the absence of a request to charge more definitely.

5. Criminal law §1172(2)—Instruction that jury must be convinced to a moral certainty held not prejudicial to defendant.

An instruction that the jury must be convinced to a moral certainty was not prejudicial to defendant, especially when followed by a correct instruction on reasonable doubt.

6. Criminal law §114(14)—If charge was erroneous, presumption is in absence of entire charge in record that defendant's counsel would have excepted.

Whether a charge as to reasonable doubt the defendant committed the homicide was too general in its terms, and since the record states that the judge charged the jury as to the case, and stated fully the contention of the parties to which there was no exception, it will be presumed that, if error in charging had been made, defendant's counsel would have excepted.

7. Criminal law §822(1)—Charge must be considered as a whole.

A charge must be construed as one connected whole, and not by detached portions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hyde County; Allen, Judge.

Henry Jones was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. No error.

The defendant, with others, was indicted in the court below for the murder of James Smith, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. The solicitor for the state withdrew the charge of murder in the first degree. There was no suggestion from defendant's counsel that the question of manslaughter was involved, or that there was any evidence of the same. No instruction was requested on that subject, and no reference to manslaughter made by defendant, until the defendant, after verdict and judgment, filed his exceptions, and upon them based his assignment of errors, in which he made his first reference to manslaughter, when he excepted because the court failed to charge as to manslaughter. The substance of the record on this point is as follows:

The case was fully argued by both the state and the defendant, neither the state nor the defendant's counsel discussing any question except the guilt or innocence of the defendants on the charge of murder in the second degree. No allusion was made in the course of the argument by either the solicitor or associate counsel for the state, or by any counsel for either of the defendants, to the guilt or innocence of the defendants of any crime except murder in the second degree, and specifically no contention was made either by the state or the defense that the defendant was guilty of either murder in the first degree or of manslaughter, the only question argued being whether the defendants were guilty or innocent of the charge of murder in the second degree. During the course of the argument for the defendant, the defendant's counsel read the statute defining the crime of murder in the second degree to the jury, and argued to the jury the punishment that was permissible upon a conviction under the same, and told the jury that, if the defendants were convicted, they would be punished by imprisonment from 2 to 30 years, in the discretion of the court. The solicitor likewise admitted to the jury that the statute had been correctly read, and that the punishment suggested by the defendants' counsel was possible upon a conviction, but argued to the jury that the matter of punishment was not for their determination, but should and could be left to the court to administer in justice and mercy. At the conclusion of the argument, the court charged the jury at length with respect to the case, stating fully the contentions of both the state and the defendants, to all of which there was no exception.

There was testimony to the effect that one of the witnesses had heard the defendant fighting the deceased the night of the homicide, and that, before the homicide, he had heard him threaten to kill him. There was evidence tending to show that McArthur and Smith were killed with a heavy singletree, made of solid oak, and having iron bands at each end of it, and which was a deadly weapon. The indentations in the skull of McArthur corresponded with the shape of the ends of this singletree. The dead bodies of McArthur and Smith were hauled in a cart belonging to John Jones (which was borrowed by defendant, Henry Jones) to the canal near Henry's home, and thrown into the canal, Henry having said that he wanted the cart to carry the boys (McArthur and Smith) to the canal and "chunk them in." There was evidence that blood stains were found on Henry's kitchen floor, and the singletree in the bottom of the cart. There was other evidence tending to identify the defendant, as the one who committed the homicide, in addition to his admission in jail that he and his wife had killed the boys, and that he intended to "put it on Dad," and also his threat to kill Smith because of some real or fancied grievance.

The jury, under the evidence and the charge of the court, convicted the defendant of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment upon the verdict, he appealed.

Daniel & Carter, of Washington, N. C., and Clifton Bell and Mann & Mann, all of Swan Quarter, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The principal exception of the defendant is that the court failed to define manslaughter, or to charge that the jury could find the defendant guilty of manslaughter or murder in the second degree. The full charge is not in the record. We will first consider, therefore, whether it appears from the record that the court failed to give any such instruction. We are governed, in this respect, entirely by the record, which cannot be altered by a mere exception or assignment of error.

[1] Exceptions must be confined to something alleged as error which appears in the record, and an assignment of error must ordinarily be based upon an exception duly taken. Errors in the charge may, of course, be assigned the first time in the case on appeal, but the error must appear in the record, and not only in the assignment. This is necessarily true, because, if the showing of error depended upon the mere allegation of it, when the error did not appear in the record, it would be useless to consider the record, but only the assignment as to the ruling of the court. Of course this would not do, and could not for a moment be accepted as a principle in the law of appellate procedure. The law is the other way, as we do not presume error was committed, but the opposite; and he who alleges that there was error must show it by the record, and not by assertion only, an assignment being of no avail unless it rests upon matter appearing in the record or case on appeal. Wilson v. Wilson, 174 N. C. 755, 94 S. E. 669; In re Smith's Will, 183 N. C. 466, 79 S. E. 977; Todd v. Mackie, 160 N. C. 352, 76 S. E. 245; Allred v. Kirkman, 160 N. C. 392, 76 S. E. 244; Worley v. Logging Co., 157 N. C. 490, 73 S. E. 107. So, in this case, we must presume the correctness of the trial below, because we cannot see any such error in it as is alleged, as it has not been made to appear.

[2] The defendant assigned as error that the judge failed to charge the jury as to manslaughter. Not only does this not appear in the record, as the full charge is not here, but what does appear contradicts it, as the record states that Judge Allen, who presided at the trial—

"at the conclusion of the argument, charged the jury at length with respect to the case, and stated fully the contentions of the state and the defendant, to all of which there was no exception."

And this disposes of the assignment as to manslaughter, as it excludes the idea that there was no instruction as to it, the statement in the record being sufficient to show that the charge embraced every phase of the case. If so, there can be no error in the charge, even if there was evidence to support the contention as to manslaughter. The appellant has not, therefore, shown that there was no instruction as to manslaughter, and, as was held in the above cited cases and Powers v. City of Wilmington, 177 N. C. 361, 99 S. E. 102:

"Appellant must show error; we will not presume it, but he must make it appear plainly, as the presumption [as to the correctness of the trial] is against him"—citing In re Smith's Will, supra.

The same was said in Baggett v. Lanier, 178 N. C. 129, p. 131, 100 S. E. 254, 255, the language in that case, being:

"The burden of showing error is upon him, for, in the absence of anything to the contrary, we presume that the ruling of the court was correct."

And the following, which was said in Bell v. Harrison, 179 N. C. 190, at page 198, 102 S. E. 200, 204, is also pertinent and analogous to the question here:

"A party cannot complain of an instruction given at his own request; nor will an assignment of error be sustained which conflicts with the statement of the case upon the question whether the instruction was so given. The judge's statement, as to what was done, must stand, in the absence of any correction of the record by certiorari or otherwise."

As held in State v. Harris, 181 N. C. 600, 107 S. E. 466, "The statement of the case on an appeal imports absolute verity." We must therefore accept it as we find it, and can add nothing to it, nor can we take anything from it. The appeal must stand or fall by what we find in the case, without regard to any assignment of error, unless supported by it.

[3] As the whole of the charge is not here, we are unable to know what it was, or whether what is not here embraced a sufficient charge as to manslaughter. We only know that defendant deemed it adequate, as he did not ask for any further instruction. We are not permitted to draw an inference favorable to the defendant merely because the record is silent as to a part of the charge. We should presume to the contrary, as the burden is upon the defendant to show any error.

[4] The fact that counsel for defendant chose to narrow the discussion and confine his argument to second degree murder does not alter the case. That is their act, and not that of the court. They may have thought, and perhaps rightly so, that the evidence as to manslaughter, if there was any at all, was entirely too conjectural, and would not lead the jury to adopt that view. It was hardly as substantial or probative in character as was the evidence in Byrd v. Express Co., 139 N. C. 273, 51 S. E. 851.

We have discussed this exception upon the assumption that there was evidence of manslaughter, which is exceedingly doubtful, as all the evidence tends to show that defendant was the aggressor, and, if there was a quarrel, that he brought it on and killed the deceased with malice, and not in hot blood, during a sudden quarrel, or upon legal provocation. The exception and assignment of error are not, therefore, sustainable and must be overruled.

All that we have said is based on the assumption that, if there was evidence of manslaughter, it was the duty of the judge to give a proper instruction in regard to it, whether he was asked to do so or not. This was decided in State v. Merrick, 171 N. C. 788, 88 S. E. 501, where we held, as shown by the third headnote:

"Upon a trial for murder, a verdict for a less grade of crime is permitted, and where the indictment is for murder, and there are facts in evidence tending to reduce the crime to manslaughter, it is reversible error for the trial judge not to submit this phase to the jury, under a proper charge, though not requested by the defendant to do so, and although he has offered to submit to a verdict of murder in the second degree, which has been refused"—citing Revisal, § 535.

[5] The exception to the judge's charge on reasonable doubt is untenable. He did say that the jury must be convinced "to a moral certainty," but he added:

"If you find from the evidence that the defendants, or either of them, committed the homicide, and you so find beyond a reasonable doubt, you will return a verdict of guilty as to the one or ones whom you so find."

This was stating the rule generally, but there was no request to state it more definitely, and, in the absence of such a request, the error, if any, is not available to the defendant. Simmons v. Davenport, 140 N. C. 407, 53 S. E. 225.

There is no special formula of the law for charging upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt. It was said in State v. Adams, 138 N. C. 688, 695, 50 S. E. 765, 767:

"There is no particular formula by which the court must charge the jury upon the intensity of proof. * * * 'All that the law requires is that the jury shall be clearly instructed, that unless after due consideration of all the evidence they are "fully satisfied" or "entirely convinced," or "satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt" of the guilt of the defendant, it is their duty to acquit, and every attempt on the part of the courts to lay down a "formula" for the instruction of the jury, by which to "gauge" the degrees of conviction has resulted in no good.' We reproduce these words from the opinion delivered by Pearson, C. J., in State v. Parker, 61 N. C. 473, as they present in a clear and forcible manner the true principle of law upon the subject. The expressions we sometimes find in the books as to the degree of proof required for a conviction are not formulas prescribed by the law, but mere illustrations. State v. Sears, 61 N. C. 146; State v. Knox, Id., 312; State v. Norwood, 74 N. C. 247. The law requires only that the jury shall be fully satisfied of the truth of the charge, due regard being had to the presumption of innocence and to the consequent rule as to the burden of proof"—citing State v. Knox, supra.

The dictionaries define "moral certainty" as—"A very high degree of probability, although not demonstrable as a certainty; a probability of so high a degree that it can be confidently acted upon in the affairs of life; as that there is a moral certainty of his guilt."

This expression that the evidence must produce a moral certainty of guilt was not, in any degree, prejudicial to the defendant, especially when it was immediately followed by what was said as to reasonable doubt, giving the prisoner the full benefit of that doctrine. As the full charge is not before us, it may be that the learned judge further elucidated the doctrine, and we would not impute error upon mere conjecture that he did not do so, even if this part of the charge, which is before us, was not precisely correct. But we see no substantial error in it as it stands.

[6] The charge that, if the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt the defendant committed the homicide, the verdict should be guilty, was somewhat too brief and general, but not so when considered in connection with the statement in the record that the judge charged the jury at length as to the case, and stated fully the contentions of the parties, to which there was no exception. In other words, he charged the jury correctly as to the case, or counsel would have excepted. It is the fair presumption that they would have excepted if there was error in the charge. We could not well presume otherwise with such able counsel, as the defendant had to protect his interests, and it is a fair and reasonable inference from this statement in the record that the charge covered the whole range of questions involved in it, including, of course, instructions as to murder in the second degree, manslaughter, and excusable homicide, and that the verdict should designate the particular degree of homicide if the jury found defendant guilty of either one below murder in the first degree, which had been eliminated. As we have shown, the presumption is that the court instructed the jury correctly. When the charge is thus considered as an entirety, we cannot conclude that the jury misunderstood or disobeyed explicit instructions given to them.

[7] That the charge must be construed as one connected whole, and not by detached portions, has grown into an axiom of the law. State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283; Kornegay v. R. R., 154 N. C. 389, 70 S. E. 731; In re Will of Hinton, 180 N. C. 206, 216, 104 S. E. 341; Haggard v. Mitchell, 180 N. C. 255, 258, 104 S. E. 561; State v. Chambers, 180 N. C. 705, 708, 104 S. E. 670, and the many other intervening cases where the principle has been approved. If the charge is read under this rule with the proper presumption in favor of its correctness constantly kept in mind, we can have no doubt that the jury fully understood what they were trying, and were not led into the error of supposing that the mere commission of the homicide would justify them in returning a verdict of murder in the second degree, or even for manslaughter. The course of the trial, as it appears by the case on appeal and the verdict, shows that the jury clearly understood the case and the law "arising thereon." We do not see how they could have decided otherwise than they did. If they have found a wrong verdict, it was not the fault of the judge. Great stress was laid upon second degree murder by counsel in argument, in the hope and belief, perhaps, that the jury would be more apt to choose to acquit as between a verdict for the higher felony and one of "not guilty" than they would as between manslaughter and acquittal, and to those acquainted with court trials, this was a shrewd, and to a trained lawyer, a not unusual, view to take of the matter.

The defendant was no doubt most ably defended in the court below, and we know that Mr. Carter made an exceptionally strong defense of him before us.

The other exceptions, not specially discussed by us, although not mentioned in the defendant's brief, have been fully considered, and found to be without any merit.

We find no error in the case or the record. No error.

BROWN v. BROWN. (No. 58.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$  690(3)—Ground of exception must appear in record.

On appeal, grounds of exception to evidence must appear in record that the court may pass on its legal sufficiency, and appearance only in the exception or assignment of error is not sufficient.

2. Trial  $\Leftrightarrow$  165—On motion for nonsuit, only evidence favorable to plaintiff considered.

On motion for nonsuit, the court may consider only plaintiff's evidence, and so much of defendant's as is favorable to plaintiff, or supports his case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Allen, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Eva Brown against Henry Ward Brown, for divorce. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant, by guardian ad litem, appeals. No error.

This is an action for divorce a vinculo, upon the ground that the parties have lived separate and apart from each other for five years before the commencement of this action, and was brought under the provisions of Public Laws of 1921, c. 63. Plaintiff had previously obtained a decree for divorce from bed and board. Upon the findings of the jury, judgment was entered for the plaintiff granting her an absolute divorce. The defendant, being insane, appeared by guardian ad litem, who appealed from the judgment, and the only exception is that the court refused to nonsuit the plaintiff, it being stated in the exception that it appeared from the evidence that defendant had been an inmate of the state hospital a part of the statutory period of five years.

W. L. Whitley, of Plymouth, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The evidence is not in the record, and therefore we are unable to determine whether the insanity so appeared or not, and besides, we should know, at least, the substance of the evidence in order to pass upon its legal sufficiency. We have often held that the ground of exception must appear in the record, and not only in the exception or assignment of error itself, which is the case here. State v. Jones (at this term) 182 N. C. —, 108 S. E. 376, citing Wilson v. Wilson, 174 N. C. 755, 94 S. E. 669;

In re Smith's Will, 163 N. C. 466, 79 S. E. 977; Todd v. Mackie, 160 N. C. 352, 76 S. E. 245; Allred v. Kirkman, 160 N. C. 392, 76 S. E. 244; Worley v. Logging Co., 157 N. C. 490, 73 S. E. 107. Those cases apply directly to the exception taken in this case, for, upon such a motion as one for a nonsuit, we must see what appears in the evidence, so that we may adjudge for ourselves whether the motion was well based. Besides, even the exception does not state from whose evidence the alleged fact appeared, and if from the defendant's alone, the motion was properly overruled. We accept the evidence as true upon such a motion, and view it in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, rejecting so much as is unfavorable to her, because the jury might do that very thing if the case were submitted to them. Morton v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 54, 67 S. E. 67; West v. Tanning Co., 154 N. C. 44, 69 S. E. 687.

[2] The court, on a motion for nonsuit, can only consider the plaintiff's evidence, and so much of the defendant's as is favorable to him or supports his case. Shives v. Eno Cotton Mills, 151 N. C. 290, 68 S. E. 141; Brittain v. Westhall, 135 N. C. 492, 47 S. E. 616; Daniel v. Railroad Co., 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 816, 67 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 718; Biles v. Railroad Co., 139 N. C. 528, 52 S. E. 129. Defendant, as is attempted here, cannot state evidence in his exception, not appearing in the case, and then demur to it or ask for a nonsuit, or a dismissal of the case.

But, if we should consider the verdict, though this is not permissible, the same result would follow. We get no more definite information from it than we do from the motion for a nonsuit, or from the other parts of the record. It finds that the defendant is now (at the time of the trial) an inmate of the asylum, but there is nothing in the verdict to show how long he has been there, or when he first became insane, or whether he has been continuously insane, and, if so, during what length of time. The record is entirely devoid of such information as we should have to decide the question intended to be presented, but which is not properly raised. We must therefore refuse to reverse the judgment, and grant a new trial.

If the plaintiff had asked us to do so, we would have dismissed the appeal for want of a brief for the defendant. 174 N. C. 837, 81 S. E. xii, rule 34. But she did not do so, and we have considered the case on its legal merits.

No error.

MORRIS v. KRAMER BROS. CO. (No. 16.)

1. Trial  $\Leftrightarrow$  29(3)—Reflections by judge on witness at any time during trial error.

It is error for a judge, at any time during a trial, to cast reflections on a witness tending to discredit him, under Revisal 1905, § 535; C. S. § 564, although such statute refers in terms to intimations and opinions by a judge in the charge.

2. Trial  $\Leftrightarrow$  29(3)—Questioning ethics of witness during trial error.

A dialogue between a judge and witness, wherein it appeared that judge was questioning the ethics of action of witness, as an attorney from another state, in obtaining a release within the state, was erroneous and prejudicial, under Revisal 1905, § 535; C. S. § 564.

3. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$  1046(5) — Error of judge in criticizing witness held not cured by attempt to correct.

Where judge in dialogue with witness criticized him by questioning the ethics of the witness, as an attorney from another state, in obtaining a release within the state, the error was not cured by an attempt on the part of the judge to correct the error by telling the jury that they were not to consider the matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Allen, Judge.

Action by William Morris against the Kramer Bros. Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

This action was brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Plaintiff had been employed by the defendant to work in his sawmill, and was engaged, at the time of his injury, on the platform in loading sawed lumber upon trucks preparatory to hauling it to the dry kilns, or to the yard of the mill. The lumber was brought to the platform by a chain or conveyor, and, while so performing his duties, he was knocked from the platform by a heavy board, which had fallen from the conveyor, and injured. Plaintiff alleged negligence in several particulars. Defendant answered and denied that there was any negligence on their part, and pleaded assumption of risks and contributory negligence.

There was much evidence taken upon the questions of negligence, contributory negligence, and assumption of risks, and exceptions entered to rulings, but they need not now be considered, as we are of the opinion that a material error was committed in another respect. Defendant pleaded that the plaintiff had executed a release to them from all damages growing out of said alleged injury, and Mr. Hoag, an attorney at law of Norfolk, Va., who procured the release, was examined at length, as a witness for the defendant, in regard to its execution, the plaintiff having alleged that the release was obtained by fraud or mistake. The following appears in the record of the case as to what occurred between the judge and the witness, during the redirect examinations of the witness Mr. Hoag:

At this point his honor, the jury being present, announced that he wanted to ask the witness a question, and did so as follows:

"Q. You say you are a lawyer in Virginia?

A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is it in accordance with your idea of professional ethics in Virginia for a lawyer to go to a man and approach him, if he has not brought any lawsuit, and get written statements from him? A. Absolutely so. We do not approach him if he has employed a lawyer first, but if he has not we do that quite frequently. It is considered ethical.

"Q. I wish you would show me one of the rules."

To all the foregoing questions by the court, the defendant, in apt time, objected. Objection overruled, and defendant excepts. His honor continued:

"I would like to see the ethics for my own information. Is it ethical for a lawyer of one state to go into another state and prepare a case when he is not licensed in that state? A. We have done that so frequently in Virginia without any question of the bar, just as a matter of information so I could make a settlement. I came here to ascertain the facts."

To the foregoing questions by the court, the defendant, in apt time, objected. Objection overruled, and defendant excepts. The court continues:

"I don't want the jury to be prejudiced against the witness on account of my asking these questions. It is so unusual for a lawyer from another state to come into the state, doing professional work, that I wanted to see what standard he was governed by.

"Q. You don't practice in this state? A. No, sir.

"I think it is the duty of the court to look into those matters and protect anything wrong going on, but I don't see anything wrong going on in this case. I think it is proper for the court to inquire, but the jury is not to consider it at all; it is a matter between witness and court, and he being a lawyer."

To the foregoing questions and statements by the court, the defendant, in apt time, objected. Objection overruled, and defendant excepts.

This dialogue between the judge and the witness was duly and specially excepted to by the defendant as it progressed, and has been assigned as error by it.

There was a verdict, followed by a judgment, for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

Hughes, Little & Seawell, of Norfolk, Va., and W. A. Worth, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). We will repeat here what we said in Bank v. McArthur, 168 N. C. 48, at page 52, 84 S. E. 39, 40 (Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1054):

"We are of the opinion that the remark of the learned and unusually careful judge, in regard to calling [a certain witness] should not have been made, and was calculated, as an intimation, if not a direct expression, of opinion upon the facts, to prejudice the plaintiff, and is forbidden by the statute, which provides: 'No judge, in giving a charge to the petit jury, either in a civil or criminal action, shall give an opinion as to whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, such matter being the true office and province of the jury; but he shall state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case, and declare and explain the law arising thereon.' There have been numerous decisions upon this statute, and this court has shown a fixed purpose to enforce it rigidly as it is written. There must be no indication of the judge's opinion upon the facts, to the hurt of either party, either directly or indirectly, by words or conduct. The judges should be punctilious to avoid it, and to obey the statutory injunction strictly. We are absolutely sure that they fully desire to do so, and their occasional expressions which have come before this court for review and held to be violations of the statute have evidently been inadvertent, but none the less harmful. The evil impression when once made upon the jury becomes well-nigh ineradicable. Judge Manly, who was one of the most eminent and just of our judges, said in State v. Dick, 60 N. C. 440: 'He [the presiding judge] endeavored to obviate the effect of his opinion by announcing in distinct terms the jury's independence of him, but this was not practicable for him to do. The opinion had been expressed and was incapable of being recalled. The object [of the statute] is not to inform the jury of their province, but to guard them against any invasion of it. The division of our courts of record into two departments—the one for the judging of the law, the other for the judging of the facts—is a matter lying on the surface of our judicature, and is known to everybody. It was not information on this subject the Legislature intended to furnish, but their purpose was to lay down an inflexible rule of practice, that the judge of the law should not undertake to decide the facts. If he cannot do so directly, he cannot indirectly; if not explicitly, he cannot by innuendo. What we take to be the inadvertence of the judge, therefore, was not cured of its illicit character by the information which he immediately conveyed. The error is one of the casualties which may happen to the most circumspect in the progress of a trial on the circuit. When once committed, however, it was irrevocable, and the prisoner was entitled to have his case tried by another jury.' And to the same effect did Justice Hoke speak in State v. Cook, 162 N. C. 586, citing and approving S. v. Dick: 'The learned and usually careful judge was evidently conscious that he had probably and by inadvertence prejudiced the prisoner's case, for he added: "But the court has no right to express an opinion about the case," but the forbidden impression had already been made, and as to the vital portion of the prisoner's plea, and on authority, the attempted correction by his honor must be held inefficient for the purpose.' So in State v. Ownby, 146 N. C. at p. 678, we said: 'The slightest intimation from a judge as to the strength of the evidence or as to the credibility of a witness will always have great weight with the jury, and therefore we must be careful to see that neither party is unduly prejudiced by an expression from the bench which is likely to prevent a fair and impartial trial.' And again in the same case: 'We know that his honor unguardedly commented upon the testimony of the witnesses, but when the prejudicial remark is made inadvertently, it invalidates the verdict as much so as if used intentionally. The probable effect or influence upon the jury, and not the motive of the judge, determines whether the party whose right to a fair trial has thus been impaired is entitled to another trial.' Like views and cautionary requests to the judges were stated in Withers v. Lane, 144 N. C. 184, as follows: 'The learned and able judge who presided at the trial, inspired, no doubt, by a laudable motive and a profound sense of justice, was perhaps too zealous that what he conceived to be right should prevail; but just here the law, conscious of the frailty of human nature at its best, both on the bench and in the jury box, intervenes and imposes its restraint upon the judge, enjoining strictly that he shall not in any manner sway the jury by imparting to them the slightest knowledge of his opinion of the case.' The case of Perry v. Perry, 144 N. C. 330, repeats this injunction to observe the mandate of the statute, for it is there said: 'Any remarks by the presiding judge, made in the presence of the jury, which have a tendency to prejudice their minds against the unsuccessful party, will afford ground for a reversal of the judgment.' It is very strongly and urgently reiterated in Park v. Exum, 156 N. C. at page 228, as follows: 'The court has always been swift to enforce obedience to our law which forbids a presiding judge to express an opinion on the disputed facts of the trial, and under numerous decisions construing the statute we must hold this remark of his honor, in the presence of the jury and before the verdict, to be reversible error.'"

We have cited these cases in order to show how very carefully this court has guarded the rights of parties under the statute. Revisal 1905, § 535; Consol. Statutes, § 564. There are other and more recent cases in which reflections by the presiding judge upon a witness have been followed by reversals, and the attention of the judges directed to the language and meaning of this important statute, and among others are Chance v. Ice Co., 166 N. C. 495, 82 S. E. 845, State v. Rogers, 173 N. C. 755, 91 S. E. 854, L. R. A. 1917E, 857, and Ray v. Patterson, 165 N. C. 512, 81 S. E. 773, and in some of those decisions the disparagement of the witness was not so pronounced, and certainly less harmful, than was the language of the judge in this case.

[1,2] It was considered so essential to protect the right of trial by jury that the statute was broadly worded, and was among the earliest of our remedial enactments, and, while it refers, in terms, to the charge, it has always been construed as including the expression of any opinion, or even an intimation of the judge, at any time during the trial, calculated to prejudice either of the parties. Park v. Exum, 156 N. C. 228, 72 S. E. 309; Withers v. Lane, 144 N. C. 184, 56 S. E. 855; State v. Dick, 60 N. C. 440, 86 Am. Dec. 439; Pell's Revisal, § 535.

[3] The learned and just judge attempted to correct the error into which he fell by the remarks he made and the criticism of Mr. Hoag, and his conduct as an attorney acting in behalf of his client, but there is nothing better settled by our cases than that he cannot do so, for the harm is ineradicable. State v. Dick, supra; State v. Cook, supra. When the damage is once done, it cannot be repaired, because, as we know, the baneful impression on the minds of the jury remains there still. What a judge says in condemnation of a witness is generally fatal to the party in whose behalf he testifies. The witness stands before the jury, not only impeached, but thoroughly discredited. What the judge says in disparagement of him counts for far more than witnesses or counsel may utter against him. It would be dangerous to hold otherwise. There are other cases than State v. Dick, supra, and State v. Cook, supra, in which this court has held that the impeachment of a witness, emanating from the judge, becomes so deep-seated in the minds of the jury, as to be beyond the reach of the judge, however much he may endeavor to counteract its evil influence, and it will, at least, leave the party once prejudiced by it so completely handicapped as to prevent that fair and impartial trial which the law guarantees to him and to which he is justly entitled. One word of untimely rebuke of his witness may so cripple a party and blast his prospects in the case, as to leave him utterly helpless before the jury.

It must not be understood that we think that the judge was at all sensible, at the time, of the effect of his remarks upon the jury, for we know that he was not, and that they were made inadvertently and unconsciously. The case then is brought directly within the language of this court quoted from Withers v. Lane, supra. For the judge even to intimate that the conduct of the witness, an attorney, was unprofessional and unethical was undoubtedly calculated to prejudice the defendant, whatever in the way of explanation or atonement of it he may have said afterwards and however praiseworthy the motive or intention of the judge may have been. The enforcement of a moral principle, when time and occasion call for it, is highly commendable, but the statute does not permit it to be done from the bench, when the rights of one of the parties may be seriously impaired, if not destroyed, by it. We close this branch of the discussion with what was said by the court in Chance v. Ice Co., 166 N. C. 495, at page 497, 82 S. E. 845, 846:

"We are quite sure that it was not intended to prejudice the defendant's case by the able and painstaking judge who tried this case, but it undoubtedly was well calculated to prejudice the jury against that particular witness, and was practically an expression of opinion upon the part of the judge as to the credibility of such witness."

To the same effect is the language of the Chief Justice in Ray v. Patterson, 165 N. C. 512, 81 S. E. 773.

As the case must go back for another trial, it is not necessary to discuss the other questions raised. We may, however, say that there appears to be some evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, and the references to the insurance company, in one phase of the case, were relevant, though they may, in some respects, have gone too far.

We order a new trial, for the error of the judge in his remarks to Mr. Hoag, defendant's witness.

New trial.

KANNAN et al. v. ASSAD. (No. 64.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Estoppel §68(2) — Admissions made by party during trial cannot be withdrawn after verdict.

Where party, during trial and before verdict, solemnly made certain admissions, he should not be permitted to withdraw the admissions after verdict.

2. Landlord and tenant §310(1) — Judgment declaring forfeiture of lease held sufficiently supported by findings.

In a summary proceeding in ejectment, where the issue, "Did defendant fail to perform on his part the terms of said contract?" was answered in the affirmative, and the parties conceded at the trial that such failure to perform would constitute a breach forfeiting the lease, a judgment declaring forfeiture was supported without a recital therein that forfeiture resulted from the breach.

3. Trial §343 — Verdict interpreted by reference to pleadings, evidence, admissions, and charge.

The verdict of a jury may be given significance and correctly interpreted by reference to the pleadings, evidence, admissions of the parties, and the charge of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by Charles Kannan and others against H. Assad. From judgment for plaintiffs, and from refusal to enter contrary judgment on the verdict, defendant appeals. No error.

Summary proceedings in ejectment tried originally before a justice of the peace, and then de novo upon appeal in the superior court, where the following verdict was rendered by the jury :

"(1) Did plaintiff and defendant enter into a contract for the rental of the property in question for a term of three years beginning February 25, 1921? A. Yes.

"(2) Did defendant, Assad, fail to perform on his part the terms of said contract? A. Yes.

"(3) What is the reasonable rental value per month of the property? A. $20."

As bearing upon the meaning and sufficiency of the issues, the following appears in the record :

"At the close of the testimony, attorneys for both plaintiffs and defendant and the court indulged in some discussion as to the proper issues to be submitted. During the course of the discussion it was conceded by attorneys for both plaintiffs and defendant that, if the jury should find that the plaintiffs and defendant did enter into a contract for the rental of the property for a period of three years beginning February 25, 1921, and should further find that the defendant had failed on his part to do and perform the things that he had agreed to do as to the making of the repairs, such breach on the part of the defendant, Assad, would constitute a forfeiture of the rental contract. The whole case was tried upon the theory that, if the jury should find that the contract was entered into, as they did find, and should further find that the defendant had failed to perform on his part, as the jury did find, then such failure would constitute a breach of contract. Counsel for both plaintiffs and defendant conceded this position before the court, and in the argument of the case before the jury. It was only after the jury had returned the verdict that any point was made by the defendant that he was entitled to judgment upon the verdict."

From a judgment declaring the lease forfeited, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to the immediate possession of the premises, and from his honor's refusal to enter a contrary judgment on the verdict, the defendant appealed.

O. P. Dickinson, of Wilson, for appellant.
W. A. Finch, of Wilson, and Connor & Hill, of Wilson, for appellees.

STACY, J. We do not think the defendant is entitled to a judgment on the verdict in view of the admissions and concessions made in open court, and before the rendition of the verdict. The case was tried on a different theory, with a different understanding, and it would seem that the defendant ought to be content with the result.

[1] It is well understood that, except in proper instances, a party to a suit should not be allowed to change his position with respect to a material matter during the course of litigation, nor should he be allowed to "blow hot and cold in the same breath." Ingram v. Power Co., 181 N. C. 359, 107 S. E. 209; Lindsey v. Mitchell, 174 N. C. 458, 93 S. E. 955. A fortiori, after a verdict has been rendered against him, he should not be permitted to withdraw his admissions solemnly made on trial. This would not be conducive to the ending of litigation, a policy much favored in the law. Webb v. Rosemond, 172 N. C. 848, 90 S. E. 306; Coble v. Barringer, 171 N. C. 445, 88 S. E. 518, L. R. A. 1916E, 901.

[2] His honor might well have found as a fact, and embodied it in his judgment, that an affirmative answer to the second issue was conceded to mean, and admittedly would work, a forfeiture of the lease. This would have cured any apparent irregularity. But we think the judgment is supported by the record, and is entirely sufficient without such finding being incorporated therein.

"He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not," is promised an abiding place, from whence he "shall never be moved" (Psalm xv), but the present defendant apparently has not brought himself within the protection vouchsafed to this class. He invokes the promise, and asks not to be moved, because he has spoken to his own hurt, but he seems unwilling to comply with the steadfast or "changeth not" condition.

After a careful consideration of the defendant's exceptions and assignments of error, we conclude that the judgment of the superior court must be upheld; and it is so ordered.

No error.

In re HAMILTON. (No. 23.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Infants  $\S$  16—Irregular transfer of cause by superior court immaterial where case was later heard by it on appeal from juvenile court.

Under O. S. § 5039 et seq., providing that the superior court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in case of a child less than 16 years of age whose custody is the subject of controversy, and that the clerk of the superior court shall be judge of the juvenile court, and allowing an appeal from the juvenile court to the superior court, a judge of the superior court has authority to hear a dispute over the custody of such child either on institution of proceedings therein or on appeal from the juvenile court, and an irregularity of an order of the superior court transferring cause to the juvenile court makes no material difference, where it was heard by the superior court on appeal.

2. Infants  $\S$  16—Superior court has authority to review findings of fact and the judgment of its clerk sitting as a judge of juvenile court.

The superior court has authority to review findings and judgment of the clerk sitting as a judge of the juvenile court.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$  1010(1)—Findings of fact of superior court made on competent evidence held binding on appellate court.

Findings of fact made by a judge of the superior court found on competent evidence are conclusive on the appellate court.

4. Habeas corpus  $\S$  99(3)—Right of father to custody of infant child held not an absolute right.

Although prima facie a parent has a right to the custody of his child in preference to others, this right is not absolute, and must yield when the best interest of the child requires it.

5. Habeas corpus  $\S$  99(5)—Findings of fact held to warrant refusal to award custody of child to his father.

Where the trial court found as facts that the father of the child was not a fit, suitable, or proper person to have care or custody of it, and that the child was afflicted by spinal trouble, requiring treatment by specialist, and that its grandparents, who had it, were able and willing to provide this treatment, and were proper persons to have the custody of the child, and that its father had practically abandoned it, a refusal to award custody of the child to its father will be sustained.

Walker, J., dissents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Allen, Judge.

In the matter of the custody of Rosa Gray Hamilton, an infant. Petition for writ of habeas corpus by R. H. Hamilton against George D. Davis and wife. From a judgment for respondents, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to determine the right to the custody of a child then about 15 months of age. The petition was filed before one of the judges of the superior court, who transferred the same to the juvenile court. The judge of the juvenile court heard the affidavits and evidence, and made his findings of fact, and adjudged that the petitioner, who is the father of the child, was entitled to her custody. The respondents, who are the maternal grandparents of the child, appealed to the judge of the superior court, who heard the evidence and affidavits, and reversed the findings and order of the clerk, and adjudged that the respondents were entitled to the custody of the child. The following are the facts found by his honor, and his order thereon:

"(1) That the petitioner, R. H. Hamilton, in November, 1917, married Aleen Davis, daughter of respondents, George D. Davis and Bettie Davis, against the will of her parents, and that, in the fall of 1918, the infant, Rosa Gray Hamilton, was born. That in January, 1919, the said Aleen Hamilton contracted influenza, and in February, 1919, was carried, at her request, by the said R. H. Hamilton, her husband, to the home of respondents, the father and mother of Aleen Hamilton, where she and her child, Rosa Gray Hamilton, then 4 months of age, remained, the said Aleen Hamilton continuing in poor health and requiring care and medical attention. That, following influenza, and as a consequence thereof, the said Aleen Hamilton developed tuberculosis, and on December 26, 1919, died at the home of her parents.

"(2) That during the time the said Aleen Hamilton and her infant child, Rosa Gray Hamilton, were at the home of her parents, the respondents herein, the said R. H. Hamilton, petitioner, furnished nothing for the support and maintenance, medicine, or medical attention of said Aleen Hamilton or the infant child, with the exception of one bottle of Wampole's Cod Liver Oil and a small quantity of fresh meat, both of which were furnished in February, 1919, notwithstanding the request of said Aleen Hamilton of her husband, the said R. H. Hamilton, that he contribute to the support of her and their child, nor did he visit them after February, nor show the personal attention which indicated any interest in them and their welfare, living at the time not more than one mile away, and that his conduct and attitude during the year 1919 constituted an abandonment of his wife and child.

"(3) That on the 6th day of August, 1919, the said Aleen Hamilton, wife of petitioner, realizing that she could not live, made her last will and testament, which was prepared by her in her own handwriting, and without suggestion or influence from others, wherein she directed that her child, Rosa Gray Hamilton, be left in the care, custody, and jurisdiction of George Davis and Bettie Davis, the respondents, during their lifetime, and at their death to her sister, Ina Davis, which is set out in the record.

ary, 1919, until the death of Aleen Hamilton, respondents, George D. Davis and Bettie Davis, provided for and supported the said Aleen Hamilton, providing for her medical attention and medicine, and paying all of her funeral expenses, except $25 on a coffin, upon which the respondents paid $75, and the petitioner paid $25.

"(5) That the respondents rent a comfortable home in the town of Pantego, have educated all of their children in the Pantego High School, their two daughters having held certificates as teachers. That respondents are members of the Christian Church, and are people of good character, and able to provide for the tuition and education of the said infant child, Rosa Gray Hamilton.

"(6) That the said Rosa Gray Hamilton is afflicted with spinal trouble, requiring the treatment of a specialist, and respondents are ready, able, and willing to provide this treatment for the child, and have frequently offered and endeavored to do so since this cause has been pending.

"(7) That the petitioner, R. H. Hamilton, is 35 years of age, has no property, and is unthrifty; and should said infant child be awarded to him, it will be in effect awarding her to the custody of his father and mother, at whose home he lives, while, if the custody of the child is left with George D. Davis and Bettie Davis, the parents of the dead mother, she would have the advantage not only of the care of her maternal grandmother and grandfather, but also of the sister of the dead mother, Ina Davis, whom the court finds to be a young woman of character, refinement, and education, and whose influence will be an advantage to said infant in her upbringing.

"(8) That the petitioner, R. H. Hamilton, is not a fit, suitable, or proper person to have the care and custody of this infant girl child, now a little more than 2 years of age, and that the best interest and welfare of the said child will be subserved by leaving her in the custody and care of respondents; and it is so ordered. The order of the clerk is reversed."

From this judgment, awarding the custody of the child to the respondents, the petitioner appealed.

Tooley & McMullan, of Belhaven, for appellant.

Ward & Grimes and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, all of Washington, N. C., for appellees.

STACY, J. [1] The juvenile court act (C. S. 5039 et seq.) provides that the superior courts shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of any case of a child less than 16 years of age "whose custody is subject to controversy." By this same law, juvenile courts are established as separate parts of the superior courts for the administration of the act, and the clerk of the superior court of each county is made the judge of the juvenile court. It is also provided in a later section that the term "court," when used without modification, shall refer to the juvenile court, and that an appeal may be taken from any judgment or order of the juvenile court to the superior court. It thus appears that the act confers jurisdiction upon the superior courts, and that the juvenile courts, as separate parts (but not necessarily as independent parts) of the superior courts of the district, have been created and organized for the administration of the law and for the hearing of matters and causes arising thereunder. State v. Coble, 181 N. C. 554, 107 S. E. 132. Again, in State v. Burnett, 179 N. C. 740, 102 S. E. 711, it was held that the act—

"creates no limitations on the jurisdiction of the superior court in these cases which, under the first sections of the act and by virtue of its powers, as a court of general jurisdiction administering both law and equity, may always, on proper application and appropriate writs, make inquiry and investigations into the status and conditions of children disposed of under the statute, and make such orders and decrees therein as the right and justice of the case may require."

This supervision and oversight of the superior courts, of course, should be exercised in an orderly way, by appeal from the juvenile court, where such is provided by the statute, and otherwise by appropriate writ, where no appeal is available.

Assuming this to be the proper interpretation of the law, we need not consider the regularity of the order transferring or sending the petition to the juvenile court for original investigation. This could have no effect upon the jurisdiction of the superior court, nor would it make any material difference, for, when the matter again reached the judge of the superior court, he had ample authority to hear the case, either because it was properly instituted in the first instance, or by virtue of the appeal from the juvenile court. Therefore, viewing it in any light, the case was competently before the superior court in the last instance for final adjudication.

[2] His honor also had authority to review the findings of fact and judgment of the clerk, which were under the supervision and control of the superior court. Mills v. McDaniel, 161 N. C. 112, 76 S. E. 551.

[3-5] The findings of fact made by the judge of the superior court, found, as they are, upon competent evidence, are also conclusive on us (Stokes v. Cogdell, 153 N. C. 181, 69 S. E. 65), and we must therefore base our judgment upon his findings, which amply sustain his order. We recognize fully the principle that prima facie the parent has the right to the custody of his child in preference to others, but that this right is not an absolute one and must yield when the best interest of the child requires it (In re Warren, 178 N. C. 43, 100 S. E. 76), and his honor has found as a fact that the petitioner "is not a fit, suitable, or proper person to have the care and custody of this infant girl, and that the best interest and welfare of the child will be subverted by leaving her in the custody and care of the respondents." He also finds that the child is afflicted in an unusual way by spinal trouble, requiring the treatment of a specialist, and that the respondents are ready, able, and willing to provide this treatment for the child, and have frequently offered and endeavored to do so, and that the petitioner had practically abandoned his family prior to the death of his wife.

Upon the record, the judgment of the superior court must be sustained.

Affirmed.

WALKER, J., dissents because the court did not have the requisite jurisdiction under the juvenile court statute, and further because, if it had such jurisdiction, there was not any evidence that justified the findings as to fact and law, or which should deprive the father of, or impair his preferential right to, the custody of his child. One of the most important and essential facts was not found by the court below, and the failure of the father to visit his wife and child, if there was such a failure, is fully explained by the testimony, which shows that it was not the father's fault, but the fault of those who now seek to retain the custody of the child. The right of the father, in my opinion, should be upheld upon the principle so often applied by us in such cases, when the father's natural right was recognized and enforced. Newsome v. Bunch, 144 N. C. 15, at page 18, 56 S. E. 509, 510. In that case, this court said (and it is strikingly applicable to the facts in this appeal):

"While the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may order the child into the custody of some person other than the father, when the facts and circumstances justify such a disposition of the child, we do not think that any such case is presented in this record as should induce us to adopt that course and except this case from the general rule. The father has done nothing by which he has incurred a forfeiture of his right to the custody of his offspring. There is no room for the exercise even of a sound discretion in favor of the grandparents who now have possession of the child. Speaking for himself, and not committing the court to his view, the writer of this opinion would hesitate to remove the child from its present custody if the law were more elastic, and we were vested with a larger discretion than is given by the law. We must follow the precedents and the general principles of justice established by them, though the result may be contrary to what we may consider as the real merits of the particular case, and though by the facts, even as found by the court, our sympathies may be enlisted in behalf of the grandparents. The insistence upon his strict right under the circumstances may not be very creditable to the petitioner, yet the law is inexorable in such a case, and cannot be made to yield in deference to a mere sentiment or to a tender regard for the feeling of one of the parties; nor, are we permitted to exercise an arbitrary discretion."

The Newsome Case has been frequently approved and affirmed. In re Jones, 153 N. C. 312, 69 S. E. 217, 138 Am. St. Rep. 670; In re Turner, 151 N. C. 474, 66 S. E. 431; In re Fain, 172 N. C. 790, 90 S. E. 928; Howell v. Solomon, 167 N. C. 588, 83 S. E. 609; Brickell v. Hines, 179 N. C. 254, 102 S. E. 309, where the cases are collected. See, also, Latham v. Ellis, 116 N. C. 30, 20 S. E. 1012.

The mother of this child is dead. The father is able to take care of the child, and, if the evidence is at all credible, is better able to do so than those to whom its custody has been awarded. It has been said by this court in the cases above cited that the parent has the preferred right of custody, and for cogent reasons, and in Brickell v. Hines, supra, by Justice Hoke, that this right, "being a natural and substantive right, may not be lightly denied or interfered with by action of the courts." It is true, as we have often held, that the welfare of the child deserves, and should have, consideration, but the court should proceed cautiously, and not deprive the father of his right except upon clear and strong evidence, which is not present in this case.

DUNCAN v. OVERTON et al. (No. 119.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⇨127(2) — Automobile owner's knowledge of use by son held to justify inference of consent.

In an action for injury caused by defendant's son in negligently operating the father's automobile, held, that an admission by answer that the son was driving his father's car with the knowledge of the father justifies the inference that it was done with the father's consent.

2. Master and servant ⇨305 — Automobile driver's deviation held not to release master.

A father, having placed his son in charge of an automobile to carry him to a college, and thence to a garage, is responsible for injuries accruing from the negligence of the son while in charge of the auto, and is not released therefrom by an incidental divergence in discharging the duty intrusted to the son before reaching the garage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Devin, Judge.

Action by Annie W. Duncan and husband against J. D. Overton and D. H. Overton. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant J. D. Overton appeals. Affirmed.

Little & Barnes, of Raleigh, for appellant. Manning, Bickett & Ferguson, of Raleigh, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. There are two exceptions; one that the court should have charged the jury as prayed; that if they believed the evidence they should answer the first issue "No" as to the defendant J. D. Overton. The other exception is that there should have been a nonsuit as to the defendant J. D. Overton. There is thus no question raised as to the negligence or the amount of the damages. The sole question is as to the liability of J. D. Overton, the owner of the machine, and the father of the other defendant, who was the driver whose negligence, as the jury find, was the cause of the injury.

In the second paragraph of the complaint it is alleged that—

"The defendant, J. D. Overton was the owner of the automobile which was being driven with his knowledge by his son, D. H. Overton, in the city of Raleigh, at the time hereinafter mentioned."

[1] This allegation is admitted in the answer. This admission that the minor defendant was driving the car with the knowledge of his father justifies the inference that it was done with his consent (Taylor v. Stewart, 172 N. C. 206, 90 S. E. 134), and indeed this case falls within the principle laid down in Tyree v. Tudor, 181 N. C. 214, 106 S. E. 675, in that his father admits that he authorized the son to use the car on this occasion. According to the defendant's evidence the father had directed his son to drive this car from Nashville to Raleigh, to carry himself and his luggage to the A. & E. College, and thereafter to take the car to the garage in Raleigh for repairs. The son testifies that he met some other college students at the Union Depot and was conveying them and their suitcases in the car to the college at the time the injury to the plaintiff occurred.

[2] The court instructed the jury:

"If you should find from the evidence that the defendant J. D. Overton, who was the owner of the car, only gave permission to his son to take the car to the garage for repairs directly after having gone to the college, and that his instructions in this respect were disobeyed by his son without the knowledge or consent of J. D. Overton, and that the son was not accustomed to drive the car without the express permission of J. D. Overton, then you would answer the first issue 'No' as to J. D. Overton; but if you should find from the evidence and the greater weight thereof that it was customary for the son to drive the car, or that at the time of the injury he was engaged in carrying out the father's instructions, then the defendant D. H. Overton would be the agent of the defendant J. D. Overton, and the said J. D. Overton would be liable for the acts of his agent; and if you should find from the evidence and the greater weight thereof that there was negligence, you would answer the issue 'Yes' as to both defendants."

There is no assignment of error to this charge, nor that it is not justified by the evidence. We do not think that the defendant has any cause to claim that he was prejudiced thereby. The case on appeal states that there was other evidence on the part of the plaintiff which the appellant does not set out in his case on appeal.

Indeed, we think the law is stricter against the defendant than as stated in the charge. The father, having placed his son in charge of the machine to bring it from Nashville to the A. & E. College at Raleigh, and thence to the garage, is responsible for injuries accruing from the negligence of his agent while in charge of the machine on that errand, and is not released therefrom by any incidental divergence in discharging the duty intrusted to him before the driver reached the garage, such as is testified to in this case.

NATIONAL BANK OF HOPEWELL v. CARSON. (No. 184.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$  1029—Exceptions overruled where chief controversy was determined by special finding of jury.

Where the chief controversy in suit on note was whether plaintiff was holder in due course and the jury specially found that he acquired the note in good faith, for value, before maturity, and without notice of any defect or failure of consideration, exceptions appearing in the record on appeal will be overruled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Devin, Judge.

Action by the National Bank of Hopewell against S. T. Carson. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Civil action to recover the face value of defendant's promissory note, executed and delivered to the Limestone Products Company, and, by the latter concern, sold and transferred to the plaintiff bank.

Upon denial of liability and issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the plaintiff acquire the note sued on, in good faith for value, before maturity, and without notice of any alleged defect or failure in consideration of said note? Ans. Yes.

"(2) What amount, if any, does the defendant owe on said note? Ans. $1,200 with interest."

From a judgment on the verdict in favor of plaintiff, the defendant appealed.

Julius Brown, of Greenville, for appellant. G. M. T. Fountain & Son, of Tarboro, and F. G. James & Son, of Greenville, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The controversy on trial in the superior court narrowed itself principally to the question as to whether the plaintiff was a holder in due course (C. S. § 3083) of the note sued on, under the doctrine announced in Bank v. Exum, 163 N. C. 199, 79 S. E. 498, and Worth Co. v. Feed Co., 172 N. C. 342, 90 S. E. 295. This fact having been established in plaintiff's favor by the jury's answer to the first issue, we think the exceptions appearing in the record must be overruled. The case presents no new point, or issue, which would seem to merit an extended discussion.

ROSE v. FREMONT WAREHOUSE & IMPROVEMENT CO. et al. (No. 120.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⇐195 — Owner's counterclaim against contractor and cross-complaint against architects held demurrable for misjoinder of parties and causes of action.

In contractor's action against owner for balance due on contract, owner's pleading, complaining that the building was improperly constructed, set up as a counterclaim against the contractor and as a cross-action against architects whose contract with owner provided merely for the preparation and delivery of the plans and specifications, without alleging privity of contract or community of interests between the contractor and architects, held demurrable; there being a misjoinder of both parties and causes of action.

2. Pleading ⇐218(1) — Court cannot order separation where there is misjoinder of both parties and causes of action.

Where there is a misjoinder of both parties and causes of action, the court on demurrer cannot order a separation or division under C. S. § 516.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by W. P. Rose against the Fremont Warehouse & Improvement Company, in which Benton & Benton were made parties and in which the defendant set up a pleading by way of cross-action and counterclaim, to which Benton & Benton demurred. Demurrer sustained, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action to recover the balance due on a building contract. Upon motion of the defendant, Fremont Warehouse & Improvement Company, the architects, Benton & Benton, who drew the plans and specifications for said buildings, were made parties defendant. The original defendant then answered, admitted the plaintiff's contract, but set up by way of cross-action and counterclaim the following:

"That by the terms of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and this defendant the plaintiff agreed to have said buildings constructed in a proper and workmanlike manner, which, as this defendant is informed and believes, he failed to do, in that the roof trusses of both of said tobacco warehouses were improperly constructed by the plaintiff, and that by reason of said defective construction the said trusses have buckled, thereby rendering the roofs of said warehouses unsafe and dangerous and thereby rendering said buildings defective and unworkmanlike in their construction; or that if the buckling of the trusses is not caused by improper and unworkmanlike construction by said plaintiff, it is due to the defective plans and specifications prepared and delivered by said defendants Benton & Benton; and that by reason of the said improper and unworkmanlike construction or by reason of the defective plans and specifications, or by reason of both the improper and unworkmanlike construction and the defective plans and specifications, this defendant is damaged in the sum of $20,000."

Benton & Benton demurred to this pleading upon the ground of a misjoinder of parties and causes of action. The demurrer was sustained, and the defendant, Fremont Warehouse & Improvement Company, appealed.

E. M. Land and Dickinson & Freeman, all of Goldsboro, for Fremont Warehouse & Improvement Co.

W. A. Lucas, of Wilson, and Langston, Allen & Taylor, of Goldsboro, for Benton & Benton.

STACY, J. [1] It will be observed from the allegations of the defendant's cross-action and counterclaim that the architects, who furnished the plans and specifications, did not undertake to superintend the erection and construction of the buildings. Their agreement called for the preparation and delivery of the plans and specifications and no more. The buildings were constructed by the plaintiff, but without assistance from or consultation with the architects. There is no allegation of any privity of contract or community of interests between the contractor and the architects. Indeed, they seem to have been employed at different times and for different purposes. Therefore the defendant's cross-action against Benton & Benton is based upon one contract, and its counterclaim against the plaintiff is founded upon another. The two causes of action are separate and distinct; they are set up against different parties, and they are incorporated in the same pleading. This is demurrable. Roberts v. Mfg. Co., 181 N. C. 204, 106 S. E. 664; Lee v. Thornton, 171 N. C. 200, 88 S. E. 232; Cromartie v. Parker, 121 N. C. 198, 28 S. E. 297; Quarry Co. v. Construction

Co., 151 N. C. 345, 66 S. E. 217, and cases cited.

The several causes of action which may be united or joined in the same complaint are classified and enumerated in C. S. § 507; and, in addition, the following limitation is expressly incorporated therein:

"But the causes of action so united must all belong to one of these classes, and, except in actions for the foreclosure of mortgages, must affect all the parties to the action, and not require different places of trial, and must be separately stated."

Under a proper interpretation of this section we think his honor's ruling, sustaining the demurrer, must be upheld.

[2] But it is contended that if the two causes of action have been improperly united in the same pleading, his honor should have ordered a separation or division under C. S. § 516. It is well settled, by a number of decisions, that this cannot be done where there is a misjoinder of both parties and causes of action. Roberts v. Mfg. Co., supra; Morton v. Tel. Co., 130 N. C. 299, 41 S. E. 484; Thigpen v. Cotton Mills, 151 N. C. 97, 65 S. E. 750; Campbell v. Power Co., 166 N. C. 488, 82 S. E. 842.

Upon the record, we think his honor was correct in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the defendant's cross-action as to Benton & Benton in this particular proceeding.

Affirmed.

McCALL et al. v. LEE, et al. (No. 221.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

Frauds, statute of — 108(5) — Petition of record on which judgment was entered held sufficient memorandum of contract.

Within C. Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Samuel Horace McCall, Jr. (who before adoption was Eugene Scott Lee), by his next friend, and others, against C. M.

Lee, administratrix, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. No error.

Lovett Lee died intestate in Duplin county, in March, 1916, leaving him surviving his widow, the defendant C. M. Lee, and seven children. The widow qualified as administratrix. She proposed to said children that, if they would convey to her the entire real and personal estate which they had inherited from their father, she would combine the same with her estate, and, putting the whole in hotchpotch, she would divide the whole of their father's estate combined with the greater part of her own estate (most of which had been conveyed to her by her husband by deeds of gift), and would make an equal division of both estates among the seven children. They accepted the offer, and all the children made her such conveyances by deed of gift for their shares in the real and personal estate of their father, except James Lovett Lee, who was a minor. As to him, she instituted a special proceeding in which she recited all the above facts in a petition signed and sworn to by her, and a commissioner was appointed, who made a conveyance upon these terms to his mother, upon the promise and agreement that she would in turn combine her husband's estate with the greater part of her own estate (acquired largely from her husband) and make an equal division of both estates among her said children, and make deeds to each of them for one-seventh thereof.

Thereupon C. M. Lee, the mother, in accordance with said contract, made a deed to each of her said children except her son Harry B. Lee (who was the first one to convey to her his interest in his father's estate, in pursuance of her proposition) for an equal share, and thereby carried out in good faith her agreement with all her children except with Harry B. Lee.

After her son Harry B. Lee made his deed to his mother on May 28, 1918, he married on June 10, 1918, and died in October, 1918, leaving the plaintiff Clara E. Lee, his widow, and an infant son, Eugene Scott Lee, who is represented in this action by his next friend, his grandfather, Horace McCall. C. M. Lee refused to execute a deed to said Harry before his death, or to his widow and son after his death (it is alleged because she was displeased with his marriage), but, in violation of the contract with Harry, she retained all his share in the real and personal estate of his father, and has deprived Harry and his widow and son of the share in his father's estate, which he conveyed to her, and also of any share in hers.

The jury found on the issue submitted to them in accordance with the above statements of fact. All the brothers and sisters were made parties defendant, and the administrator of Harry B. Lee was also a party plaintiff. Judgment accordingly, and the defendants appeal.

Stevens, Beasley & Stevens, of Warsaw, and Fowler & Crumpler, of Clinton, for appellants.

Butler & Herring, of Clinton, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The following issue was submitted to the jury:

"Was the deed dated August 28, 1918, from Harry B. Lee to C. M. Lee made in pursuance of a contract and agreement that, when the children of her deceased husband, Lovett Lee, should convey to her their respective interests in the real and personal estate of her deceased husband, thereby combining her estate with her husband's estate, she would then in turn, make deed to her children and each of them for a one-seventh of her husband's estate, together with the greater portion of her own individual estate?"

To which the jury responded "Yes."

The judgment, reciting the uncontradicted evidence and admissions in the pleadings, adjudged that—

"the plaintiffs recover of the defendants, as their interest may appear, one-seventh undivided interest in the real estate of Lovett Lee, deceased, at the time of his death, and that the plaintiffs also recover of the defendant such share or portion of the estate of the defendant C. M. Lee as of the date of the contract and agreement, entered into between the said C. M. Lee and her children, as will give to the plaintiffs, as the real and personal representatives of Harry B. Lee, deceased, one-seventh interest in her said estate, or a share equal in value in real and personal property, or cash, to that heretofore conveyed by her to each of her other children, as shown by the several deeds executed by her to them on April 1, 1919, as fully set out in the complaint in this action."

The judgment further provides that—

"The deeds made by and between C. M. Lee and the other defendants, her children, in parceling out said estate, in so far as they may conflict with the provisions of this judgment, shall be set aside and declared inoperative and void as between the parties to this action."

The decree further recites:

"It having been, in the trial of this action, agreed between the parties plaintiffs and defendants that this trial should be limited to ascertaining only the liability and rights of the parties, and not the specific amount and character of the plaintiffs' recovery, * * * this cause shall be retained upon the docket for the purpose of ascertaining the value of plaintiffs' recovery against the defendants and the method of ascertaining the amount and kind of such recovery and investing the plaintiffs with the title and possession of same."

The chief defense, and indeed the only one that requires consideration, is the plea of the statute of frauds; the defendants contending that the above agreement was oral and therefore invalid. We pass by as unnecessary to consider, in view of the other evidence, the question whether by the conveyance by Harry B. Lee to his mother upon the terms ascertained by the verdict she did not receive the property conveyed by Harry B. Lee on a verbal trust to be held by her according to said agreement. The plaintiffs put in evidence the petition filed by C. M. Lee in the superior court for the conveyance of the property of said James Lovett Lee, her minor son, which petition was duly subscribed and sworn to by her and filed in said cause and contains as a recital the facts above stated, and particularly the following:

"(4) That the said C. M. Lee, petitioner, is owner in her own right of a very valuable landed estate, located in both Duplin and Sampson counties, and since the death of her said husband she has proposed to her children, all of whom are of full age except the said James Lovett Lee, that, if they would make over to her a conveyance and bill of sale for their entire interests in the real and personal estate of the said husband so as to combine the estate of her husband with her own, she would then in turn make deeds to her children for the greater part of her individual estate as well as all of the landed estate of her said husband, and with the view of effectuating this division and disposition of the estate of her said intestate husband all of his said heirs and distributees who are of full age have already conveyed and set over to the said C. M. Lee their entire interests in the real and personal estate of the said Lovett Lee, deceased, and in further pursuance of said proposed plan for said division the said C. M. Lee and the heirs of said Lovett Lee have procured an appraisal to be made of all the lands of the said Lovett Lee, deceased, and all the lands of said C. M. Lee owned by her individually, said appraisal having been made by one O. M. Lee a brother of Lovett Lee, deceased, and L. A. Byrd, of Mt. Olive, both of whom are men of ripe experience in the buying and selling of real estate and the present market value thereof."

The petition further recites the valuation of aforesaid real and personal property and adds:

"The said C. M. Lee now proposes to make a deed of conveyance to the said James Lovett Lee, however, reserving the life estate therein to herself of the land appraised by the said O. M. Lee and L. A. Byrd, upon condition that the court will approve a conveyance to the said C. M. Lee of all the interests of said minor son in the estate of his deceased father," describing the property and asking that a commissioner be appointed to execute said deed for her minor son to herself.

Thereupon the decree of the court was made in accordance with the petition, reciting the above agreement for the conveyance by the children to their mother of their interest in their father's estate, and directing the commissioner to make a deed for the interest of said minor son upon condition that she will convey to him a good and sufficient deed for one-seventh of the combined property in pursuance of said agreement.

This, omitting unnecessary details in the petition and the decree in conformity thereto, is a complete statement of the transaction. The statute of frauds which is relied upon to defeat the very just claim of the plaintiffs is to be found in C. S. § 988, and so much thereof as bears upon this controversy reads as follows:

"All contracts to sell or convey any lands, tenements or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, * * * shall be void unless said contract, or some memorandum or note thereof, be put in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some other person by him thereto lawfully authorized."

The above petition, duly signed, is also sworn to, and is solemnly filed in a petition by C. M. Lee, and there is judgment upon it entered of record, which judgment was procured at her instance. It is not possible for a "memorandum" to be more complete and explicit than is made in this case, or more solemnly, having been signed and sworn to and made a record of the court, and a judgment at the instance and by the procurement of the said C. M. Lee having been entered thereon.

It would be difficult to add anything in support of this very clear instance of compliance with the memorandum required by said statute. We have many cases in this state, among them Mizell v. Burnett, 49 N. C. 249, 69 Am. Dec. 744, which says that it has always been held that letters addressed to third parties stating and affirming a contract may be used against the writer as sufficient memorandum of it, and that such writings are sufficient evidence of the contract to warrant the court in giving effect to it. This is also held in Nicholson v. Dover, 145 N. C. 18, 58 S. E. 444, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 167.

The written memorandum may be made subsequent to the time of making the contract. Magee v. Blankenship, 95 N. C. 563; Winslow v. White 163 N. C. 29, 79 S. E. 258. In 2 Elliott on Contract, 546, 547, § 312, it is said:

"The form of the memorandum is not material so long as it is sufficient to comply with the requirements of the statute. * * * Any document signed by the party to be charged containing the terms of the contract will suffice, as a letter to a third party, a will, or an affidavit in a different matter."

Neither the defendant C. M. Lee nor any of the other defendants denied or introduced any evidence to explain the execution of the deeds made to her and by her to her children, nor to contradict the terms of the contract between her and her children as set out in the petition signed and sworn to and filed by her in the aforesaid petition, and recited in the judgment procured by her upon said statement, and filed of record in said county. The marriage of said Harry B. Lee and the birth of issue in no wise contradicted or modified the terms of said agreement. His widow and son and his administrator, the son appearing by his next friend, stand in his shoes and are entitled to all the benefits in the performance of said contract which he would have been entitled to claim and enforce if he were still living.

GODWIN v. GARDNER. (No. 101.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

Pleading  $\Leftarrow$  216(2)—Matters of defense or is bar not considered on dismissal.

Matters set up in defense or as a bar to the plaintiff's suit and requiring proof may not be considered upon a demurrer to the complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by J. W. Godwin against J. D. Gardner. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Civil action founded on contract and growing out of a certain promissory note and mortgage executed by the defendant and delivered to the plaintiff on June, 19, 1915. As an ancillary remedy, plaintiff seized the mortgaged property and took same into his possession under a writ of claim and delivery at the time of issuing summons. Jenkins & Boyette subsequently intervened and claimed title to said property by virtue of a prior mortgage, antedating that of the plaintiff. Upon the execution of a bond the property was turned over to the interveners.

The defendant filed no answer, but the interveners replied and set up, as an affirmative defense, that since the institution of this action the defendant had been adjudged a bankrupt and, upon order of the federal court, the mortgaged property had been turned over to the trustee in bankruptcy. It was further alleged, in bar of the plaintiff's right to recover, that all the assets of the defendant, J. D. Gardner, had been administered in said court—the plaintiff and other creditors being paid their pro rata part, according to their respective priorities—and that the defendant had been duly granted his full discharge by the bankrupt court.

Upon motion, there was a judgment as of nonsuit entered on the pleadings. Plaintiff appealed.

Roswell C. Bridger, of Winton, and S. Brown Shepherd and N. G. Fonville, both of Raleigh, for appellant.

STACY, J. While it is stated in the record that a judgment of nonsuit was entered on the pleadings, we will assume that the action was dismissed on a demurrer ore tenus. But, in either view, the judgment was erroneous.

Matters set up in defense, or as a bar to the plaintiff's suit, and requiring proof, may not be considered upon a demurrer. Wood v. Kincaid, 144 N. C. 393, 57 S. E. 4.

A good cause of action is stated in the complaint; hence, the judgment of the superior court must be set aside and the parties will proceed as they may be advised. The other questions, discussed in plaintiff's brief, are not before us for decision.

KERR et al. v. DRAKE et al. (No. 230.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  798—Failure of appellees' counsel to inform appellants' counsel of intention to move for dismissal not waiver of right to dismissal.

The failure of appellees' attorney to inform appellants' counsel, while discussing the case following appellants' failure to file transcript of record within the required time, that appellees would move to dismiss the appeal under Supreme Court Rule 17 (66 S. E. vii), was not a waiver of the right to move for such dismissal.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$  798—Appellants not entitled to notice of motion to dismiss for failure to file transcript of record within time.

Appellees, entitled under Supreme Court Rule 17 (66 S. E. vii) to move for dismissal of appeal because of appellants' failure to file transcript of record within the required time, was not required to give appellants notice of such motion.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$  564(3)—Statutory requirements as to making up case must be strictly complied with.

The statutory requirements as to making up cases on appeal must be strictly complied with, except when there is an agreement to extend the time, in which case the proceeding must be taken within the time so extended.

4. Appeal and error  $\S$  784—Appeal dismissed for noncompliance with statutory requirements.

The right to appeal is not an absolute right, but is only given upon the compliance with the requirements of the statute, and when requirements are not observed the appeal will be dismissed unless sufficient cause is shown that there was no negligence on the part of appellants.

5. Appeal and error  $\S$  629—Appeal dismissed for appellants' noncompliance with statute as to filing of case, where available transcript was not filed and certiorari requested.

Under Supreme Court Rule 17 (66 S. E. vii), an appeal will be dismissed because of appellants' failure to file complete transcript within time, even if there is a sufficient excuse for noncompliance with statutory requirements as to service of case within time as extended, unless in the first term after the trial below and at, or before the time when the appeal should be docketed, the appellant shall file a transcript of all the record that is available and ask for a certiorari to complete the transcript or to have a case settled.

6. Appeal and error  $\S$  628(1)—Negligence of appellant's counsel is the negligence of appellant himself.

The negligence of appellant's counsel in sending up, docketing, and printing the transcript, is the negligence of the appellant and will not excuse failure to do so.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by J. K. Kerr and another against W. B. Drake, Jr., and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed because of defendants' failure to file transcript of the record within a required time under Supreme Court Rule 17 (66 S. E. vii), and defendants move to reinstate appeal. Motion denied.

This is a motion by defendants to reinstate the appeal in this case which had been docketed and dismissed under rule 17 (66 S. E. vii) on motion of plaintiffs.

B. H. Crumpler, of Clinton, and A. L. Cox, of Raleigh, for appellants.

Butler & Herring and Grady & Graham, all of Clinton, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. This case was tried at June special term, 1921, of Sampson, before Lyon, J. Seven days before the docket from that district was reached, the appellee filed the certificate required by rule 17 (174 N. C. 831, 66 S. E. vii) and his motion to docket and dismiss under said rule, which was allowed when the call of the district began. Thereafter, on the same day, the appellants filed an affidavit and moved to reinstate.

There was a verdict against the defendants and judgment from which they appealed. By consent the defendants obtained 80 days from the adjournment of said term of court to serve case on appeal, and plaintiffs were allowed 80 days thereafter to serve counter case. No case on appeal was served by defendants within the time agreed upon, but, on the contrary, it was not served until September 2, 1921, i. e., 61 days after adjournment of said June special term.

On September 27 the appellants filed an affidavit and motion to reinstate the case on appeal which sets forth the above agreement of 30 days after July 2 to serve counter case, and alleged that on July 29, 1921, the resident counsel in Sampson having received transcript of the evidence from the court stenographer, forwarded the same to their associate counsel in the city of Raleigh. It appears from the affidavit of the stenographer that she furnished the evidence complete to defendants' counsel in Clinton on July 16, 1921. It does not appear on what date the defendants' counsel forwarded the papers to counsel in Raleigh. There is no evidence of any delay in the mail. The counsel in Raleigh filed his affidavit that he was absent from his office in Raleigh from July 30 to August 15, and that after receiving the papers on August 15, he was unable to see his client, one of the codefendants in this case, until on the following week, owing to his client's absence from the city and his being busy, and further that after seeing his client he himself was again called from the city and did not return till August 29, and upon his return he completed the preparation of the case on appeal and forwarded it to the counsel in Clinton on September 1, who delivered it the next day to counsel for the plaintiff, who on September 12 notified the counsel for the defendants that they would not accept the case on appeal but would move to dismiss, under rule 17, which was done in apt time and the motion was allowed.

[1, 2] The only other allegation the appellants make is that between September 2 when the case was served, and September 12, and prior to the receipt of this notice one of the counsel for the appellants met one of the counsel for the defendants, who did not then state to the defendants that he would move to dismiss the appeal, but said he had not fully examined appellants' statement of the case on appeal. This was not a waiver of the motion to dismiss. Besides, it was not necessary that the appellee should give any notice of the motion to dismiss.

The other matters set forth show in every particular a disregard of the statutory requirements as to the time of service of case on appeal and in every respect ignored the statute as to making up a case on appeal.

[3] The agreement for 30 days in which to serve the case on appeal was merely a substitute for the 15 days allowed by statute. The statutory requirements as to making up cases on appeal must be strictly complied with except when there is an agreement to extend the time and then only to the extent of such agreement.

In Hardee v. Timberlake, 159 N. C. 552, 75 S. E. 799, where, by consent, the appellant was allowed 30 days in which to serve the case on appeal but it was not served till the thirty-second day, the appeal was dismissed. In Guano Co. v. Hicks, 120 N. C. 29, 26 S. E. 650, where there was a like agreement allowing 30 days but the appeal was not served till the thirty-first day, it was dismissed.

with the requirements of the statute, and when these are not observed the appeal will be dismissed unless sufficient cause is shown that there was no negligence on the part of the appellant. The appellee has his rights, and it is no excuse that it was not convenient for the appellant or his counsel to observe the requirements of the statute. The appeal will be dismissed, even when there has been sufficient ground to excuse compliance with the statute, unless at the first term after the trial below and at or before the time when the appeal should be docketed the appellant shall file a transcript of all the record that is available and ask for a certiorari to complete the transcript or to have the case settled. Burrell v. Hughes, 120 N. C. 277, 26 S. E. 782, and numerous cases there cited, and cases cited to that case in the Anno. Ed.

[6] The negligence of counsel in sending up, docketing, and printing the transcript is that of the client, and will not excuse failure to do so. Truelove v. Norris, 152 N. C. 755, 67 S. E. 487; Vivian v. Mitchell, 144 N. C. 477, 57 S. E. 167, citing numerous cases. See, also, citations to that case in Anno. Ed.

In this case the appellants' affidavit disproves any allegation of reasonable ground for not complying with the statute. But if there had been any grounds to excuse the failure to serve the case on appeal within proper time, they have failed to file a transcript of the record and move for certiorari. More than this, they did not even file a transcript of the record proper with this motion to reinstate.

Motion denied.

WILLIAMS v. HICKS et al. (No. 220.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

Willis §—602, 603(3)—"Or" read as "and" in gift over in case first taker dies during minority "or" childless.

A gift over to a church in case the first taker, testator's son, dies "during his minority, or childless," in the absence of anything else in the will to show a different intention, is to be read as though "or" were "and," so that the son becomes absolutely owner on attaining majority.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, And; Or.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Roscoe B. Williams against Starr Hicks and others, Trustees of St. John's Free Will Baptist Church. Demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The action is to remove a cloud from plaintiff's title to certain real property held by plaintiff, Roscoe Williams, under the will of his father, John W. Williams, deceased, and more particularly under the third item of the will, as follows:

"In the event that my said son, Roscoe B. Williams should die during his minority, or childless, it is my will and desire that the remainder of the several properties herein named that would revert to him shall go to the Trustees of St. John's Free Will Baptist Church and their successors and assigns forever for the sole use and benefit of said Church. Said St. John's Free Will Baptist Church being in the town of Kinston, N. C."

The proof showed that the property belonged to the testator and passed under this item of said will; that Roscoe B. Williams, plaintiff and devisee named in this item of said will, had become 21 years of age and insisted that the property became vested in him in absolute ownership on his majority.

Defendants claimed and insisted that said estate on death of Roscoe B. Williams without issue or children surviving would belong to the said church. The court, being of opinion with defendants, gave judgment for defendants and sustaining their demurrer filed to plaintiff's complaint. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Dawson & Greene, of Kinston, for appellant.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellees.

HOKE, J. In 40 Cyc. at page 1506, it is laid down as a rule of interpretation which very generally obtains in a devise of this character that—

"Where a gift over in case of death without issue is accompanied by a gift over in case of death before arriving at a certain age, the dying without issue will generally be restricted to the period before arrival at the age specified, to aid which the word 'or' will be construed as 'and.'"

This position was held to be controlling in Dickinson et al. v. Jordan and Blount, 5 N. C. 380, a case not dissimilar to the one presented here, and in the opinion Taylor, Judge, says that on examination of the cases on the subject, the point will be found completely settled and the estate was held absolute in the first taker on arrival at full age. And unless in contravention of the clear purpose of the testator as otherwise expressed in his will, the principle stated has been recognized and approved as the correct position in many of our decisions on the subject and more especially when the first taker, as in this case, usually considered as the primary object of the testator's bounty, is his child and heir at law. Bell v. Keesler, 175 N. C. p. 526, 95 S. E. 881; Bank v. Murray, 175 N. C. p. 62, 94 S. E. 665; Ham v. Ham, 168 N. C. p. 486, 84 S. E. 840; Dunn v. Hines, 164 N. C. p. 113, 80 S. E. 410; Burton v. Congigland, 82 N. C. p. 100; Turner v. Whitted, etc., 9 N. C. p. 613; Parker v. Parker, 5 Metc. (46 Mass.) 134-137. In Bell v. Keesler the above quotation from Cyc. is approved and the opinion quotes further from the Massachusetts case of Parker v. Parker, where the rule of construction and in part the reason for it is stated as follows:

"The manifest object of the testator was, we think, that if the son who was the first object of his bounty should die without leaving children to take after him, and whilst he was under age, so that he could not make any disposition of the property on account of the incapacity of nonage, then the testator intended to make disposition of it himself. But if the son should leave no children, but still if he should arrive at an age at which the law would allow him to dispose of real estate by his own act by deed or will, then it was intended that the gift to him should be absolute, and the devise over would fail."

And in Ham v. Ham, supra, where the subject is discussed with ability and learning, the court held, among other things, that on a devise of land to four sons but should either of them die before arriving at the age of 21 or without children surviving, the word "or" "should be read as 'and' so as to require both contingencies to occur before the limitation over should take effect," and thus "save the inheritance to the child or children of any son who should die under age."

It was earnestly insisted before us that there were certain expressions in the will, and attendant facts relevant to its construction, which showed a manifest intention on the part of the testator that either or both contingencies should affect the estate till the son's death; but, without special reference to these suggestions, we think that they are entirely insufficient to displace this, a settled rule of interpretation, on the facts presented and where in aid of such rule it appears that to uphold the position contended for by appellees would be to deprive the son and heir of any absolute ownership in his deceased father's property until his death. Under a proper application of the decisions referred to, and the principles they approve and illustrate, we must hold that on the record, the estate of plaintiff, the son and heir at law of the testator, became vested in absolute ownership on his becoming of age, that the demurrer be overruled, and defendant's claim be declared invalid.

Our decision in no way conflicts with Patterson v. McCormick, 177 N. C. p. 448, 99 S. E. 401, to which we were referred by counsel. In that well-considered case the court was passing on a devise over on a death of the first taker without issue as controlled by our statute on the subject, and entirely unaffected by the presence of a double contingency.

cy and which on the facts of this record require as we have seen a different rule of construction. There is error, and this will be certified that judgment be entered for plaintiff.

Reversed.

WERBER v. MOSES et al. (No. 10711.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 26, 1921.)

1. Wills  $\S$  184(3)—If codicil reasonably reconcilable, court will give effect to such presumed intention.

If there is an irreconcilable conflict between a will and a codicil, the latter must prevail, but, especially in view of Civ. Code 1912,  $\S$  3569, providing that no will or any clause thereof shall be revocable but by some other will or codicil in writing "declaring the same," etc., if the codicil can reasonably be reconciled with the will, it must be presumed that the testator so intended, and the court will give effect to such intention.

2. Wills  $\S$  614(5)—Codicil held not to vest estates in fee in beneficiaries of life estates.

Under a will directing that testator's land be kept for the use and benefit of his wife, children, and children of deceased children until the death of all of them, and then distributed among the grandchildren, life estates only vested in the children, with fee-simple estates in remainder in the grandchildren, despite a supplementary codicil giving the children power to divide the land among themselves in a stipulated manner if dissatisfied with the arrangement for yearly division of the rents, the codicil being intended not to divest the estates devised by the will, but to devise a method of assuring a harmonious and equitable division of the income, which might or might not be adopted.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Newberry County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Frederick Werber, Jr., against Andrena Moses and others. From the decree, defendants Werber and Case appeal. Modified and remanded.

Mower & Bynum, of Newberry, Frederick Werber, Jr., of Washington, D. C., and Dudley C. Outcalt, of Cincinnati, Ohio, for appellants.

Lee & Moise, of Sumter, W. Huger Fitzsimons, of Charleston, Grier, Park & Nicholson, of Greenwood, Hunt, Hunt & Hunter, of Newberry, and O. S. Monteith, of Columbia, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action for a construction of the will and codicil of Frederick Werber, Sr., a citizen of Newberry county, who died September 29, 1891, leaving of force a will dated April 28, 1884, and a codicil thereto, dated six years later, April 28, 1890, of which his widow, M. Louise Werber, duly qualified as executrix on October 19, 1891. The testator was survived by his widow, M. Louise Werber, and five children; Frederick Werber, Jr., Andrena Werber (now Moses), Alma Werber (now Bruce), Gustavus Werber, and Mary L. Werber.

Before any division of the estate was attempted, the daughter, Mary L. Werber, died without issue February 13, 1912, leaving a will making the defendant Grace Virginia Clark her sole devisee, legatee, and executrix. The widow, M. Louise Werber, died March 10, 1913; the defendants Waldemar Werber and Erwin W. Case are the only living children of the plaintiff Frederick Werber, Jr.; the defendants Arabella Moran, Louise Van Deventer, Minnie L. Moses, Kate Bryant, and Claremont Moses are the only living children of the defendant Andrena Moses; the defendants Alma W. Bruce and Gustavus Werber have no children.

It will thus be seen that all of the living children and grandchildren of Frederick Werber, Sr., the testator, and Mary Virginia Clark; devisee of Mary L. Werber, the deceased daughter, have been made parties to this action, which has been instituted for the purpose of obtaining a judicial construction of the will and codicil referred to, the point of controversy being whether the children of the testator take under said will and codicil fee-simple estates in the real estate, or life estates, with remainders to the grandchildren.

The testator owned at the time of his death three parcels of real estate: (1) The Saluda Old Town plantation, containing nearly 1,000 acres; (2) the Bush River plantation, containing about 1,200 acres; and (3) a house and lot in the city of Newberry, the lot containing about 4 acres.

The original will provides as follows:

Article 1. The testator directs that the whole of his real and personal estate be kept together for the purpose of paying his debts, they to be paid out of the net income derived from the Saluda River plantation; this article contains certain directions as to the payment of his debts which are not material to the present controversy.

Article 2 is as follows:

"It is my desire that my two plantations be kept as my estate during the life of my wife, and the lives of my children, and until the death of my last surviving child, for the use and benefit of my said wife, and my children, and their issue per stirpes, of my deceased children; after the death of my wife and all my children, it is my will that then my said real estate be partitioned and distributed amongst the issue of my children per stirpes."

The other provisions of the will do not immediately affect the matter under review and will only be referred to as occasion may arise.

The codicil opens with this statement: "I, Frederick Werber, of the county and state aforesaid, by way of codicil, do supplement this my last will and testament"—indicating that the original will accompanied physically the codicil, and was not intended to be revoked except in such particulars as it might be in irreconcilable conflict with the codicil. The first article contains this statement:

"Whereas by my aforesaid will I have directed that the two plantations I possess should remain as my estate, my children yearly equally dividing the rents of said plantations, and whereas they may be dissatisfied with such arrangement, and might not be able to agree upon an equal division of said rents, therefore in order to provide against any such contingency arising I hereby give my children power and authority to divide the said land among themselves, providing it is done in the following manner."

The "manner" referred to is quite peculiar. He directs that—

"To the one who first desires his or her share of the land, he or she shall have the following tract of land, provided he or she shall give notice in writing to my other heirs of his or her intention to take the tract of land herein described as his or her share of the two plantations I now possess, on the first day of January succeeding the time such notice was given."

This is followed by a description of the subdivision, a part of the Bush River plantation, and a statement that the testator was then receiving a yearly rental of 12 bales of cotton therefrom. A similar provision follows in favor of the one who should next give notice; the subdivision, also a part of the same plantation, containing 329 acres, the yearly rental stated to be 11 bales, which might be increased by clearing. A similar provision follows in favor of the one who should next give notice; the subdivision also a part of the same plantation, containing 71 acres, and the yearly rental stated to be 12 bales.

The Saluda River plantation, not included in the foregoing provisions, was then directed to be divided equally between the two children who had not given the notices as before indicated; the rental value of this plantation was stated to be 24 bales. Then follows a direction that any other property, the division of which may not have been provided for, shall be divided equally among his children.

The sixth article is as follows:

"In case of the demise of any of my children without issue, before this division can be made then their share or shares shall be divided equally between my surviving children."

The seventh:

"None of my children can claim any of the property under the provisions of this codicil until all my debts are paid, until after the death of my wife Louise M. Werber."

In December, 1915, after the death of the widow in 1913, and after the payment of all debts owing by the testator, the Bush River plantation was divided between the defendants Andrena Moses, Alma Bruce, and Gustavus Werber, they taking, in conformity with the directions of the codicil, respectively tracts 1, 2, and 3 as described therein. Subsequently, on March 6, 1916, Andrena Moses and Gustavus Werber by reciprocal deeds exchanged the tracts severally allotted to them. The other plantation, the Saluda River place, has not been actually divided. The questions for decision are:

(1) Do the children of the testator own the several tracts allotted to them in fee simple, or have they only a life estate therein, with remainders to the grandchildren of the testator?

(2) What interest, if any, does Grace Virginia Clark, the devisee under the will of the deceased daughter Mary L. Werber, take in the estate of the testator?

It is conceded on all sides, as well it might be, that under the original will the children of the testator are jointly entitled only to the income of the estate during their respective lives; that, if any one of them should die before the period of division arrived, leaving issue, such issue should represent the parent, per stirpes, in the distribution of the yearly income, pending the arrival of the period of distribution; that, if any one of them should die before that period leaving no issue, that interest should devolve upon the survivors; that the period of distribution was fixed at the death of the last surviving child of the testator; and that then the two plantations should "be partitioned and distributed amongst the issue of my children per stirpes."

It is contended by the three children, Andrena Moses, Alma Bruce, and Gustavus Werber, who received respectively allotments of parcels 1, 2, and 3 of the Bush River plantation, in conformity with the codicil, that the effect of the codicil was to vest in them fee-simple titles to the said parcels respectively, and that they are entitled also to a distributive share in fee simple of the Saluda River plantation and of the house and lot in Newberry. The case turns upon the legal effect of the provisions of the codicil.

[1] To sustain the contention of the defendants, it is apparent that we must hold that there is an irreconcilable conflict between the original will and the codicil; the original will devising the fee-simple estate in remainder to the grandchildren, and the codicil destroying all semblance of a remainder, and devising the fee simple immediately to the children of the testator. Of course, if that should appear—that is, that there is such irreconcilable conflict—the provisions of the codicil must prevail.

In Logan v. Cassidy, 71 S. C. 175, 50 S. E. 794, after a full and careful statement of the comparison of a will and a codicil, the court says:

"A codicil likewise, if inconsistent with the preceding will, is, in law, a revocation of it. That is, so inconsistent that both cannot stand."

In Anderson v. Butler, 31 S. C. 183, 9 S. E. 797, 5 L. R. A. 166, it is declared:

"The rule as to the construction of wills and codicils is as stated in defendant's (appellant's) argument, to wit: 'Not to disturb the dispositions of the will further than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the codicils.'"

In 28 R. C. L. 199, it is said:

"It is the well-settled general rule that a will and codicil are to be regarded as a single and entire instrument for the purpose of determining the testamentary intention and disposition of the testator, and both instruments together will be construed as if they had been executed at the time of the making of the codicil."

"The testator's purpose in making the codicil may be found in the codicil itself, and in construing a will and codicil, a disposition made by the will is not to be construed further than absolutely necessary to give effect to the codicil. A codicil will not be allowed to vary or modify the will, unless such is the plain intent of the testator. A revocation by a codicil of a gift in the will extends only so far as the will is consistent with the codicil, and a gift once made by will is not to be cut down by a subsequent codicil unless the intention of the testator to that effect appears clearly or by necessary implication."

In 30 A. & E. 665, it is said:

"In construing a will and codicil, or separate codicils, it is a clear and settled rule that they are to be taken and construed together, in connection with each other, as parts of one and the same instrument, and the codicils shall not be taken to vary or modify the will unless such was the manifest intention of the testator"—citing, among an array of cases, Vaughan v. Bridges, 61 S. C. 155, 39 S. E. 847.

In 30 A. & E. 685, it is said:

"If possible, the court will reconcile two apparently inconsistent and repugnant provisions in a will, in order to carry out the testator's intentions as to the disposition of his estate, and in so doing will endeavor not to disturb the first provision further than is absolutely necessary to give effect to the second. But if the provisions are absolutely irreconcilable, the latter will be preferred, and will prevail over the former. Thus, where a will and a codicil are irreconcilable, the codicil, as the last indication of the testator's intention, must prevail."

Section 3569, vol. 1, Code of Laws, 1912, provides:

"No will or testament * * * of any real or personal property or any clause thereof, shall be revocable but by some other will or codicil in writing, or other writing declaring the same," etc.

Closely allied with this principle is that declared in the following quotations:

In 30 A. & E. 687, it is said:

"It has become a settled rule of construction that, when the words of the will in the first instance distinctly indicate an intent to make a clear gift, such gift is not to be cut down by any subsequent provision which is ambiguous or inferential, and which is not equally as distinct as the former; or, the rule may be stated that a clear gift is not to be cut down by anything which does not, with reasonable certainty, indicate an intention to cut it down."

"Where an estate is once given by words of clear and ascertained legal significance, it will neither be enlarged nor cut down by super-added words in the same or subsequent clauses of the will, unless they raise an irresistible inference that such was the intention of the testator." Lawrence v. Burnett, 109 S. C. 416, 96 S. E. 144; Adams v. Verner, 102 S. C. 7, 86 S. E. 211; Howze v. Barber, 29 S. C. 466, 7 S. E. 817; Smith v. Smith, 93 S. C. 213, 76 S. E. 468; Jennings v. Talbert, 77 S. C. 454, 58 S. E. 420.

"It is a familiar and well-recognized principle that an interpretation is to be preferred which will give force and effect to all the provisions of an instrument, rather than one which will destroy one or more of its provisions." Pearson v. Easterling, 104 S. C. 178, 88 S. E. 376.

In McClellan v. Mackenzie, 126 Fed. 701, 61 C. C. A. 619, the court declares:

"If there is anything well settled it is that a court will not cut down an estate once granted absolutely in fee by limitations contained in subsequent parts of a will, unless the intent to limit the devise is manifested clearly and unmistakably. If the expression relied upon to limit a fee once devised be doubtful, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the absolute estate. Birney v. Richardson, 5 Dana, 424; Trabue v. Terry (Ky.) 9 S. W. 162; Meacham v. Graham, 98 Tenn. 190, 205, 39 S. W. 12; Benson v. Corbin, 145 N. Y. 358, 40 N. E. 11; Washbon v. Cope, 144 N. Y. 287, 297, 39 N. E. 388."

But is there such irreconcilable conflict? The rule is that, if the provisions of the codicil can reasonably be reconciled with the provisions of the will, it must be presumed that the testator so intended, and the court will give effect to such intention.

[2] It is noticeable that there is no fee-simple estate expressly conferred upon the children by the codicil. In order to accomplish that result, resort is had to a rule of law which, in wills, dispenses with the necessity for words of inheritance. But upon the issue whether the testator meant to cut down a previous fee-simple estate in the will by a provision in the codicil, the necessity for a resort to this rule of law presents an exceedingly weak support for the contention; with greater reason it supports the contrary, for, if he had really intended to destroy an estate conferred by the will, the slightest degree of care would have suggested nonreliance upon the rule of law and a direct expression to that effect.

It is noticeable also, and significant, that the codicil is denominated a supplement to the will. While this, of course, is not controlling, it is a circumstance worth considering in determining the testator's intention. It would be remarkable, if he intended to substitute for a life estate in his children fee-simple titles, and to destroy entirely the fee-simple estates in remainder created for the grandchildren, that, instead of making a new will, he executed a supplement to the former will, without a word indicating that he intended to annul the estates vested in the grandchildren, or that he intended the children to take fee-simple estates, other than the implication created by law, with which he is not shown to have been familiar.

There is no direct devise in the codicil to the children; it confers simply the power upon them to divide the land and go into possession of the several tracts, as a substitute plan for that contained in the will, by which the income from the property should be equitably divided among them, in the event that they should become dissatisfied with the arrangement for that purpose contained in the will. The testator may well have concluded, after the lapse of six years from the making of the will, and from the changes which inevitably occur in the lives of a grown-up family, that the plan of the will might be found cumbersome and unsatisfactory; no one was particularly made the custodian and manager of the property, and it was not improbable that a common holding of all the property, a common management of the farming operations and a division of the income at the end of the year would result in wrangles and unpleasantness. He appears to have been so anxious to preserve harmony in the family that he deprecated even what is now being done—a controversy in the courts concerning the division of his property. This anxiety led him to provide this alternative plan for the division of the income, in case the former arrangement should prove unsatisfactory. Considered upon its merits as an alternative plan for a division of the income, there can be no question but that it would prove more satisfactory for each one to have his life estate set apart to itself, and each to be responsible for and entitled to what he could make out of it. That this was his intention is strongly suggested by the rental valuations he placed upon the several tracts, indicating that the tracts were to be allotted not according to their areas or market values, but according to what was uppermost in his mind—the incomes—to which alone the children were severally entitled.

In addition to the fact adverted to, that there is no direct devise to the children in the codicil, the further consideration is important that there is no obligation imposed upon them to make the allotment provided for in the codicil. It is a plan proposed by the testator which they may or may not have adopted, their adoption depending upon the failure of the plan for a division of the yearly rents provided for in the will, and this plan, of course, prevailed until their dissatisfaction with it developed. As a matter of fact, it did prevail from the time of the death of Mrs. Werber March 10, 1913, until the first notice of dissatisfaction was given December 15, 1915, nearly three years. The plan of the codicil being optional, it is clear that, if there had been no steps taken to adopt it, the plan of the will would have continued. Both plans affected only the division of the rents, and it is inconceivable that the adoption or the rejection of either plan would or was intended to change the course of the fee-simple title.

It is impossible that the direction which the fee-simple estate should take upon the death of the testator could be a matter of doubt. As soon as the breath left his body the title to his lands left him, and lodged in some one. To adopt the theory of the defendants, the title then vested in them for life, with remainders to the grandchildren, and so remained, until in December, 1915, they expressed themselves dissatisfied with the "arrangement" which had been made by the will, and that then it passed out of the grandchildren and vested in them. The "arrangement," they contend, included not only the estate intended to be passed by the will, but also the method of dividing the income. After providing for them only a life estate, the fee in remainder vesting in the grandchildren, it was hardly in the mind of the testator to make the estate in the grandchildren dependent upon the satisfaction of the children who received only the life estates. This is particularly true of those children of the testator who are without issue, who are now confronted with the contingency of being adjudged to hold only life estates, which upon their deaths will go to the children of their brothers and sisters.

Even if the codicil raised a doubt as to the estate intended to be devised to the children who received the separate allotments, we would be disposed to hold that it has not divested the estate devised by the will. For, in cases of doubt as to a conflict between a will and a codicil, a construction which will be in harmony with both should be adopted. But we have not the slightest doubt that the testator intended the provisions of the will to stand, vesting in the children life estates and in the grandchildren fee-simple estates in remainder, and that the provisions of the codicil were intended simply to devise a more satisfactory method of assuring a harmonious and equitable division of the income, which might or might not be adopted. The provision in the codicil, article 1, which we repeat with explanatory interpolations, is as follows:

"Whereas by my aforesaid will I have directed that the two plantations I possess should remain as my estate, my children yearly equally dividing the rents of said plantations (as a matter of fact, the will provided more than that; it provided for a partition and distribution of the estate between the grandchildren; the fact that this part of the will was not referred to in this paragraph indicates that it was not intended to be altered), and whereas, they may be dissatisfied with such arrangement (that is, holding the estate together, and the annual division of the income), and might not be able to agree upon an equal division of said rents, therefore in order to provide against any such contingency arising (that is, the contingency of a disagreement in the division of the income, not in order to enlarge the estate in the children from a life estate to a fee simple, to which no reference is made), I hereby give my children (not an estate in the land but) power and authority to divide the said land among themselves (so that each one would know exactly how much income he was entitled to and there could be no dissatisfaction as to an equal division of the rents).

If the testator had intended to revoke by his codicil the estate in remainder devised in the will to the grandchildren, it would have been a simple matter to have said so. Or if he had intended by implication to do so, it would have been equally as simple to have devised fee-simple estates to the children in express terms, which, of course, would have had the effect of revoking the remainders to the grandchildren; in which event it would have been altogether unnecessary to give as his reason therefor the possibility of disagreement between them in the division of the rents. The fact that he gives this as his reason for the changed "arrangement" is strongly indicative of his purpose that their interest in the estate should be confined to the rents, and that the provision of the will for the grandchildren's estate should stand.

The contention of the defendants makes the will and the codicil so absolutely in conflict that it is impossible to conceive the utility of the testator's allowing the will to stand at all, outside of a few trivial provisions that may readily have been incorporated in the codicil as a new will; the fact that the will was recognized as unrevoked, in the preamble to the codicil, declared to be a supplement thereto, is persuasive that the testator intended that it should remain unrevoked except as to the matter of a division of the yearly rents.

The fact that in the codicil the several allotments were referred to as "his or her share of the land," "his or her share of my two plantations," is not inconsistent with the intention that life estates, and not fee-simples, should be received by the children, for we find in article 6 of the will that the admitted life estate of a son who might die leaving a wife, without issue, is similarly characterized, "her deceased husband's share in my estate." The result is that the tract allotted to Andrena Moses shall remain in her possession until the last of the testator's children shall die, she receiving the income thereof; if she should not be the last to die, upon her death her issue shall receive the income until the period of distribution shall arrive; at which time it shall become a part of the general estate for partition under article 2 of the will.

The tract allotted to Alma W. Bruce shall remain in her possession during the term of her natural life, she receiving the income thereof. She has no issue now, and if she should die without issue it shall go to the survivor or survivors of the testator's children, to be held by them in common, they receiving the income thereof until the period of distribution shall arrive, at which time it shall become a part of the general estate for partition under article 2 of the will. The children of a child who may predecease Alma W. Bruce shall be entitled per stirpes to share in the income of the Alma W. Bruce allotment between the date of her death and the arrival of the period of distribution.

The tract allotted to Gustavus Werber shall be subject to the same conditions as are above set forth in reference to the tract allotted to Alma W. Bruce.

The Saluda River plantation, as to which no allotment has been made, shall be held in common by the children of the testator or their children per stirpes if any should die prior to the period of distribution, the income to be divided in the following proportions: To Frederick Werber, Jr., one-half plus one-fourth of the other half, five-eighths; to Andrena Moses, one-eighth; to Alma W. Bruce, one-eighth; to Gustavus Werber, one-eighth. When the period of distribution shall arrive it shall become a part of the general estate for partition under article 2 of the will. The children of a child who may die before such period of distribution shall be entitled per stirpes to share in the income of this plantation, between the date of the death of such child and the period for distribution.

In reference to the house and lot at Newberry, the direction in the fourth clause of the original will is that, after the death of the widow, if the house and lot shall not have been sold (under article 1), it shall be appraised and assigned at three-fourths of its appraised value to one or more of the children, in the order named. The implication is that the recipient shall account to the other children for their shares therein. No one has up to this time availed themselves of the option; and yet we cannot say that they are foreclosed. The first choice was given to the daughter Mary L. Werber, who died before the death of the widow. That choice has devolved by devise upon the defendant Grace Virginia Clark. If neither she nor any of the children desire to avail themselves of the option, the property will be subject to partition or sale and an equal distribution of the proceeds between Grace Virginia Clark and the four children.

The sixth clause of the codicil refers alone to the two plantations, and does not affect the Newberry house and lot, the disposition of which is controlled by the original will.

The judgment of this court is that the decree of the circuit court be modified to conform to the conclusions herein announced, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further orders as may be necessary to carry them into effect.

PATTERSON v. ORANGEBURG FERTILIZER CO. et al. (No. 10681.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921. On Petition for Rehearing, Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Corporations  $\S$ 306 — Agent of fertilizer company held not liable for damages caused by harmful ingredients in fertilizer.

In the absence of evidence connecting the agent of a fertilizer company with the wrongful conduct of the company, he is not liable for damages caused by a harmful ingredient in the fertilizer.

2. Agriculture  $\S$ 7—Statute concerning sale of bad fertilizer held not to abrogate an action at common law.

Civ. Code 1912, §§ 2315-2330, commonly known as the Fertilizer Act, and providing for pro rata reduction in the price for a deficiency in element percentages and consequent commercial value of fertilizer, does not purport to provide a remedy for damages caused to a crop by the introduction into the fertilizer of a noxious ingredient, and a common-law action may be maintained.

3. Action  $\S$ 35—Statute affirming liability at common law and giving a new remedy is cumulative unless contrary appears.

When a liability exists at common law, and is affirmed by a statute which gives a new remedy for its enforcement, unless a contrary intention appears, the new remedy is merely cumulative.

4. Sales  $\S$ 267—In sale of fertilizer provision that vendor does not guarantee results does not destroy an implied warranty against harmful ingredients.

A provision in a contract for the sale of fertilizer that the vendor does not guarantee results is not an express warranty excluding any implied warranty arising otherwise from the contract, but has no greater effect than to limit to a very innocent degree the implied warranty that a sound price demands a sound commodity, and does not relieve from liability for damage caused by a harmful ingredient in the fertilizer.

5. Agriculture  $\S$ 7—Limitation sale of fertilizer held not to apply to damages caused by injurious ingredients.

Stipulation in contract of sale of fertilizer that damages must be claimed within 10 days after the sale does not include a claim by purchaser of fertilizer for damages caused to crops by a harmful ingredient contained in the fertilizer, since such damages cannot be apparent until the lapse of considerable time.

6. Action  $\S$ 27(2)—Complaint in an action for damages held susceptible to construction as one for breach of warranty.

Although a complaint was capable of being construed either as an action for damages on account of failure of consideration, or for damages for breach of implied warranty, or as one for tort for negligence, where it was clear that the action was for damages by reason of defendant's breach of the warranties implied in a contract of sale of fertilizer, it was sufficient; it not being necessary to denominate specifically the form of action if the facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are clearly set forth.

7. Sales  $\S$ 445(4)—Breach of implied warranty of fertilizer held for jury.

On evidence that fertilizer sold by defendant contained a harmful ingredient which caused damage to plaintiff's crops, plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury.

8. Sales  $\S$ 273(2) — Manufacturer impliedly warrants fitness for purpose intended of article sold by him.

Where fertilizer is sold by the manufacturer, a stronger warranty is implied than in the ordinary sale of goods that the fertilizer was reasonably adapted to the purposes for which it is purchased, and this implied warranty is independent of the manufacturer's negligence.

9. Action  $\S$ 27(2)—Where plaintiff may sue in either tort or contract, he may waive one and sue on the other.

Where plaintiff has a ground of action either in contract or tort, he may waive the contract and sue on the tort.

10. Agriculture  $\S$ 7—Buyer of fertilizer containing harmful ingredient must prove negligence if he sues in tort.

If a buyer of fertilizer which contains a harmful ingredient waives the warranty of fitness and sues for tort, he must prove the negligence charged.

11. Agriculture  $\S$ 7—In action for negligent sale of fertilizer containing harmful ingredient, evidence held for jury.

In an action by a buyer against the seller of fertilizer for damages to crops caused by a harmful ingredient, evidence held to require submission to the jury, even if complaint be construed to be one for tort.

On Petition for Rehearing.

12. Bills and notes $\Leftrightarrow$ 525—Evidence held to show holding in due course.

Evidence held sufficient to show that defendant bank was holder of notes in due course.

13. Bills and notes $\Leftrightarrow$ 337—Mere suspicions of transferee do not amount to bad faith.

The Negotiable Instruments Act of 1914 has not changed the established rule that mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry without actual knowledge, or mere suspicion of an infirmity or defect of title, does not preclude the transferee of a note from occupying the position of a holder in due course, unless circumstances or suspicion are so cogent and obvious that to remain passive would amount to bad faith.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Action by J. O. Patterson, Jr., against the Orangeburg Fertilizer Company and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part; reversed and remanded in part.

Charles Carrall Simms and Thomas M. Boulware, both of Barnwell, for appellant.

Moss & Lide and Wolf & Berry, all of Orangeburg, and Harley & Blatt, of Barnwell, for respondents.

COTHRAN, J. This is a double action against a fertilizer company and its agent, on the one part, and a bank, on the other. The alleged cause of action against the fertilizer company and its agent is for $27,000 damages growing out of the fact that certain fertilizers sold by the company to the plaintiff, and used by him in the cultivation of his crop in the year 1919, contained a deleterious ingredient, which, instead of being a benefit to the crop, poisoned the vegetation and caused serious loss of production. The character of the action is a matter of controversy and will be considered hereinafter.

The alleged cause of action against the bank is based upon the fact that the notes given by the plaintiff to the fertilizer company for the fertilizer have been assigned by the company to the bank, and that the notes are void, the consideration therefor having failed by reason of the facts which are made the basis of the alleged cause of action against the fertilizer company and its agent; and the prayer for relief against the bank is that the notes be surrendered for cancellation, and that the bank be enjoined from attempting to enforce the collection of them.

At the close of the testimony, the circuit judge, on motion, directed a verdict in favor of the defendants the fertilizer company and its agent upon the cause of action for damages, and also directed a verdict in favor of the defendant bank against the plaintiff for the amount due upon the several notes.

The plaintiff has appealed from the judgments entered in conformity with the directed verdicts.

We may first dispose of the exceptions assigning error in directing a verdict in favor of the bank upon the notes which the plaintiff gave for the fertilizer, and which were assigned before maturity to the bank. It is questionable whether the bank, not having set up the notes as a counterclaim, and not having demanded judgment thereon, was entitled to a judgment in this action; but no question is raised in reference thereto, and we pass it by. The notes were negotiable promissory notes transferred to the bank for value before maturity in good faith. The bank, so far as the evidence shows, had no notice of any infirmity in the notes, or of any defense thereto which the plaintiff may have had growing out of the facts alleged in the complaint or otherwise. Suspicious circumstances, if they existed, are not sufficient to charge the assignee of such commercial paper with notice. A long line of decisions sustain the action of the circuit judge. They are cited in the case of Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Smith, 110 S. C. 462, 96 S. E. 690, 11 A. L. R. 1274. These exceptions are accordingly overruled.

[1] We may also dispose of the exceptions assigning error in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant Cave, agent of the fertilizer company. There is nothing in the evidence that would connect him with the alleged conduct of the fertilizer company. These exceptions are accordingly overruled.

This leaves for consideration only the alleged cause of action against the fertilizer company, which will require a somewhat extended statement of the facts of this case and of the principles of law applicable thereto.

The facts of the case fairly deducible from the evidence, and with all inferences taken most favorably to the plaintiff, as the rule requires that we take them, in reviewing the direction of a verdict against him, are as follows:

In February, 1919, the Orangeburg Fertilizer Company entered into a contract with the plaintiff, to sell and deliver to him for the 1919 crop 100 tons of ammoniated fertilizer (with the privilege of increasing or decreasing that quantity) at a certain price per ton, the guaranteed elements of which were 8 per cent. phosphoric acid, 3 per cent. ammonia, and 3 per cent. potash, usually designated 8-3-3. Seventy-five tons were delivered under this contract, the price being $4,858.79, which was closed by three notes of $1,619.59, $1,619.60, and $1,619.60, dated May 22, 1919, and due respectively October 1, 1919, October 15, 1919 and November 1, 1919, with interest from date at 6 per cent. per annum.

On April 25, 1919, before the account was closed by notes, the plaintiff procured samples of the fertilizer to be drawn at his place by a representative of Clemson College for analysis. The analysis was dated June 27, 1919, and showed: Phosphoric acid, 8.45 per cent.; ammonia, 3 per cent.; and potash, 2.82 per cent. A subsequent analysis made on September 30, 1919, showed anhydrous borax, 1.46 per cent., though by more accurate methods developed later this result was shown to have been "much too high" in the opinion of Dr. Brachett, chief chemist of the college, and should be reduced about one-third, leaving it .98 per cent.

During the war with Germany the supply of potash from that country, which was the main source of supply, was not available, and other sources of supply were sought. One of them was Seales Lake, in California. The potash from Germany contained very little, if any, borax, while that from California contained that element in considerable quantity. It was known as Trona potash, and was distributed largely over this section in 1919, and used extensively by all manufacturers of fertilizers. It was the only source of supply, practically, and was used in the manufacture of the fertilizer sold to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff applied the fertilizer to his crops with disastrous results. "A short time after I put down that application, the cotton began to wilt, and it shed off everything in the shape of fruit except that that had developed into bolls, and it continued to do that from then on." On 64 acres of his best land, which usually produced from 100 to 125 bales of cotton, he gathered 24 bales. On 90 acres of land cultivated by share croppers upon which they had gathered 135 bales, they gathered 26.

There was abundant evidence tending to show that anhydrous borax was a poisonous and destructive agency to vegetation; that it was present in an appreciable degree in the fertilizer manufactured by the defendant and sold to the plaintiff; the analysis showed 1.46 per cent., which, possibly reducible by later methods, would amount to nearly 10 pounds per acre in an application of 1,000 pounds of fertilizer; that the maximum amount of this poisonous substance without danger to plant life would be 2 pounds per acre.

The evidence therefore tended to show: (1) That the plaintiff purchased fertilizer guaranteed to conform to the formula 8-3-3; (2) that he applied it to his land in the cultivation of the crop of 1919; (3) that the fertilizer so bought and used contained an appreciable quantity of borax; (4) that fertilizer containing the quantity of borax which an analysis of the fertilizer so bought and used showed that it contained was deleterious, if not destructive of plant life; (5) that his crops in the year 1919 were seriously injured, resulting in a considerable loss of production.

It cannot be doubted that this evidence was sufficient to raise the issue whether or not the fertilizer sold by the defendant to the plaintiff and used by him upon his crops contained a deleterious ingredient, and actually caused the damage complained of. If so, has the plaintiff a cause of action against the defendant for such damage?

Several barriers are suggested by the defendant to the plaintiff's right to recover damages. It is suggested: (1) That the statute law of the state purporting to regulate the sale of commercial fertilizers prescribes an exclusive remedy for the plaintiff under the circumstances stated; (2) that the warranty of the defendant that it does not guarantee to the plaintiff results from the use of the fertilizer is exclusive of any implied warranty arising otherwise from the contract of sale; (3) that the contract limits the filing of a claim of any nature to 10 days after receipt of goods; (4) that the action is for a negligent and willful tort, resulting in damage to the plaintiff, and that there is no evidence tending to establish either element of the tort complained of.

[2, 3] 1. As to the first suggestion: The sections of volume 1, Code of Laws A. D. 1912, 2315 to 2330, commonly referred to as the Fertilizer Act, do not purport to provide a remedy for one whose crop may have been damaged by the introduction into the fertilizer of a noxious ingredient; but, if they did, such remedy would be cumulative, and not exclusive. The rule is that, when the liability existed at common law, and that liability is affirmed by a statute which gives a new remedy for its enforcement, unless a contrary intention appears, the new remedy is merely cumulative. 1 C. J. 989. In Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C. 548, cited by respondent, it is declared:

"If an affirmative statute, which is introductory of a new law, direct a thing to be done in a particular manner, that thing shall not, even although there are no negative words, be done in any other manner."

The analysis of the fertilizer made by Clemson College was for the purpose of verifying the guaranteed percentages of the elements phosphoric acid, ammonia, and potash. They reported a deficiency in potash, and upon that basis estimated the commercial value of the fertilizer at 56 cents per ton less than the guaranteed value. They did not analyze it for borax, and in their estimate of its commercial value did not consider the presence of a positively deleterious ingredient.

The provisions of the statute allowing a pro rata reduction in the price for a deficiency in element percentages and consequent commercial value assumes that with that deficiency the fertilizer would have some value, considerable value, certainly enough to form a subtrahend from which the deficiency was to be subtracted. It does not contemplate the presence of a deleterious ingredient to such an extent as not only to render it of no value at all, but positively injurious in its effects.

[4] 2. As to the second suggestion: We find no express warranty in the contract at all. The only reference to that subject is a provision that there is no guaranty of results which has no greater effect than to a very innocent degree limit the implied warranty that a sound price demands a sound commodity. Of course, if the plaintiff received fertilizer which by analysis is shown to contain the elements represented, the defendant, even in the absence of this limitation, could not be held to have guaranteed results in the application of it to the plaintiff's crops; but that would not relieve them from responsibility for incorporating in the mass of available ingredients such injurious elements as would neutralize the results reasonably obtainable from the application of fertilizer containing only the ingredients represented.

[5] 3. As to the third suggestion: The law recognizes the validity of a stipulation limiting the time within which a claim for damages for the breach of a contract shall be presented, only when such stipulation is reasonable in its nature as giving the party damaged a reasonable time for the presentation of a claim. It would hardly be contended that a purchaser of fertilizer which contained poison enough to destroy the crop to which it was applied, and which result could only be ascertained after the crop had at least begun to grow, had a reasonable opportunity in 10 days to ascertain that unascertainable fact and made a claim for damages which had not occurred. The limitation under these circumstances is contrary to the public policy and void.

[6] 4. As to the fourth suggestion: Under the allegations of fact contained in the complaint, the action might have assumed any one of the three aspects: (1) An action for damages on account of a failure of consideration; (2) an action for damages for the breach of the implied warranty of soundness or fitness of the goods sold; (3) an action in tort for negligence in supplying to the plaintiff a fertilizer containing a deleterious ingredient.

It is not entirely clear from the terms of the complaint which one of these actions the plaintiff intended to bring, nor was it necessary for him to have specifically denominated its particular form, so long as the facts which would contribute a valid cause of action are clearly set forth. Nor do we attach any importance to the statements of counsel in arguing questions of evidence to the court characterizing the action as one in tort.

The complaint is easily susceptible of the construction that the action is one for damages, by reason of the defendant's breach of the warranties of soundness and fitness implied in the contract, the breach of either of which is supported by abundant evidence to have required the submission of the issue to the jury.

[7] The rule that in a contract of sale a sound price warrants a sound commodity has been recognized in this state ever since the organization of its courts. That there is evidence tending to show that the fertilizer delivered by the defendant under its contract contained an element injurious to vegetable life is apparent. As a matter of law, it is equally apparent that, if this fact be established, the defendant supplied an unsound commodity. Upon this issue the plaintiff was clearly entitled to go to the jury.

[8] A further consideration differentiates this case from the ordinary case of a sale of goods. The defendant was a manufacturer of the goods it proposed to sell to the plaintiff. The contract of sale therefore contained a further implied warranty that the goods sold were reasonably adapted to the purposes for which they were, with the knowledge of the defendant, purchased by the plaintiff. The rule is thus expressed in Robson v. Miller, 12 S. C. 586, 32 Am. Rep. 518:

"When one undertakes to manufacture for another an article of known value and use, it is an implied condition of the contract that it shall be fit for the use to which it is commonly put."

And in Paint Co. v. Bennett-Hedgpeth Co., 85 S. C. 492, 67 S. E. 740:

"If there had been no testimony of an express warranty, the law would have implied a condition that the articles were merchantable and reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were intended."

In 24 R. C. L. 509, it is declared:

"The manufacturer should be and is held to a higher degree of care than the dealer in putting on the market dangerous compounds, because he knows or should be charged with notice of the quality and contents of the article that he manufactures, and, being the originator of it, should be required to give notice of the danger in its use, if it is dangerous."

"When, however, the buyer does not designate any specific article, but orders goods of a particular quality, or for a particular purpose, and that purpose is known to the seller, the presumption is that the buyer relies upon the judgment of the seller; and the latter, by undertaking to furnish the goods, impliedly undertakes they shall be reasonably fit for the purpose for which they are intended." 24 R. C. L. p. 188.

"If a thing be ordered of the manufacturer for a special purpose, and it be supplied and sold for that purpose, there is an implied warranty that it is fit for that purpose." R. C. L. p. 192.

"The fact that the buyer has not paid the price, when the sale is on credit, does not itself preclude him from suing the seller, and this has been held true where the buyer gave his negotiable note for the price which was transferred by the seller and judgment thereon recovered against the buyer, which on account of his present insolvency was unsatisfied." 24 R. C. L. 234, citing Volland v. Baker, 32 Neb. 391, 49 N. W. 381, 13 L. R. A. 140.

"When a buyer confiding in a warranty has suffered consequential loss, the damages should make good the defects in the property sold, and also such additional loss as is the direct consequence of the seller's breach of his warranty." 24 R. C. L. 256.

"It is settled law that, where an article or commodity is to be made or supplied to a purchaser for a particular purpose known to the seller, there is an implied warranty that it shall be reasonably fit and suitable for the purpose intended." Gold Ridge Co. v. Tallmadge, 44 Or. 34, 74 Pac. 325, 102 Am. St. Rep. 602, citing Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) 633, 686; 2 Schouler, Per. Prop. § 246; 10 A. & E. Enc. L. (1st Ed.) 149; Poland v. Miller, 95 Ind. 387, 48 Am. Rep. 730; McClamrock v. Flint, 101 Ind. 278; Bushman v. Taylor, 2 Ind. App. 12, 28 N. E. 97, 50 Am. St. 228.

"A manufacturer who sells an article of his own making impliedly warrants that it is free from latent defects arising from the process of manufacture or the use of defective material." Note to 102 Am. St. 615, citing Beers v. Williams, 16 Ill. 69; Bierman v. City Mills Co., 151 N. Y. 482, 45 N. E. 856, 37 L. R. A. 799, 56 Am. St. Rep. 636; Rodgers v. Niles, 11 Ohio St. 48, 78 Am. Dec. 290.

"Where a manufacturer contracts to supply an article of his own make or manufacture, to be applied to a particular purpose, so that the buyer necessarily trusts to the judgment and skill of the manufacturer, the law implies a warranty that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose to which it is to be applied." Note 102 Am. St. 617.

This implied warranty of fitness or adaptability is entirely independent of the question of the negligence of the manufacturer.

"The effect of an express warranty undoubtedly is to bind the seller absolutely for the existence of the warranted qualities. If an implied warranty is properly called a warranty, the consequences should be similar. It should make no difference, therefore, whether the seller was guilty of any fault in the matter. Such is the well-settled law of England." Williston, Sales, § 237.

After stating that the English rule is not followed in some jurisdictions, the author says:

"The English rule may seem somewhat harsh at first sight, but, on grounds of policy it is probably superior to any modification of it based upon negligence. If the buyer is compelled to contest the question of negligence with the seller, he will find it very difficult to recover. In the nature of the case the evidence will be chiefly in the control of the seller, and the expense of endeavoring to make out a case of this sort will be prohibitive in cases involving small amounts. Moreover, if the buyer cannot recover from the seller, he cannot recover from any one for the defective character of the goods which he has bought. The wrong done by the sale of defective material to the manufacturer who later sold the goods cannot form the basis of action by the ultimate buyer. Consequently the real wrongdoer who has caused the ultimate injury escapes. On the other hand, if the manufacturer is held to an absolute liability irrespective of negligence, it will unquestionably increase the degree of care which he will use, and if in any case he is compelled to pay damages for breach of warranty where the real cause of the defect was inferior material which he himself innocently purchased, he will have a remedy over against the persons who sold him this inferior material, and his damages will include whatever he himself has had to pay for breach of warranty. Thus the loss will be borne ultimately by the person who should be responsible."

[§-11] But if we should adopt the contention of the defendant's counsel that this is an action in tort, based upon the alleged negligence of the defendant, the result, so far as the directed verdict is concerned, must be the same. The plaintiff had the right, if he chose to do so, to waive the contract and sue upon the alleged tort. In doing so he assumed the burden of establishing negligence on the part of the defendant. The question thus arises: Has he produced sufficient evidence of this fact to require a submission of the issue to the jury? The defendant, as a manufacturer and seller, held itself out to the world as manufacturing a compound that was not only adapted to the purposes intended, but was free from deleterious elements. It was its active duty to see that the compound answered these implied representations. If an analysis by it of the various ingredients of the compound would have discovered the presence of a deleterious substance, was it its duty to make that analysis? Did it do so? Should it have known that borax was such a deleterious substance? If it did not, should it have known such fact? These questions raise issues of fact for the determination of the jury. The testimony shows that expert chemists are employed by other companies for this very purpose. Did the defendant have such a man? If not, was it not its duty to have done so? That it was the duty of the defendant to see that deleterious elements were not introduced into the compound is clear. The evidence tends to show that a deleterious element was introduced. The prima facie showing, therefore, is that the defendant breached its duty; and from that prima facie showing an instant presumption of negligence arises, as the presumption of negligence follows from the proof of an injury as the result of a defective appliance.

The judgment of this court is: (1) That the judgment in favor of the defendant bank against the plaintiff be affirmed; (2) that the judgment in favor of the defendant Cave be affirmed; (3) that the judgment in favor of the defendant Orangeburg Fertilizer Company be reversed; (4) that the case be remanded to the circuit court for a new trial upon the alleged cause of action of the plaintiff against Orangeburg Fertilizer Company.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff has filed a petition for a rehearing as to that portion of the judgment of this court affirming the direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant Planters' Bank upon the grounds:

(1) That there was testimony tending, at least, to show that at the time the notes were negotiated to the Planters' Bank they were in the physical possession of the Home Bank at Barnwell, and that for that reason the Planters' Bank was not entitled to occupy the position of a holder in due course.

(2) That there were such circumstances of suspicion in connection with the transfer as to put the Planters' Bank on notice, which, if pursued with ordinary diligence, would have led to knowledge of the maker's defense to the notes; that the Negotiable Instruments Act of 1914 (Laws 1914, p. 668) has changed the law which prevailed prior thereto, as declared in Bank v. Smith, 110 S. C. 462, 96 S. E. 690, 11 A. L. R. 1274.

[12] As to the first ground: The testimony of R. K. Jennings, vice president of the fertilizer company, is to the effect that the notes were payable at the Home Bank of Barnwell; that he forwarded them to that bank for collection prior to maturity; that prior to maturity and prior to negotiation he telephoned for their return; and that he took them to the Planters' Bank and discounted them, the bank requiring the indorsement of himself and Smoak, officers of the fertilizer company, in their individual capacities. He is uncertain as to the date of his recalling the notes, fixing it as September 24th or 25th, and he is evidently mistaken as to the date of the negotiation, fixing it as the 25th (about), the check itself in payment being dated the 24th. In view of the extreme improbability of the bank issuing its check before the actual indorsement of the notes and their delivery, and in view of the personal indorsements of Jennings and Smoak, which were not necessary in the simple process of collection, it does not admit of doubt but that the notes were actually delivered to the bank at the time of negotiation. In support of this fact, the testimony of the vice president of the bank, who concluded the negotiation, is clear and positive. He testified that the notes themselves were presented for discount; that it was a straight purchase, a business transaction; that he required the signatures of Jennings and Smoak as indorsers; that the notes were returned to the Barnwell bank by his bank for collection on October 22d; that he issued a check for the notes dated September 24th. His records show that on that day the notes were discounted and entries properly made. It is inconceivable that this transaction should have occurred while the notes were in the Barnwell bank and $4,800 paid out upon the promise of Jennings to get them from the Barnwell bank and have them indorsed by himself and Smoak.

The only shadow of opposition to the bank's positive statement, corroborated by the assignor of the notes, is the discrepancy in Jennings' testimony, to which we have adverted, and the vague and indefinite statement of the cashier of the Barnwell bank that "about September 25th" he received a telephone message from the fertilizer company to return the notes. His statement is not inconsistent with that of Jennings, for the entire transaction occurred on September 24th, "about" the time indicated by the cashier.

[13] As to the second ground: The Negotiable Instruments Act has not changed the well-established rule:

"That mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, without actual knowledge, or mere suspicion of an infirmity or defect of title, does not preclude a transferee from occupying the position of a holder in due course, unless the circumstances or suspicion are so cogent and obvious that to remain passive would amount to bad faith." 8 C. J. 501.

At page 504 it is declared also:

"The Negotiable Instruments Law expressly provides that, to constitute notice of an infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same, the person to whom it is negotiated must have had 'actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounts to bad faith.' This provision as to bad faith means that suspicion or facts putting a prudent person on inquiry are not sufficient to preclude one from being a holder in due course, and merely reiterates the common-law rule as laid down in nearly all of the states."

The petition attempts to discredit the authority of the case of Merchants' Bank v. Smith, 110 S. C. 462, 96 S. E. 690, 11 A. L. R. 1274, by reference to the fact that the decision was by a divided court. An examination of that decision will show that there was no difference of opinion as to the principle under discussion. The point in difference was the effect of there being unpaid installments of annual interest at the time of the transfer, which in the opinion of two members of the court was notice of an infirmity in the note.

It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed, and the stay of remittitur revoked.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Clarissa Broome (formerly Murray) and another against T. Moultrie Mordecai and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants Cyril V. Hawksford and the American Bonding Company appeal. Reversed as to Hawksford, and affirmed as to the American Bonding Company.

The following is the master's report:

On the 11th day of May, 1888, William James Murray, reciting his permanent residence at Saint Aubins, in the island of Jersey, but then temporarily residing at Fournies Nord, in the republic of France, executed and delivered an indenture, or "postnuptial agreement," assigning and setting over $125,000 of funds or property then held for him by Henry E. Young, as guardian, to the said Henry E. Young, of Charleston, S. C., and Francis Hawksford, of St. Helier, in the island of Jersey, kingdom of Great Britain, as trustees, on the terms and for the purposes set out in the said agreement, a copy of which is attached to the complaint herein as Exhibit A.

In proceedings in this court entitled James Ancrum Murray, by guardian ad litem, v. Clarissa Murray et al., referred to at length in the pleadings, necessary or expedient changes of trustees were made from time to time as authorized by the said indenture. By decree in said cause dated November 24, 1905, the defendants herein, T. Moultrie Mordecai and Cyril V. Hawksford, were appointed trustees, Mordecai being a resident of Charleston, and Hawksford, a son of the original trustee, Francis Hawksford, a resident of the Isle of Jersey. Mordecai and Francis Hawksford, whose death on the ____ day of ____, 1905, made a new appointment necessary, had been holding as trustees under bond of $100,000, with American Bonding & Trust Company of Baltimore City, as surety, at this time, by amendment of charter, known as American Bonding & Trust Company of Baltimore.

This decree of November 24, 1905, provides for the release of both trustees, Mordecai and Francis Hawksford, and their bond, upon delivery of the trust estate to the new trustees, Mordecai and Cyril Hawksford, evidenced by exhibit to the clerk of this court of receipt of T. Moultrie Mordecai, resident trustee, for himself and Cyril V. Hawksford, for such assets and property; further orders that the new trustees, before entering upon their duties as such, shall give and keep in force a bond in the sum of $100,000, with surety to be approved by the said master (then G. H. Sass, Esq.), conditioned for faithful performance by the trustees of their duties as prescribed by the terms of the decree; and further providing: "That as protection for said surety all the securities and properties of the estate shall be placed in the joint name of the trustees and such surety, or its attorney in fact duly authorized," etc. Bond was executed by the trustees, and by the American Bonding Company of Baltimore, as surety, approved by the master, and was delivered to the clerk, the required receipt exhibited by Mordecai, and the bond of Mordecai and Francis Hawksford, as trustees, and the American Bonding & Trust Company of Baltimore City as surety, was thereupon released and delivered up by the said clerk. Mordecai, for himself and Hawksford, vouched the accounts and securities of the estate before the master from time to time, up to the 30th day of December, 1916, the date of the last accounting.

Clarissa Broome (formerly Murray) the life beneficiary, and James Ancrum Murray, remainderman, filed their complaint in the instant action on the 7th day of February, 1919, and thereon an order of default as to the defendant Mordecai was entered, and the cause referred to the undersigned master July 2, 1919.

I have held references, the minutes of which, together with exhibits and affidavits offered, are herewith filed. I find that T. Moultrie Mordecai has absconded, and all efforts to locate the negotiable assets of the trust estate have been unavailing. The extent of the devastation can only be ascertained upon a careful audit of the trustees' accounts, and of certain deeds and mortgages found in his safe, and turned over to me and now in my possession. The defendant Hawksford alleges in his answer that no part of the assets of the estate have ever been in his possession, and I so find. No further accounting by the trustees can be hoped for. Pending the necessary audit, I am in this report considering the question of liability of the trustees and the surety, and will file a special report of audit hereafter. The last account, December, 1916, shows negotiable assets of $70,000 in round figures, consisting of city of Charleston bonds.

The defendant American Bonding Company of Baltimore denies all liability under the several defenses set up in its answer, and makes a tender of $1,900, the amount of premiums received on the bond with interest.

The appointment of Mordecai and Cyril Hawksford as trustees was made by this court, having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and may be said to have been made for, by, and with the consent of Clarissa Murray, if not directly by her, as a strict construction of the terms of the indenture might require. Her failure to appoint did not affect the right and duty of the court. The case of Tinsley v. Kirby, 17 S. C. 3, relied on, has no application, inasmuch as the bond there sued on was given for an office to which no appointment could be made.

The contention that the bond is and was void because signed by T. Moultrie Mordecai as attorney in fact cannot avail, specific authority to Mordecai having been shown. The position of this defendant as successor to the American Bonding & Trust Company of Baltimore City is interesting in connection with the record as it appears in the case of Murray v. Murray, and the attack on the validity of the bond. The giving of a new bond by Mordecai and Cyril Hawksford was prerequisite to qualification. The bonding company was then surety on bond of Mordecai and Francis Hawksford in the sum of $100,000, conditioned to account for this fund. Liability ceased under the old bond and attached under the new bond immediately upon compliance by the reappointed trustee, Mordecai, and the new trustee, Cyril Hawksford, with this and other provisions of the decree, and specifically the exhibit to the clerk of receipt of Mordecai, for himself and his newly appointed cotrustee, showing delivery of the assets of the estate to them. There was no change in the premiums regularly paid to the surety company out of the funds of the trust estate. Therefore, if no validity ever attached to the bond so given for the present trustees, there was no release of the prior bond given for Mordecai and Francis Hawksford as trustees, and it would be unnecessary to consider any question of liability of Cyril V. Hawksford for the devastavit of Mordecai, his cotrustee. Mordecai, as surviving trustee, in possession of the assets of the estate, either made the transfer authorized and directed by the decree of November 24, 1906, to Mordecai and Cyril Hawksford as trustees, with American Bonding Company of Baltimore as surety on the bond given as required by said decree, or he is still liable to account as trustee under the bond then in force, continued in force by its own terms and the acceptance of premiums. I am of the opinion that the bond so given was valid, and that liability of the surety thereunder accrued immediately upon the transfer which was sufficiently evidenced by the receipt of Mordecai for himself and Hawksford exhibited to the clerk of court.

By its allegations in the third and fourth paragraphs of its answer, the bonding company seeks to avoid liability on the ground that failure to deliver any part of the estate to it under the terms of the decree, coupled with the knowledge of plaintiffs as to the custody and manner of handling the estate, constituted a fraud in the procurement of the bond, and that defendant, having received no part of the estate, had no duty to perform, with particular reference to the holding of the assets of the estate in the joint names of the trustees and the surety. This provision was recommended by the master and inserted in the decree "for the protection of the surety," etc. It could be no more than a direction to or requirement of the trustees, the principals on the bond. If not waived by the surety, and the trustees failed to comply with this requirement of the court, it was a failure on their part to well and truly perform their duties as trustees, and for this the bonding company, as surety, is liable.

It is not necessary to discuss in this connection the power delegated to Mordecai as attorney in fact of the bonding company, because I find as matter of fact that, while it may be argued that the bonding company had knowledge of and acquiesced in the holding by Mordecai both as trustee and as their attorney in fact, there never was any holding of the estate in the joint names of the trustees and the bonding company. I find as matter of fact that this "protection" was waived by the surety. That it was not complied with was known to the agent of the bonding company (Mordecai), through whose agency the bond was issued, and by whom, as attorney in fact for the bonding company, the undertaking was assumed. It was known to their traveling auditor or representative, a Mr. Bode, who is shown by the testimony to have checked over at least a portion of the assets of the estate produced by and in the possession and sole control of Mordecai, and to have ascertained their negotiable nature. The fact that Mordecai's possession and sole control of these negotiable assets of the estate was also disclosed from time to time by his accountings for himself and Hawksford, and his exhibit to me on accounting, of the securities so held, when it was obvious from the accounts themselves, showing remittance of income to Cyril Hawksford in England, that Cyril Hawksford was not in a position to exercise with Mordecai joint custody and control of such funds and securities. Mordecai was the agent of the bonding company, resident in Charleston; his knowledge was their knowledge.

The situation between the bonding company and Mordecai was clearly this: The bonding company had implicit confidence in Mordecai, authorized and approved the bond in question, relied upon his stated accounting, and accepted the annual premium. It will be held strictly to that which it undertook to do for a money consideration, viz.: Hold the parties in interest harmless from any default of Mordecai as trustee.

Paragraph 5 of the answer of the bonding company denies liability on the ground that the original indenture was void under section 3672,

S. C. Revision of 1912. This is a portion of the statute 3, Henry VII, c. 4, for the protection of creditors, and it will be presumed to have been enacted by the Legislature of South Carolina for that purpose. I find that in no aspect has this statute any application to the facts in this case. Certainly a surety of trustees appointed by the court, under bond given to the court, cannot avail itself of its provisions for the purpose of avoiding liability after default.

With these points disposed of, the reliance of the bonding company seems to be in its position taken in argument that the defendant, Hawksford, is liable for the devastavit of his cotrustee, Mordecai. I find it to be the general rule that a cotrustee is held to the exercise of prudence, care, and diligence, and is held for such losses only as occur as a result of his acts or omissions. When charged with responsibility for losses, the court will be guided in its conclusion by the attendant circumstances. Crane-Boylston Co. v. Moses, 13 S. C. 569; Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C. 394, 7 Am. Rep. 26; Glover v. Glover's Ex'rs, McMul. Eq. 153.

The indenture creating the trust named Young, of Charleston, and Francis Hawksford, of the island of Jersey, as trustees, with provision for the appointment of new trustees, never less than two; that the trust fund might be invested in either American or English securities, and might be invested jointly in such trustees as appointed, or solely in the new trustee, "as the case may require." The fund was then invested in South Carolina, and so continued. Evident provision was made for convenience in handling and accounting and in remitting the income for the foreign beneficiaries. It appears that these beneficiaries reside abroad, and have never been in this country. The records of this court show that, upon the death of Francis Hawksford, and petition for a new appointment, Mordecai was the controlling and managing trustee, resident, and in possession. Cyril V. Hawksford was appointed to succeed his father, and Mordecai was reappointed. Mordecai was thereafter recognized as resident trustee in possession by authority of the court given him to surrender and to receive solely the proceeds of certain matured bonds held for the estate, and to execute and deliver conveyances of real estate belonging to the estate upon payment of the purchase price to him (Mordecai). The bonding company is chargeable with knowledge of this, and of the very evident fact disclosed by the entire record, that receipt of the corpus of the trust by Cyril Hawksford was never contemplated, and that his sole duties as trustee would and did consist of receiving the income, and such other sums as were allowed by the court, as forwarded to him by Mordecai, paying the same over to the parties entitled thereto. This course was followed under the régime of Mordecai and Francis Hawksford, for whom the defendant bonding company was surety, and was thereafter continued. The bond recites the pending cause of Murray v. Murray et al., and the order therein of November 24, 1905, and is conditioned that the said Mordecai and Hawksford, so appointed, "do and shall well and truly perform their duties as trustees as prescribed by the terms of said decree and of said deed of postnuptial settlement, and shall obey all orders of the court made or to be made in said cause." Further proceedings of the trustees and further orders in the said cause were under the security of the bond on which the defendant bonding company was surety, and were necessarily within knowledge of their agent, Mordecai.

This obligation of Cyril Hawksford is not, and cannot be, construed to be an undertaking by him to become surety for his cotrustee and coprincipal, Mordecai.

Applying the test of the numerous cases cited by the defendant, I can find no acts of either commission or omission by Hawksford that placed Mordecai in a position to dissipate or appropriate to his own use this fund. Had Hawksford failed to exercise such supervision of the nature of investments as the circumstances required, or approved of questionable and unauthorized investments for the trust fund, and loss thereby resulted, he would unquestionably be liable for that which was made possible by his wrongful conduct. But the facts and circumstances show not only that he relied on the accountings made from time to time by Mordecai for the trustees, but that the accountings so relied on were correct. In 1916, as shown by accounting, Mordecai had in his possession and solely under his control negotiable securities, city of Charleston bonds, of the value of about $70,000. If he had power of attorney from Cyril Hawksford, it in no way increased the hazard nor the danger of subsequent conversion of these securities to his own use by Mordecai.

The plaintiff beneficiaries cannot recover from Hawksford. They knew that he had none of the assets of the trust estate in possession except the income remitted to him from time to time by Mordecai and paid over to them. Had they acquiesced in this method and handling of the estate without the knowledge of the surety, then they might be estopped from proceeding against the surety for recovery of loss. I find, however, that the surety, in all the circumstances, is chargeable with this knowledge of the beneficiaries through the knowledge of its agent, Mordecai. It follows that the surety knew, or should have known, that this agent, Mordecai, was holding himself out to be its attorney in fact, and in fact exercising power as its attorney in fact not authorized by the written authority with which they now seek to limit their liability.

I repeat that the whole history of this fund, from the time the bonding company became surety for Whaley and Francis Hawksford, as trustees, up to the time the devastavit of Mordecai was disclosed, and the present action brought, shows that the American Bonding Company of Baltimore City, and its successor the present defendant, American Bonding Company of Baltimore, placed implicit faith, trust, and confidence in T. Moultrie Mordecai, and it is a sad duty which now falls upon the master herein, associated with him first in his office and afterwards for many years at this bar, to find and record that Mordecai was unworthy of the trust and shamefully abused it, forfeiting the high position that he had gained in the legal world as a practitioner and a recognized leader of this bar. It was this misplaced confidence, without connivance on the part of the beneficiaries or of the cotrustee, Cyril V. Hawksford, that made the devastavit of Mordecai possible. The bonding company should and will be held to answer, as surety, for the wrongful acts of its principal, its agent, its attorney in fact with limited power, but less limited in its exercise in fact, and its trusted counsel, ending another chapter in the fall of man, as a surety (and especially a commercial surety) is required and should expect to do when the two necessary things are established, as in this case—its valid undertaking as surety, and the default of its principal.

The basis for settlement will require an intricate accounting, which I ask leave to file, with a separate report thereon, when prepared.

The plaintiffs pray for the removal of the present trustees, and the transfer of the corpus of the estate to trustees in England, when and if appointed by the English courts. The original indenture foresees the possibility of this arrangement. This court would, of course, require a strict showing of the careful selection and appointment of English trustees by a court of competent jurisdiction, but I am of the opinion that upon such showing this court would authorize a transfer and delivery of the fund to such trustees, the beneficiaries, resident in England, being enabled thereby the more conveniently to receive the income and to observe the conduct of the trust. I respectfully recommend that the present trustees be removed, and that the beneficiaries be authorized to institute proceedings before the proper English tribunal for the appointment of new trustees, and to have such proceedings certified to this court when completed.

I further recommend that by decree herein the defendants T. Moultrie Mordecai and American Bonding Company of Baltimore be held jointly and severally liable to the beneficiaries for such sum as may hereafter be found to be devastated committed by T. Moultrie Mordecai by audit to be hereafter filed; that the master herein be authorized to receive and receipt for any and all sums that may be due from any source to the trust estate of William James Murray, and to remit to the life tenant, Clarissa Broome, from time to time so much and such parts thereof as he may find to be due to the said life tenant as income, the balance to be held subject to the further order of the court.

FitzSimons & FitzSimons, of Charleston, for appellant Hawksford.

Nathans & Sinkler, of Charleston, for appellant American Bonding Company.

Miller, Huger, Wilbur & Miller, of Charleston, for respondents.

FRASER, J. The amount involved in this case is large; the record is large, and the arguments are strong and extended; but, in view of the full statement of facts set forth in the master's report (let it be reported), it will be necessary only to write in general terms.

William James Murray, a British subject living abroad, was entitled to a fund of $125,000 that was under the control of the courts of South Carolina. He made a conveyance of the fund to the two trustees, one a resident of Charleston, S. C., and the other a resident of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, living on Jersey Island.

From time to time there was a change of trustees, until T. Moultrie Mordecai, of Charleston, S. C., and Cyril V. Hawksford, of Jersey Island, were appointed, and administered the trust for a while. The funds of the trust estate were invested in South Carolina securities and lands located in Charleston. T. Moultrie Mordecai, the resident trustee, had actual possession of the property. He collected the income and forwarded it to the English trustee for payment to the cestui que trust. Under an order of the court here, the trustees gave bond in the sum of $100,000 with the American Bonding Company, of Baltimore, as surety. In this matter Mr. Mordecai occupied a threefold position. He was the resident trustee, the attorney in fact, and also the attorney at law for the bonding company. The bonding company put the whole thing in Mr. Mordecai's hands to do with as he pleased. The thing that he did do was to appropriate all the securities to his own use and abscond.

This action is brought for an accounting, for the judgment for any deficiency, and to remove the trustees and to move the fund to England. The case was referred to the master, who found that the foreign trustee was not liable, but that Mr. Mordecai was liable as principal and the bonding company was liable as surety. On appeal to the court of common pleas, the trial judge reversed the master as to the foreign trustee. This appeal is from the circuit decree, and raises two general questions: (1) Is the foreign trustee liable for the default of the resident trustee? (2) Is the bonding company liable?

[1] I. Is the foreign trustee liable for the default of the resident trustee? The answer is, He is not. The rule is laid down in Miller v. Sligh, 10 Rich. Eq. 247:

"When there are joint trustees, the general rule is that each is liable for his own acts alone, and not for the acts of his cotrustees, except where he has contributed to them."

The terms of the trust contemplated the use of the fund for the support of the cestui que trust as their respective interests might appear. The fund was to be held in South Carolina, interest collected here, and sent to England for the support of the party entitled. The foreign trustee never had possession of the corpus. The record shows that it was never in the contemplation of any of the parties of the trust deed or any proceeding in court that the foreign trustee should get possession of the corpus. The resident trustee was permitted to receipt to the former trustees for the corpus in his own name and also in the name of the foreign trustee. When the income was past due and unpaid, the foreign trustee began promptly to urge payment of the income, and notified the bonding company of the default, and did all he could to protect the trust estate. The foreign trustee could not have acquired possession of the fund and taken it out of the jurisdiction of the courts of this state without the proper and well-recognized procedure for the transfer, and this would have taken more time than was allowed by the resident trustee. There is no testimony to show any want of diligence on the part of the foreign trustee, Mr. Hawksford, and there is no basis for finding him liable for the defalcation of the resident trustee.

[2] II. Is the bonding company liable for the default? It is liable. The court gave to the bonding company ample protection. The court allowed the bonding company to secure a joint deposit, in bank, of the funds of the estate in the joint names of itself and the trustees. It did not avail itself of the protection. The bonding company made it possible for Mr. Mordecai to do just what he did do. Even when the foreign trustee notified the bonding company that the resident trustee was not performing his duty, the bonding company notified Mr. Mordecai of the complaint against him; that pressure would be brought to bear on him; and practically notified him to make a clean sweep, if he had not already done so, and get away. A large part of the income was from municipal bonds of the city of Charleston (this the bonding company knew), and a failure to pay over an income so derived demanded prompt investigation. The bonding company could not escape liability even if it were liable only for gross negligence.

The bonding company complains that there was error in holding that the bonding company waived the joint control of the trust fund. This holding is abundantly sustained by the record, and there is no evidence that the cestui que trust waived anything.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed as to the liability of the foreign trustee, Hawksford, and affirmed as to the liability of the bonding company. Cyril V. Hawksford is not liable, and the American Bonding Company of Baltimore is liable.

McIVER v. THOMPSON et al. (No. 10710.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 20, 1921.)

4. Judicial sales §31(2)—Objections may be made until sale is confirmed.

When a judicial sale is ordered by court, it is the duty of the person empowered to execute the deed to file a report of the sale showing compliance with the order, which report must be confirmed by the court in order to make the deed valid, and until that is done parties to the action may object to confirmation.

2. Judicial sales §31(3) — Confirmation relates back and cures irregularities not jurisdictional or based on fraud.

Confirmation of sale gives the sale judicial sanction and relates back to time of sale, and cures all defects and irregularities not jurisdictional or founded on fraud.

3. Infants §85—Guardian ad litem to defend should act as he might act for himself.

A guardian ad litem should look after the infants' interests and act for them in the suit as he might act for himself, and make as vigorous a defense as the nature of the cause permits after acquainting himself with the rights of his wards.

4. Infants §41—Where rights of infants were not protected in manner required by law, sale of their land by judicial decree will not be confirmed.

Where it was not the intention of any of the parties to the sale of land belonging to infants that the infants were to receive any money or benefit, but that the proceeds of the sale were to be used to satisfy indebtedness incurred on mortgage for which the infant remaindermen were in no way liable, and that the rights of the infants were not protected by their guardian ad litem in the manner required by law, a sale of their land by judicial decree in a former action will not be confirmed.

5. Infants §41—Purchaser, examining records not showing confirmation of judicial sale of infants' land is not purchaser for value without notice.

Where purchaser bought land belonging to minors after an examination of the records, which did not show that a sale made under judicial decree by their guardian who was also their guardian ad litem had been confirmed, the purchaser is not entitled to the protection of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Suit by John K. McIver against Fannie M. Thompson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, certain defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The following is the decree of the circuit judge:

This matter comes before me on the report of the special referee, exceptions thereto by both sides, and a motion made by the Thompson heirs in the original cause of Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company, Plaintiff, v. Fannie M. Thompson et al., to open said judgment in such former case. The action here is for partition, and by the pleadings as originally framed presented a two-sided contest between John K. McIver and the Thompson heirs on the one side, and the Thompson heirs and the Scott Lumber Company on the other. During the pendency of this action, and before its decision by the referee, the Thompson heirs abandoned their contest against the plaintiff, John K. McIver, thereby narrowing the issues to those between the defendants, the Thompson heirs and the Scott Lumber Company. As the referee rightly says, "In justice to the plaintiff, J. K. McIver," it should be said "that the testimony shows that there was no basis for the allegation made in the answer of the Thompson heirs, that there should be an accounting, as no money went into his hand for which he was liable which he did not pay over to them. The testimony further shows that the sale about which this controversy centers was negotiated by Col. H. T. Thompson, the father of the Thompson defendants, while the plaintiff in this case was living in Moultrie, Ga., and that he had nothing to do with the sale, further than to execute a deed to his one-half interest in remainder in the timber in order to pay the mortgage on the place for which he and others were liable." Here I refer to the mortgage to L. M. Davis.

The lands involved consist of about 3,000 acres in Marlboro county, of which 1,200 to 1,500 acres, most of it in swamp, are timber lands; and a tract of — acres in the county of Chesterfield. The fee to both these tracts is vested the one half in John K. McIver, and the other half in equal proportions in the Thompson heirs; but the issues between the Thompson heirs and the Scott Lumber Company concern only the Marlboro county tract. In 18—, I. D. Wilson and his wife, then the owners of the Marlboro county lands, conveyed the same by deed to their daughter, Hannah J. McIver, for life, and at her death to her children; the child or children of a deceased child to represent the parent. Hannah J. McIver had two children, to wit, John K. McIver and Fannie McIver. Fannie married Henry T. Thompson, died 18—, leaving four children, to wit, Fannie, Carrie, Eliza, and Lucy—the ones mentioned as defendants in this present action with the other defendant, Scott Lumber Company, against which corporation they file their cross-action. The life tenant, Hannah J. McIver, died A. D. 1916, and John K. McIver, her child, is still living and is the plaintiff in this action. Before the death of Fannie, she, her mother, Hannah J. McIver, her husband, Henry T. Thompson, and her brother, John K. McIver, all joined in the execution of a mortgage to one Mrs. L. M. Davis. Thereafter, the income of the family being small and less than its needs, it was agreed that J. K. McIver should take charge of the place and farm for the purpose and benefits of the family. These farming operations were not successful, and another mortgage was given to one Salinas & Sons to secure the said advance for such operations. In 1902 the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company made a contract with Hannah J. McIver and John K. McIver for the purchase of their rights in the timber on the lands, and received from them a deed to such interest. The contract price for the timber on the entire tract was $1,650. At the times of this contract and the deed from Hannah J. and Jno. K. McIver, Fannie Thompson was dead, so that it became necessary to obtain an order of court to pass the interest of her children, which children owned a one-half vested interest in remainder in said lands and timber. Jno. K. McIver and his mother made deed as aforesaid, and a suit was brought by the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company, as plaintiff, by their attorney, T. W. Boucher, now deceased, against the four children of Fannie Thompson, who at the time were all minors, alleging the deed from

Jno. K. McIver and his mother, the price to be paid, $1,650; that such was the fair, market value of the timber; that it was to the benefit of the minors that the proposed sale be made; that the adults interested were satisfied with the price; that there was a mortgage on the lands that must be paid; and ended with the usual prayer for relief. The following is the allegation of the complaint in such former action with which the Thompson heirs find fault: "These plaintiffs are informed that there is a mortgage on said property, the same having been executed by the life tenant and remaindermen to Mrs. L. M. Davis, during the lifetime of Mrs. Fannie McIver Thompson, and that a portion of said purchase money is to be used in liquidating said mortgage. The plaintiff further alleges that the cash paid for the said timber will be of more benefit to the said minors than to leave the said timber in its present condition; that the funds so paid, reinvested, will amount to more than the value of the timber at the time they arrive at full age, should the same increase in value."

The summons and complaint in the original case are now on file, recorded and attached thereto is the usual notice to minors, except that such is not addressed to any particular person, or persons, while the return of service made on a blank form on the back of the summons refers only to the service of the summons and complaint, and is silent as to the service of this notice. Service is accepted on back of original by H. T. Thompson, the father of the children. The oldest child, Fannie, being the only one over 14 years of age, duly petitioned for the appointment of H. T. Thompson, her father, as her guardian ad litem, and the father petitioned himself for his own appointment as guardian ad litem for his other three children. He was accordingly so appointed, and the case was referred to a special referee, who held reference and reported his conclusions of law and facts. The referee held that $1,650 was the fair market value of the timber; that it was most for the benefit of the minors that the timber be sold; that the plaintiff should have 20 years within which to remove said timber, and recommended that "the guardian ad litem, who is the father of the defendants" (the Thompson heirs), "be authorized and empowered by this court to convey, by way of deed, to the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company, the interest of said remaindermen in the timber on the terms and conditions mentioned in the complaint, and that upon the payment of the said sum of $1,650 by the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company to the parties in interest that the said deed be delivered." Judge Klugh, in confirming this report, ordered that the said "Henry T. Thompson, Esq., guardian ad litem of the infant defendants, Fannie McIver Thompson, Eliza Cornelia Thompson, Lize Clarkson Thompson, and Lucy McIver Thompson, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to execute and convey to the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company, a corporation, the interest of the defendants above mentioned as remaindermen in the timber on all the lands mentioned and described in the complaint designated and known as the Red Hill Plantation, in Marlboro county, upon the said Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company paying to the life tenant and the remaindermen the sum of $1,650."

The complaint in this action could have been better drawn, could have set out that the Thompson heirs had only a one-half interest in remainder and asked for a partition of the $1,650 and a determination of the correct proportions coming to the said children; but that it did not do so, referred to the trade as a whole, and alleged all facts as if the adults who had given their deed were also before the court—certainly constitutes no vice in the pleadings or judgment and cannot go to the question of jurisdiction as claimed by the Thompsons. The complaint did not ask as contended by the Thompson heirs, nor was it so construed by the court, as shown by its final order, that their money be taken for the payment of the debt of others, but alleged the transaction as a whole, and stated what was a fact that there was a mortgage on the lands to Mrs. L. M. Davis to be paid before a good title could be given. This was true, and Jno. K. McIver swore that he expected to get none of the money, but for his portion to be paid on the amount due. In fact, the referee, and certainly the circuit judge, were careful to protect the interest of the remaindermen and to provide that the money be paid to the parties in interest, or, as the circuit judge decreed, "to the life tenant and the remaindermen." There is nothing in the judgment, or in the record of the case, to show that it was contemplated that the interest of the minors should be taken for the payment of the debts of others, where the order of the circuit judge and the report of the referee is conclusive that the intention was to preserve the interest of the minors in the proceeds of timber sale, and that their interest should be paid to them. As held by the referee, the circuit judge could do nothing else. The court had jurisdiction, all parties were before the court, a final order, from which there was no appeal, was issued, and the case has remained on record for 18 years. This judgment is a verity, and there is no vice therein, and is a judgment forever, conclusive as to all issues therein raised, and res adjudicata as to all parties before the court on all such matters. It has been found by the special referee that the $1,650 was at the time a full and fair price for the timber. I concur in this finding, but even if such were not so (and I think there can be no two opinions in regard to the same under the testimony), inadequacy of price is not alone sufficient to set aside a judicial sale. I do not see how I, acting as a chancellor in a court of equity, could, under all the facts of this case, agree to reopen the judgment at this time, and this regardless of the fact that this action was begun over 2 years ago when the Thompson heirs stated in their answer to the complaint that the case should be stayed until they could make a motion in the original cause, which motion they failed for 2 years to make, and while the time for cutting was running against the Scott Lumber Company, which had paid its money in good faith; and regardless, also, of the fact that such notice in the original cause, when served, was served only on the Scott Lumber Company a few days before the hearing of this case and no effort was apparently made to bring in the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company, the original purchasers.

I hold the judgment in this case of Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company v. Fannie M. Thompson et al. is good, valid, effectual, and subject to neither direct nor collateral attack.

But this does not dispose of what the referee properly terms the pivotal point in the case, that is, is the deed from H. T. Thompson, as guardian ad litem of the Thompson heirs, to the lumber company valid? On all other questions decided by the referee I concur in his holdings and confirm the same for the reasons given by him. In this I think the special referee is in error, and so hold.

In holding that this deed was not good, the referee bases his conclusions on the undoubted principle of law that where "the court has made an order of sale, of which a notice is to be given by advertising for a given time, such direction as well as the other terms become the law of the case. It becomes the condition on which the authority is to be exercised, the nonperformance of which will destroy the power." I have considered this case as if such principle of law were applicable to this case, and am basing my conclusions herein on such authority, though I cannot but have some doubt whether the failure to advertise for 21 days, or the failure to do some other act, could be proven after 18 years had elapsed against a subsequent innocent purchaser for value by evidence extrinsic of the records under which he purchased. The referee held that the conditions precedent to the making of the deed by the guardian ad litem were not complied with because the money was not paid to the parties in interest in said suit; that is, to the remaindermen, the Thompson heirs, as provided by the order. Was it? I think so, and must so hold. It could only be paid into court or to their general guardian.

Henry T. Thompson was the general guardian of his four children, regularly appointed by the judge of probate for Darlington county in 1898, qualified, gave bond, and has never been discharged. His eldest daughter, the only one who testified in this case, swore that he was their guardian, that she knew it, but had never called on him for an accounting. The records do not show how the money was applied, except for $774 paid into court and practically all applied to the Davis mortgage, the only one mentioned in the complaint. The deed from Henry T. Thompson, as guardian ad litem, acknowledged receipt of the payment of the full amount, and he was enjoined by the order of the court in this very case not to make the deed until the money had been paid to these minors. Mr. Bouchier is dead. Mr. McKeithan, the president of the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company at the time of the transaction, testified as to how he thought the money had been applied; but his statements are contradictory, though he seems certain that to whomsoever the check might have been made payable it was delivered to Henry T. Thompson, who, with his children, were living at the time in Darlington with Hannah J. McIver, the life tenant. Mr. McKeithan is a resident of Darlington county. Henry T. Thompson, in such county, was appointed and there qualified as the general guardian of his four children. Mr. Bouchier attended to the suit in Marlboro county, and it is doubtful whether the plaintiff ever saw any of the papers in the original suit other than his original complaint, yet the referee holds that because in his application to be appointed the guardian ad litem in this suit he stated they had no general guardian, that the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company dealt with him as guardian ad litem alone. It seems to me that the facts are the other way. Fannie Thompson also stated in her petition for the appointment of a guardian ad litem that she had no general guardian, but testified that she knew her father was her guardian and her father a lawyer; both the natural and legal guardian of his children, and their guardian ad litem in this case, the man who negotiated the entire trade, closed it up, represented his children, lived with the life tenant, the man who was liable on the Davis mortgage, did not appear as a witness. He who, above all others, would know as to the application of the funds, how he dealt and was dealt with; he who apparently furnished letters to his children to use in their cross-action against Jno. K. McIver, which cross-action they abandoned; he who under his hand and seal acknowledged the receipt of the money and caused such receipt to be spread on the records of Marlboro county after having been directed to do so only after the money had come into his hands, or the hands of others as the guardian of his children—does not appear to testify in the suit of his children when it is only reasonable to believe that he was familiar with every detail of it, must have realized the importance of his testimony and had full opportunity to find out that Mr. McKeithan had testified that the money or check had been turned over to him. Yet, Col. Thompson, who did not testify, is a licensed attorney and living in the state of South Carolina. We are in equity. Persons coming in this court must do so with clean hands. The one person who could set at rest all questions as to who he dealt and was dealt with refuses, or fails, to be sworn as to his relations in a fiduciary capacity with his own children. Even if it were a fact that he stood by and approved the application of this money which was in his hands and under his control, and allowed it to be diverted and paid on the debts of others, I could not escape the conclusion that he, as their father, their natural and legal general guardian, intended to assume, and did thereby assume, the obligation to account to his children for such fund, and perhaps has accounted by expenditures from his own funds for their benefit for all so received. But being satisfied as I am that the purchase price was paid by the purchasers to Henry T. Thompson, the natural guardian, the general guardian, and the guardian ad litem of his children, the Thompson heirs, and that the terms of the order have been complied with, I could not feel justified in refusing to confirm the said sale, and the same is hereby confirmed.

The Scott Lumber Company are subsequent purchasers. They purchased only after an examination of the records. Some faith and credit must be given to the records provided by the Legislature and the judgments of the courts of this state. I hold that the Scott Lumber Company are subsequent purchasers for value, that the money was paid in accordance with the conditions of the former order, and that the deed from Henry T. Thompson to the Scott Lumber Company is good and valid.

But even if I am wrong in this, how can it be said that the judgment in the case of the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company v. Fannie M. Thompson et al. is not good? The only thing about it and the entire transaction that can be even assailed is the deed. The judgment is res adjudicata as to all matters raised, passed on, or determined. The terms of Judge Klugh's order are specific. The guardian was authorized and also directed to execute a proper deed to the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company. Under such order it was the duty of Thompson, as guardian ad litem, to execute and convey the interest contemplated in the order, by a proper deed, and not to deliver the deed before the payment to the proper party. Until this was done the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company could not be forced to pay. If payment was not made properly, it was because of an honest mistake on their part, and as was said in the case of Tompkins v. Tompkins, 39 S. C. 537, 18 S. E. 233, relied on by the Thompson heirs:

"Now, if there is one thing over others in our system of jurisprudence that merits the commendation of all, it must be the flexibility of the principles adopted by courts of equity, by which they are made to subserve the needs of each particular case. Ought not those principles to be applied here? It seems so to us. Under our law, William Parks, by being a successful bidder at the sale provided for by a decree in this cause, has, to a certain extent, become a party to this action. His money has been paid into court and used for the purposes of this action, under an honest mistake, it is true. Only one party seeks any relief against him. The circuit judge orders a new sale, without any provision being made for his (Parks') protection. This is error, and must be rectified."

And in this case just cited the Supreme Court went as far as it could possibly go to protect the purchaser. The only reason that the sale was not confirmed without a further sale was that the statute and the order required a notice of 21 days, and the purpose of the sale by such method and at public auction was mandatory to fix the price. Here not only was the statute not mandatory, but $1,650 was the only price that could be obtained, or that could be paid because that was and is res adjudicata as to the parties, and the infants could receive their portion thereof and none other. Under no view of the case could the portion of the Thompson heirs have been more than one-half, or $825. As stated before, resale cannot be ordered, for the price has been adjudicated as well as the fact that the conveyance must be by private sale and to a particular person, a party to the original action who acquired rights thereof and whose rights were adjudicated. The only thing the Thompson heirs could now do would be to object to the confirmation of the sale—there having been no confirmation thereof to this day. The case of Tompkins v. Tompkins, supra, is, indirectly, authority also for this. They are in a court of equity and yet, instead of following this, the proper procedure, they seek to obtain all of the benefits and impose upon the successor in title to the Bridgers & McKeithan Lumber Company all of the hardships of the case. If the matter were now before me on objection of the Thompson heirs to the confirmation of the sale, I do not see how, as a chancellor in a court of equity, even if the terms of the order in this former case had not been complied with, and the money had not been paid because of an honest mistake, anything could be done other than to require the execution of another deed to the Scott Lumber Company upon the payment of the sum of $825 with legal interest thereon from the date of the execution of the other deed. But being satisfied as I am that the purchase price was paid by the purchaser to Henry T. Thompson, the natural, the general guardian, and the guardian ad litem of the Thompson heirs, and that the terms of the order have been complied with, I confirm the said sale.

The plaintiff's complaint prays that the partition of the lands be had in such way as to portion both the tracts of land and timber in equal parts between the plaintiff and the defendants Thompson. Under the facts and holdings herein it is clear that the plaintiff is entitled to such partition.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that a writ of partition do issue from this court in the usual form directed to five commissioners to be chosen in the usual way, that is to say, two by the plaintiff, two by the defendants Thompson, and one by the clerk of the court; and that said commissioners do proceed with calling to their assistance a surveyor, if one be necessary, and divide the tract of land in Marlboro county into two equal parts, regard being had to the value of the land without timber, and not as to quantity; and that the tract of land in Chesterfield county be divided into two equal parts in the same mode and manner, and that they set apart and allot to the plaintiff the one half of each of the tracts of land, and to the defendants Thompson the other half of the two tracts of land.

Ordered, further, that in making such partition of the said lands that the partition be made in such way as to divide both the arable and the timbered lands in equal proportions in so far as the same is practicable.

Ordered, further, the fee of the special referee which I fix at $400, be paid one half by the Scott Lumber Company and the other half by the Thompson heirs; and that all other costs be paid by the three parties in equal proportions, the Thompson heirs being collectively referred to as one party. I tax the two defendants with the referee's costs, inasmuch as they alone are directly concerned in the issues submitted to him.

Exceptions.

(1) The court erred in not opening and setting aside the judgment and sale when it appeared that the purpose of the action was to sell the property of the infant defendants and apply the proceeds to debts of others, and that they were so applied, and when there appeared no adequate reason for the sale, and it appeared to be, and was, detrimental to the interest of the defendants, and the court had no power or jurisdiction to render such decree.

(2) The court erred in not opening and setting aside the judgment and sale when it appeared that the appointment of the guardian ad litem was irregular, and that substantial injustice was done to the infant defendants.

(3) The court erred in holding that the money to be paid was a full and fair price for the infants' property.

(4) The court erred in not setting aside the judgment and sale, when no provision was made for the division of the proceeds nor for the preservation of the property of the infant defendants, and that it was intended that the proceeds were to be, and they were actually devoted to paying obligations which the defendants were not concerned in, and that the infant defendants got no part of the proceeds.

(5) The court erred in not setting aside, but, on the contrary, in confirming the deed, when the conditions precedent to the power to execute it prescribed by the decree, were not complied with, and when it was based on a void judgment and was not executed as required by the judgment.

(6) The Court erred in overruling the finding of the referee that before the deed to the plaintiff, lumber company, could be affirmed, they must have paid the parties in interest, and in setting it aside when it appeared that they had not done so.

(7) His honor erred in holding, if he meant so to hold, that J. K. McIver paid the Baker mortgage.

(8) His honor erred in holding that the Salinas mortgage was incurred for the benefit of the family with the inference that it was for the infant defendants, when there is no testimony on which to base such a holding.

(9) His honor erred in overruling the holding of the referee that the lumber company did not deal with Col. H. T. Thompson as guardian ad litem, and that he was functus officio.

(10) His honor erred in holding that the appellants did not come into court with clean hands, because Col. Thompson did not testify in the case.

(11) His honor erred in holding that if Col. Thompson stood by and allowed funds of the infant defendants to be diverted to the debts of others, it must be inferred that he intended to account to the infants, and that therefore they are bound, when such is not the law, and the testimony is that he did not have control of any such funds, and the lumber company was charged with the payment thereof to the parties in interest.

(12) His honor erred in holding that the predecessors of Scott Lumber Company failed to pay the money decreed to be paid as a precedent condition under a mistake when there is no evidence thereof.

(13) His honor erred in holding that it would be equitable to order the conveyance now upon payment to appellants of $825, when not only was this question not before him, but it would be inequitable—more than a reasonable time having elapsed.

(14) His honor erred in holding, if he meant to hold, that the Scott Lumber Company was a subsequent purchaser without notice, when they knew, or should have known, all the facts, and that the purchase money had not been paid to the infants.

(15) His honor erred in not holding that the granting of railroad privileges at all was void, because it went beyond the scope of the action, and was without consideration.

(16) He further erred in holding that the right to build more than one railroad was in fact allowed in the decree or granted by the deed.

(17) He erred in overruling the referee's recommendation as to partition, and in requiring the Marlboro land to be divided in two parts, without regard to the value of the timber, when, even if appellants' claim that the deed to the lumber company is void is not sustained, still there is no question that there are five tenants in common in the land, and there is timber on the land owned by all of said tenants, and that as to the Chesterfield land there is no question of the timber belonging to any one else.

McColl & Stevenson, of Bennettsville, for appellants.

Townsend & Rogers and S. S. Tison, all of Bennettsville, and W. P. Pollock, of Cheraw, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The facts herein are fully stated in the decree of his honor the circuit judge, which, together with the exceptions, will be reported.

The appellants also made a motion in the original cause to open the judgment and set aside the sale, which motion was heard by his honor, Judge Wilson, at the same time he heard the present case, and refused.

The first question we will consider is whether there was error in refusing said motion.

In his decree his honor, the circuit judge, says:

"The only thing the Thompson heirs could now do would be to object to the confirmation of the sale—there having been no confirmation thereof to this day. * * * Being satisfied as I am that the purchase price was paid by the purchasers to Henry T. Thompson, the natural, the general guardian, and the guardian ad litem of the Thompson heirs, and that the terms of the order have been complied with, I confirm the said sale."

[1, 2] His honor, the circuit judge, very properly considered the motion upon the merits. When a sale of land is ordered by the court, it is the duty of the person empowered by it to execute the deed, to file a report of sale, showing that he has complied with the requirements of the order. It is then necessary that there should be an order of the court confirming the report of sale. It is the order of confirmation that gives validity to the deed. Until these several steps are taken, the proceedings do not become res adjudicata, so as to prevent parties to the action from interposing objections to the confirmation of the sale. Kibler v. McIlwain, 16 S. C. 550. "The order of confirmation gives to the sale the judicial sanction of the court, and when made it relates back to the time of the sale and cures all defects and irregularities, except those founded on one of jurisdiction and fraud." Connor v. McCoy, 83 S. C. 165, 65 S. E. 257.

While we recognize the fact that his honor, the circuit judge, had the power and authority, and that it was indeed his duty, to consider the merits of the motion, we, however, are not satisfied with his conclusion that the sale should be confirmed. Col. Henry T. Thompson, the father of the appellants, represented them as their guardian ad litem.

[3, 4] The law as to the duty of a guardian ad litem is thus stated in 22 Cyc. 662:

"The duty of a guardian ad litem or next friend is to look after the infant's interest and to act for him in all matters relating to the suit as he might act for himself if he were of capacity to so do. The guardian ad litem should make a defense of the interests of the infant as vigorous as the nature of the case will admit. His duty requires him to acquaint himself with the rights, both legal and equitable, of his wards, and take all necessary steps to defend and protect them, and to submit to the court for its consideration and decision every question involving the rights of the infant affected by the suit. If in consequence of the culpable omission or neglect of the guardian ad litem the interests of the infant are sacrificed, the guardian may be punished for his neglect, as well as made to respond to the infant for the damage sustained."

This language is quoted with approval in Cagle v. Schaefer, 115 S. C. 89, 104 S. E. 321, in which Mr. Justice Hydrick, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

"In failing to perform their duty to defend the action in behalf of their wards the guardian ad litem of the infant defendants and their testamentary trustee were both guilty of culpable negligence, which would have subjected them to liability to their wards if any damage had resulted. A notion, which is entirely erroneous, seems to be prevalent that a guardian ad litem for infant defendants fully performs his duty when he files a formal answer, submitting their rights to the protection of the court."

Paragraph 5 of the complaint in the former action is as follows:

"That Mrs. Hannah McIver, the life tenant, and her son, John K. McIver, one of the remaindermen, have entered into a contract to sell to the plaintiff all the timber on the tract above described, but these plaintiffs are advised that they are unable to make a good title to said timber, without the aid of this honorable court, as the defendants above named also have an interest, and are minors under the age of 21 years, and cannot execute a title. That these plaintiffs have agreed to pay for said timber $1,650 in cash, upon the condition that they are given 20 years in which to remove the timber off said land."

Paragraph 7 of that complaint alleges:

"These plaintiffs are informed that there is a mortgage on said property, the same having been executed by the life tenant and remaindermen to Mrs. L. M. Davis during the lifetime of Mrs. Fannie McIver Thompson, and that a portion of said purchase money is to be used in liquidating said mortgage."

We desire to call special attention to this statement of facts in the decree of his honor, Judge Wilson:

"The life tenant, Hannah J. McIver, died A. D. 1916, and John K. McIver, her child, is still living, and is plaintiff in this action. Before the death of Fannie, she, her mother, Hannah J. McIver, her husband, Henry T. Thompson, and her brother, Jno. K. McIver, all joined in the execution of a mortgage to one Mrs. L. M. Davis."

It will be observed that the complaint omitted the fact that Col. Henry T. Thompson also joined in the execution of the mortgage. There was, also, another mortgage on the property, which is mentioned in Judge Wilson's decree.

The testimony satisfies us that the following are the facts in the case:

(1) That it was not the intention of any of the parties to the former action that the infant defendants were to receive any money or benefit whatever from the sale of the timber.

(2) That it was the intention of the parties that the proceeds arising from the sale of the timber was to be used in satisfaction of the indebtedness incurred by the mortgage above named, for which the infant remaindermen were in no wise liable.

(3) That the rights of the infants were not protected in the manner required by law.

[5] We call attention to this statement in the decree of Judge Wilson:

"The Scott Lumber Company are subsequent purchasers. They purchased only after an examination of the records. Some faith and credit must be given to the records provided by the Legislature, and the judgments of the courts of this state. I hold that the Scott Lumber Company are subsequent purchasers for value, that the money was paid in accordance with the conditions of the former order, and that the deed from Henry T. Thompson to the Scott Lumber Company is good and valid."

As the Scott Lumber Company purchased "only after an examination of the records," and as the records did not show that the sale made by Col. Henry T. Thompson had been confirmed, it (the Scott Lumber Company) is not entitled to the protection of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Furthermore, the recitals in the deed to its grantors under which it holds were sufficient, at least, to put the Scott Lumber Company upon inquiry.

This practically disposes of all the exceptions.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded to that court for the purpose of carrying into effect the conclusions herein announced.

JIMERSON v. TINCHER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Detinue §—Appropriate action to recover personal property procured by fraud.

Detinue is an appropriate action to recover personal property from one who has procured it by fraud.

2. Detinue §—Owner of personal property may recover it from party procuring it and in possession through fraudulent contract of sale.

An owner of personal property may maintain an action of detinue to recover the same from one who has procured it by means of a fraudulent contract of sale, at least so long as such property remains in the possession of the party guilty of the fraud.

3. Appearance §—9(4), 24(1, 11)—Defendant demurring to declaration makes general appearance, and waives defects in summons or return of service.

A defendant, by demurring to a declaration, makes a general appearance thereto, and thereby waives any defects or irregularities in the summons, or the return of service thereof.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Deo Jimeron against Ralph Tinch, in detinue, demurrer to declaration, and motion to quash summons overruled, and case certified. Overruling of demurrer and motion to quash affirmed.

Samuel Biern and John M. Biscoe, both of Huntington, for plaintiff.

RITZ, P. The circuit court of Cabell county, having overruled a demurrer to the declaration in this action of detinue, as well as a motion to quash the summons, certified the questions arising upon said demurrer and said motion to this court for its opinion thereon.

The suit has for its purpose the recovery of the possession of an automobile which it is claimed the defendant procured from the plaintiff through fraudulent representations and practices. The declaration alleges that on the 27th of March, 1920, plaintiff delivered to the defendant the automobile in question upon what purported to be a sale by the said plaintiff to one S. R. Chittam, of the city of Charleston; that the defendant represented to the plaintiff that he was authorized by Chittam to purchase the automobile for him for the sum of $1,700, and delivered to the plaintiff the check of Chittam for that amount in payment therefor, which check was accepted and a bill of sale executed by the plaintiff to the said S. R. Chittam, and the automobile delivered to the defendant; that at the instigation and request of the said defendant plaintiff indorsed the said $1,700 check of Chittam over to the defendant in order that the defendant might procure for the plaintiff certain mineral leases which the plaintiff desired, and which the defendant undertook to procure; that the said $1,700 check was immediately redelivered to the said S. R. Chittam, and was not used by the said defendant for the purpose for which it was delivered to him by the plaintiff; that the defendant never procured said mineral leases for the plaintiff; that the automobile remained in the possession of the defendant, Chittam never having taken possession thereof, and that the defendant had no authority from Chittam to purchase said automobile for him, and that all of his acts and practices above indicated were fraudulent, and for the purpose of securing plaintiff's automobile for his own use without paying therefor.

[1, 2] If, as is averred and necessarily inferred from the allegations of the declaration, the defendant falsely represented himself to be purchasing the automobile for Chittam, and fraudulently procured the return of the purchase price to himself, and made the other representations referred to for the purpose, as alleged, of procuring plaintiff's automobile without paying for it, he was guilty of the commission of a fraud upon the plaintiff's rights, and of course upon the discovery of this fraud plaintiff could rescind the contract and demand the return of his property, and that is what he did. In case of a refusal to deliver the same, detinue is an appropriate action to recover the specific property. It is universally held that detinue will lie to recover specific personal property obtained from the owner by any sort of fraudulent device or misrepresentation, at least so long as it remains in the possession of the party guilty of the fraudulent practice. 18 C. J. pp. 994, 995; 9 R. C. L. tit. "Detinue," § 4; Morrison, Herriman & Co. v. Adoue & Lobit, 76 Tex. 255, 13 S. W. 166; Reid, Murdock & Fisher v. Cowduroy, 79 Iowa, 169, 44 N. W. 351, 18 Am. St. Rep. 359; Blake v. Blackley, 109 N. C. 257, 13 S. E. 786, 26 Am. St. Rep. 566; Myers v. Friend & Scott, 1 Rand. (22 Va.) 12; Southern Hardware & Supply Co. v. Lester, 166 Ala. 86, 52 South. 328; Mansell's Adm'r v. Israel, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 510; Sleeper v. Davis, 64 N. H. 59, 6 Atl. 201, 10 Am. St. Rep. 377. If the defendant procured this property in the manner indicated above, that is, by falsely representing that he was procuring it for another, and then by fraudulently securing to himself the purchase price for a purpose to which he did not intend to apply it, there can be no doubt of the plaintiff's right to rescind the contract and demand and receive back in an action of detinue the specific personal property, it appearing from the declaration that it was in the possession of the defendant at the time of the institution of the suit. The defendant's brief is based entirely upon the assumption that he did not do the things charged against him in the declaration, and of course if that assumption should turn out to be true, an entirely different condition will be presented from that presented by the declaration. At this time we are passing upon a demurrer to the declaration which admits everything stated therein to be the truth, as well as every legitimate and necessary inference arising therefrom.

[3] After the defendant's demurrer to the declaration was overruled he moved to quash the summons upon the ground that the value of the property sued for was not stated therein, which motion was overruled. The action of the circuit court in this regard was correct. The defendant, by demurring to the declaration, entered a general appearance thereto, and the summons became functus officio. The question of the sufficiency thereof was simply a moot question, and the defendant was not entitled to have the judgment of the court thereon at that stage of the proceeding. Having demurred to the declaration, he had entered a general appearance, and the question as to the sufficiency of the summons became entirely immaterial. A general appearance waives any insufficiency in the summons or the return of service thereon. Danser v. Mallonee, 77 W. Va. 26, 86 S. E. 895; Fulton v. Ramsey, 67 W. Va. 321, 68 S. E. 381, 140 Am. St. Rep. 969; Frank v. Zeigler, 46 W. Va. 614, 33 S. E. 761. Any appearance in the suit, except to challenge the jurisdiction of the court, is a general appearance, and confers upon the court the authority to proceed with the controversy, regardless of any defect in the process by which the defendant is brought in. In fact the defendant may appear to the declaration without process at all. The function of the summons is simply to bring him into court, and if he comes upon an irregular summons, or without any summons, and invokes the court's jurisdiction for any purpose, he thereby waives the necessity for a summons, or any irregularity therein.

It follows from what we have said that the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration, and in overruling the motion to quash the summons was correct, and we answer the questions certified accordingly.

STATE ex rel. TRAVIS v. MAXWELL,
Judge, et al. (No. 4428.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Husband and wife  $\S$  295—Mandamus  $\S$  4(3)
—Wife, suing for separate maintenance and support, entitled to allowance for suit money, and on refusal mandamus to compel allowance will lie.

In a suit by the wife against her husband for separate maintenance and support, not involving divorce, she is entitled to reasonable allowances for suit money and for her support pendente lite, and upon the refusal of the trial court to make such allowances against the defendant, she may have a writ of mandamus to compel such allowances as are reasonable and proper in the case.

Original application by the State, on the relation of Lavina T. Travis, for a writ of mandamus against Haymond Maxwell, Judge, and others, to require the court to make a reasonable allowance for expenses while prosecuting a suit against petitioner's husband, R. A. Travis, for separate support and maintenance. Writ awarded.

McCamic & Clarke, of Wheeling, and Albert L. Lohm, of Clarksburg, for relator.

Hoffheimer & Templeman, of Clarksburg, for respondent.

MILLER, J. The petitioner seeks by original process of mandamus from this court to require the respondent to make her a reasonable allowance for expenses and for her support while prosecuting her suit in his court against Robert A. Travis for separate support and maintenance, on the ground of his desertion of her without cause.

According to the return of respondent he was constrained to deny the petitioner suit money and money for her separate maintenance pendente lite on the ground that she had no suit pending for divorce, and that he felt bound by the ruling of this court in Chapman v. Parsons, 66 W. Va. 307, 68 S. E. 461, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1015, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1033, 19 Ann. Cas. 453, in which it was said, point one of the syllabus, that "in no suit but one seeking a divorce of some character is there jurisdiction to award alimony pendente lite." That was not a suit for divorce, but an original suit to set aside a decree of divorce previously obtained by the husband against his wife. The marital relation between them had by that decree been dissolved and the relationship destroyed thereby, and the real question there involved was whether the plaintiff in that kind of a suit was entitled to suit money and maintenance pending the suit. The point may have been too broadly stated, therefore, and must be interpreted as applicable only to like cases. Strictly speaking, alimony, temporary or permanent, is an incident to a suit for divorce.

In the later case of Lang v. Lang, 70 W. Va. 205, 73 S. E. 716, 88 L. R. A. (N. S.) 950, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1129, however, we decided that courts of equity have jurisdiction, upon the ground of inadequate remedy at law, independently of any proceedings for divorce, to decree maintenance to a wife who has been deserted by her husband. So the question presented here is whether, pending a suit of the latter character, in no way involving divorce, and when the marital relation still exists, the wife, as incident thereto, is entitled to reasonable allowance for separate maintenance and to carry on her suit. Clearly, she is entitled to be supported by her husband while the marital relation exists, and to enforce her rights by suit, no other remedy being provided. The exact point now presented has, we believe, never been decided here; but we find numerous decisions in other states holding that a court may in an action for separate maintenance require the defendant to provide counsel fees and temporary support for plaintiff, though provision is made therefor by statute only in case absolute divorce is sought. It was so held in Milliron v. Milliron, 9 S. D. 181, 68 N. W. 286, 62 Am. St. Rep. 863; Dye v. Dye, 9 Colo. App. 320, 48 Pac. 313; Harding v. Harding, 144 Ill. 588, 32 N. E. 206, 21 L. R. A. 310; McFarland v. McFarland, 64 Miss. 449, 1 South. 508; Finn v. Finn, 62 Iowa, 482, 17 N. W. 739; Glover v. Glover, 16 Ala. 440; Purcell v. Purcell, 4 H. & M. 507. In Cupples v. Cupples, 31 Colo. 443, 72 Pac. 1056, it was held in an action by the wife for separate maintenance, that "the fact that the husband sets forth facts in a cross-complaint which if true would entitle him to a divorce is not a reason for disallowance of temporary alimony." In Finn v. Finn, supra, the Iowa court says that the right of the wife to suit money and maintenance seems to be a mere corollary of her right to maintenance in a suit for separate maintenance, "for it would be but mockery to allow the wife the right to maintain an action for separate maintenance, and, at the same time, deny her the means of prosecuting it." In England a different rule prevailed. There the remedy was to permit any person supplying the wife to sue the husband for maintenance furnished. Mr. Story (3 Equity Jurisprudence [14th Ed.] § 1858), commenting on the question says:

"In America a broader jurisdiction in cases of alimony has been asserted in some of our courts of equity; and it has been held that if a husband abandons his wife and separates himself from her without any reasonable support, a court of equity in all cases may decree her a suitable maintenance and support out of his estate, upon the very ground that there is no adequate or sufficient remedy at law in such a case. And there is so much good sense and reason in this doctrine, that it might be wished it were generally adopted."

From these authorities the plaintiff's right to such reasonable allowance seems clear.

The only remaining question is whether mandamus is available to compel the trial court to make the allowances. The refusal of the right would of course become cognizable by appeal; but as we said in People's Bank v. Burdett, Judge, 69 W. Va. 369, 372, 71 S. E. 399, 401:

"We do not deny an extraordinary remedy in a proper case, merely because the party may avail himself of another remedy. * * * The slow process of appellate review is not adequate to the vindication or enforcement of absolute rights such as the one involved here."

In Alabama the exact point was decided in favor of plaintiff's right to mandamus in such cases as this. Ex parte King, 27 Ala. 887. The doctrine of this and other Alabama cases has been questioned by Mr. High. Extraordinary Legal Remedies (3d Ed.) § 186. But we put our decision in this case on the broad ground of want of adequate remedy by any other process, appellate or otherwise. How could a married woman so circumstanced carry on her suit in the lower court or appellate court without money? To deny her allowance of suit money and money for support pending suit would be in most cases to deny her the relief to which she is entitled. As in suits for divorce, the merits of the case have nothing to do with her right to money to maintain her suit and for support pending the suit.

We are of opinion to award the writ.

CARTER v. MONTEITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 13, 1921.)

Appeal and error ¶308—Interlocutory decision, based in part on return of process and in part on bill, not reviewable upon certificate.

An interlocutory decision upon a motion in a chancery cause, based in part upon the return on the process and in part upon the bill and not solely upon either the process, the return or any pleading, is not reviewable upon a certificate.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Tyler County.

Suit by W. H. Carter against George B. Monteith and others. Motion of named defendant to dismiss was overruled, demurrers of certain defendants for misjoinder were sustained, and suit dismissed as to them and the case certified. Order entered, declining to review the decision upon the three questions certified, for lack of jurisdiction, and certified to court below.

Olin C. Carter, of Middlebourne, and Hogg & Hogg, of Point Pleasant, for plaintiff.

Underwood & Moore, of Middlebourne, for defendant.

POFFENBARGER, J. A preliminary inquiry arising upon this certificate is that of the remedy invoked for relief from the alleged error, the overruling of a motion to dismiss a suit brought to subject the real estate of a decedent to the payment of his general debts, on the theory of insufficiency of the personal estate.

The summons issued is regular, and the bill, considered independently of the state of facts disclosed by it and the process, discloses the usual case of indebtedness, insufficiency of personal property, and the existence of real assets within the county in which the cause of action arose and in which the suit was brought.

Lack of service of the process upon the administrator and the heir, both being the same person, due to his residence outside of the state, is the circumstance from which the question of jurisdiction emanates. There was a return of no inhabitant as to him, an affidavit of his nonresidence, and a matured order of publication as to him. He entered a special appearance, and moved to dismiss the suit. His motion having been overruled, he made no further appearance.

Demurrers interposed by other parties, on the ground of misjoinder because of lack of interest in the cause, on their part, were sustained, and the suit dismissed as to them. Of the rulings upon the demurrers, there seems to be no complaint. The questions certified all pertain to jurisdiction respecting the administrator and heir and the estate, the person of the principal defendant and the subject-matter, not any of the parties as to whom the cause has been dismissed. The inquiries propounded are, in substance: (1) Whether execution of process, personal or substituted, upon the administrator and heir, is essential to jurisdiction; (2) whether there must be either personal service upon him or a lien upon the land, to confer jurisdiction; and (3) whether the suit abated as to him, upon the return of no inhabitant and the filing of the affidavit of nonresidence. The decree by which the motion and demurrers were disposed of recites the raising of a question as to the sufficiency of the bill on its face; but, obviously, that is not the subject-matter of the doubt in the mind of the court. No defect in it is pointed out, nor is any perceived.

Manifestly none of the other questions, those actually and formally certified, arise or depend solely upon either the process or the bill. Arising upon both, they are all clearly composite. Nowhere in the bill is the nonresidence of the principal defendant disclosed in any way. It is shown only by the return and the affidavit, and neither of these instruments reveals the cause of action. It is useless here to repeat the demonstration, set forth in Tyler v. Wetzel, 85 W. Va. 378, 101 S. E. 726, of lack of jurisdiction in this court, to review the order disposing of the motion. The question certified in that case and in this cannot be differentiated in principle. In all substantial respects, they are identical.

An order will be entered here, declining to review the decision upon the three questions certified, for lack of jurisdiction, and certified to the court below.

ROBERTS v. CROUSE et al. (No. 4251.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 13, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Curtesy §11(1)—A tenant by curtesy not made a party to summary sale of ward's lands through special commissioner, but joining in deed after confirmation not knowing of his curtesy may assert such interest in guardianship funds.

In statutory summary proceedings to sell, first the mineral in, and, afterwards the surface of, lands belonging to infants, in which it is stated that the wards are the sole owners and that the rights of no other person will be affected by the sales, and the mineral and surface are so sold for full value agreed upon by the guardian and purchaser before the proceedings are begun, and so ascertained and decreed by the court, and the father of the infants, who is tenant by the curtesy in the lands, is not made a party to said summary proceeding, but after sale is made and confirmed, and deed through special commissioner is directed, he joins in the deed to the purchaser, he is not thereby precluded from asserting and receiving his curtesy interest in the funds in the hands of the guardian, although when he joined in the deed he believed that he had no curtesy or other interest in the land.

2. Curtesy §12(8)—Tenant's right in funds of which he was guardian held not barred by limitation and laches.

In such case, the guardian and tenant by the curtesy being one and the same person, the tenant by the curtesy is not estopped from asserting his curtesy interest in the funds in his hands as guardian, upon settlement of his guardianship accounts with one of his children when she has become 21 years old, under the doctrine of limitation and laches, it appearing that no loss of evidence, no changed conditions, and the rights of no other person have intervened.

3. Curtesy §11(1)—Father and guardian of children not precluded from asserting right of curtesy against fund from sale of land.

Ignorance of the father and guardian of his right of curtesy at the time of the sales and his consequent failure to then assert and have the same judicially determined, being a mistake of fact, will not preclude him from asserting his right against the fund upon final settlement, there being no judicial admission nor judicial finding in the summary proceedings that he does not have such curtesy.

Ritz, P., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Action by Jessie Roberts against J. T. Crouse and others. Decree for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Dillon & Nuckolls, of Fayetteville, for appellant.

Hubard & Bacon, of Fayetteville, for appellee.

LIVELY, J. J. T. Crouse conveyed 79½ acres of land in Fayette county to his wife in March, 1898, and on November 2, 1898, she died intestate, leaving 5 infant children, the youngest of which, Jessie, then of very tender years, and who afterwards married Roberts, is the plaintiff in this case. Crouse qualified as guardian for his children, and in 1901 E. B. Hawkins, who was buying or taking options on coal lands in that vicinity, offered him $20 per acre for the coal and minerals under the 79½-acre tract. Crouse, as guardian, filed a petition in the circuit court, asking for the sale of the coal and mineral, and made the 5 children, his wards, the only parties defendant thereto, alleging the death of his wife, intestate, her ownership of the land, the names and ages of the infants, his appointment and qualification as guardian, the offer by Hawkins to purchase the coal and other mineral at $20 per acre; that the offer was a fair and adequate price, equal with, and in some cases more than, the sale price of adjacent coal lands, and alleging that the sale of the interests of the infants therein would promote their material welfare; and that the rights of no one other than petitioner and his wards would be affected by a sale. The petition prayed for a sale of the entire interests of the infants in the coal and other minerals. Notice was duly served on each of the infants, and to the effect that the petition would be filed at a special term of the court—"asking for a sale of the coal and mineral under the tract of land of which Sarah J. Crouse died seized, and the title to which was acquired by you as heirs at law of your mother."

Regular proceedings were had on the petition, and witnesses were examined from which the court determined that the welfare of the infants would be promoted by a sale of their interests in the coal and other minerals, and that the Hawkins offer of $20 per acre was a fair and adequate price for the coal and minerals; and decreed a sale of the entire interests of the infants therein, and that the said coal and mineral be sold at that price or at a greater price if obtainable by the guardian either at public or private sale. The guardian reported that he "sold the coal and other minerals at private sale to Hawkins at $20 per acre," and that he deemed the sum derived a fair and adequate price for the same. The sale was confirmed, and a special commissioner was appointed and directed to make a deed to Hawkins for the "coal and other minerals underlying the said 79½ acres of land as described in these proceedings."

Similar proceeding was had in 1902 for a sale of the surface of said tract, except 13.2 acres around the Crouse residence, in which the petition states that an offer has been made by the Stuart Colliery Company at $75 an acre cash, a price in excess of the value. The court, upon hearing, ascertained that it would promote the welfare of the infants to sell their interests in the surface, and that the offer of $75 cash was a fair and adequate price, and would be a fair and adequate one for the infant defendants, and decreed that the surface be sold at that price. The guardian reported that he sold the surface, excepting 13.2 acres, at the price of $75 to the Colliery Company, and advised confirmation, stating that the price was more than he had ever hoped to realize for his wards for same. The court confirmed the sale and directed a special commissioner to convey the entire surface, excepting 13.2 acres to the purchaser.

In 1908 another petition was filed by the guardian asking for sale of .81 acre surface, part of the 13.2 acres remaining, to Smiley at the price of $500, in which it is alleged that the children own the same, each having a one-fifth interest therein (one child having at that time become of age), and that no other person's rights would be violated by a sale thereof; and stating that the infants owned personal estate at that time amounting to about $3,000, and asking for a sale of the .81 acre. This proposed sale was not consummated.

Crouse, the guardian and father, never made any settlement of his accounts as such. The four older children, when they became of age, executed deeds to their father conveying all their interests in their mother's estate to him. In the year 1919 the plaintiff, Jessie Roberts (née Crouse), having become of age, instituted this suit against her father and former guardian and his bondsmen to obtain her interest in the money derived from the sale of the coal and other minerals, and from the sale of the surface hereinbefore set out, claiming one-fifth of $1,590 (sale price of coal), with compound interest thereon from January 22, 1901, and one-fifth of $3,545.76 (sale price of surface), with compound interest thereon from December 4, 1902. Crouse avers in his answer that he sold the mineral and surface by the acre, and for full value, and that he did not know at the time that he had any interest in the land as tenant by curtesy, and was not before the court in his individual capacity, either as plaintiff or defendant, and was ignorant of his rights, and was not advised thereof until, about the year 1910, when he was preparing to make settlement of his guardianship accounts, he was so informed by A. J. Horan, attorney, with whom he then consulted; that he joined in the deeds by the special commissioners, but was paid nothing, and did so at the request of the purchaser, but in ignorance of his rights; that he used $4,000 of the money he received in placing improvements upon the 13.2 acres which belonged to the children, and as his wards (with the exception of plaintiff) became of age he settled with them, and they conveyed to him their interests in the 13.2 acres; and he denies that plaintiff is entitled to one-fifth of the money derived from said sales, but that he is entitled to deduct therefrom his curtesy interest, and then pay her the one-fifth of the remainder. A master commissioner reported that the plaintiff was entitled to receive from defendant $3,705.58, if no deduction was made for his curtesy interest; but that, if defendant was allowed curtesy, the amount he was entitled to retain was $1,530.92, which would leave the amount for which she was entitled to recover at $2,174.66, as of February 14, 1920. The decree was for the full amount claimed by the plaintiff. From this decree Crouse appeals.

The deed made to Sarah Crouse from J. T. Crouse conveying the 79½ acres was for the consideration of love and affection, and was made by Crouse at the suggestion of some neighbor to delay the payment of a debt of about $80, which he then owed, and which he afterwards within a few months paid. There was a balance of purchase money, about $200 owing on the land, which he paid after the deed was made to his wife. She owned no personal estate at the time of her death, and the funeral expenses, nurse's and doctor's bills were paid by defendant, amounting to a considerable sum, the allowance of which was refused by the lower court, and these bills are not insisted upon here; also about $200 expenses connected with the sale of the mineral and surface, which Crouse paid, and for which he received no credit. The disallowance of all these items is not insisted upon as error, and will receive no consideration. The only question is whether or not Crouse is barred from curtesy in the proceeds of the sale of his wife's land under the facts detailed.

Plaintiff contends (1) that defendant's curtesy was not sold in the two summary proceedings to sell the interests of the infants, and that he conveyed his interest as tenant by the curtesy when he joined in the deeds, although he received nothing therefor, and is now estopped from taking it out of the moneys paid in by the purchasers; (2) that, although he was ignorant of his curtesy interest at the time of these sales, his ignorance of the law is no excuse, and cannot now inure to his benefit; (3) that he waived his curtesy interest in favor of his children; (4) that having given bond and received the money as guardian, he cannot now claim any part of it as his own; (5) and that he is barred by the statute of limitations and laches.

[1] All of the contentions of the defendant are based upon the claim that he was ignorant of his curtesy in the land he had deeded to his wife. A study of the record leads to the conclusion with reasonable certainty that he did not know that he had any interest therein. The two summary proceedings for sale of the coal and surface proceeded upon the assumption and theory that the land was owned entirely by the infants. In the first proceedings the coal and other minerals are alleged to be "owned by his wards," and that the rights of no other person will be affected by a sale; and in the second, the averment is made that, after the mineral underlying the land had been sold, the children and wards were but the owners of the surface only. The mineral was sold by the acre at $20 per acre, which the court ascertained from the evidence was its entire worth; the surface was also sold by the acre at $75 per acre, likewise ascertained to be the entire worth. The reports and decrees so state. The petitions alleged offers from the purchasers for the coal and surface by the acre at stated prices found to be the full, true, and actual value.

Militating against the claim of defendant that he did not know that he had any personal or private interest in the land is the fact that he joined in the deeds to the mineral and surface in his individual capacity with the commissioners appointed by the court. Asked why he did so, he replied that the lawyer told him it was necessary, and, asked why he, the witness, thought it was necessary for him to sign, he replied, "From the fact that when people convey property they make deed to it." He was one of the principals in the transactions. The price and terms were agreed upon by him, and it was but natural for him to conclude that he should make or join in the title papers. The trained lawyer does not always comprehend the intricacies of inheritances and the laws governing infants' estates. Can better results be expected from the layman who has had no experience and has given the subject no thought? Indicative that he did not know of his personal interest even after being called upon to sign these deeds in his individual capacity in 1901 and 1902, he again filed a petition, sworn to, in the year 1908, asking for a sale to Smiley of .81 acre of the land at $500, in which he stated that his five children were the sole owners, each having a one-fifth interest therein, "and that the rights of no person will be violated by a sale of said interests of said infants in said real estate." We conclude that defendant was ignorant of his curtesy interest. The record and his actions sustain his sworn declaration to that effect. He swears that his first knowledge of his right of curtesy came to him through Hon. A. J. Horan, an attorney then at Fayetteville, whom he consulted about the year 1910, when Horan made a rough calculation of his interest in the fund in his hands, based on his age at the time the sales were made. At that time he was making a settlement with one of the older boys who had become of legal age. Horan does not contradict this evidence.

But it is argued that the court directed a sale of the interests of the children in the coal and surface, and did not direct a sale of the curtesy interest of defendant, and could not have done so, and the purchasers purchased nothing but the interest of the infants, for which they agreed to pay and did pay $20 and $75 per acre. That is true, but these purchasers offered and agreed to pay these fixed sums per acre for the coal and surface as the full value thereof, and they did receive for the sums paid the entire interests. It was immaterial to them whether the court's decree and deed conveyed the entire value purchased by them, or whether their complete title was conveyed to them by the joint deed of the commissioners and the tenant for life. It is safe to say that there would have been no sale at $20 per acre for coal and $75 per acre for surface without the full title being assured to them. The purchasers did not want the coal or surface at some indefinite period, dependent upon the death of the life tenant. They were not purchasing the reversionary interest. They were buying the entire property, with an intention of immediate occupation and use. The full value of the property could be easily ascertained; but the value of the life estate and that of the remainder would be uncertain, dependent upon the uncertainty of life and death. Property thus owned is not usually sold in piecemeal. The sales were private, and by agreement of all the parties and the court. The evidence, both at the time of the sales and now, is conclusive that full value was realized for the property.

There is a statement by Joe Huddleston, the uncle by marriage of the plaintiff, and at whose home she was reared, that defendant told him, after the mineral and surface were sold, that he knew of his curtesy right in the land, but wanted it to go to the children. This is denied by defendant, who says that he intended all of his property to go to his children eventually. But the time of the alleged declaration is hazy and uncertain, and even if made would not operate as a transfer of his title, or a gift of the money. A parol gift must be accompanied by delivery. He still has the money in his possession and control. It is unquestionable that Crouse had curtesy in the land. What became of it? The answer will be that he conveyed it to the purchasers when he joined in the deeds. What consideration did he receive? Can we say that he intended to give it to the purchasers? We suspect that common sense will answer, "No." The record is replete with proof that they paid full value. It is clear that his curtesy was converted into money, and became a part of the funds in his hands. In the summary proceedings no provision was made for his curtesy interest; no ascertainment thereof. Is he estopped from claiming it now after all these years? This is the crucial question.

It will be noted that he was not a party, in his individual capacity, to either of the summary sale proceedings. The allegations were, and the court proceeded upon the theory, that the infants owned the entire title, and that the rights of no other person would be affected by a sale thereof. Crouse was the moving cause, it is true, but he acted as guardian, and not in his individual capacity. He asserts that he did not know that he had a personal interest, and the record bears out his assertion. The offer was for the title to the coal at a specific price per acre, and for the title to the surface at a fixed price per acre. The court ascertained and adjudicated the value of both coal and surface, and not for an undivided interest therein. The reports of sale were that all of the coal and surface had been sold at these prices; and the decrees directed that the commissioner make a deed conveying to the purchaser "the coal and other minerals underlying the 79½ acres of land described in these proceedings"; and make a deed conveying to the purchaser, "with covenants of special warranty, of the surface of the 78.55 acres of land described in the petition in this cause."

[2] Had Crouse asserted his claim in these proceedings, then there could have been no doubt of the result. But the plaintiff vigorously insists that he is now barred by limitation and laches. The defense of laches implies injury to the person pleading it, brought about by loss of evidence, death of some of the parties to the original transaction, changed situation, or the intervention of the rights of other persons. Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 594. Lapse of time is not sufficient alone. It must be accompanied by some injury or disadvantage to the opposite party, or by some conduct indicating abandonment of the claim, the reassertion of which will inure to the benefit of the claimant by reason of changed conditions. Lillian Mitchell v. John Cornell, 106 S. E. 866, and cases cited. Courts show the utmost leniency for laches and lapse of time where intimate personal relations exist, or where family relationship exists between the parties. 10 R. C. L. p. 402.

"Laches cannot be imputed to one who is ignorant of his rights. Nor is mere delay always to be considered as laches. The relations of the parties, their degree of kindred, the inability of the debtor to pay, and other circumstances, may be taken into consideration, and where it is clearly shown that the delay has worked no injury and can be satisfactorily accounted for, courts of equity will not allow it to defeat the recovery of a debt shown to be due and unpaid." Jameson v. Rixey, 94 Va. 342, 26 S. E. 861, 64 Am. St. Rep. 726.

Mere lapse of time unaccompanied by evidence that the right has been abandoned does not constitute laches in equity. Cranmer v. McSwords, supra; Tidbale v. Shenandoah Nat. Bank, 100 Va. 741, 42 S. E. 867. Where a transaction has not become obscure, and does not depend upon frail memory or the imagination of witnesses, as will likely produce injustice, and the sum in controversy is certain, lapse of time alone is not sufficient to move equity and good conscience to refuse relief. In what particular has the right of the plaintiff been prejudiced by failure of the father to claim his curtesy interest? The data for ascertaining his interest is fixed by the decrees, by documentary evidence. It is as easily ascertained now as at the time of the sales. It does not depend on the memory of witnesses. The parties are all living, and there has been no intervention of the rights of third parties and no change of circumstances that would affect the claim. Defendant did not discover his right to curtesy, or that he ever had any such right, until about 1910, when he was making settlement with the oldest boy, who had reached his majority. As the children became of age he accounted with them and settlements were effected. The plaintiff was yet under age, and no settlement could be made with her. Her money was in his hands, drawing compound interest. Against whom could he make his demand? How could he assert his curtesy claim against the minor? What advantage has he taken by waiting until she was sui juris? As soon as she became of age and desired settlement, he promptly asserted his claim, and offered to pay her her money with compound interest, after taking out of the funds in his hands his curtesy interest. Moreover, it must be remembered that this land was partly inherited by defendant from his father's estate, and full title obtained by purchases from his coheirs, and part of the purchase money paid after the deed was made to his wife in 1898. It was by virtue of this deed of gift to his wife for "love and affection" that plaintiff obtained inheritance therein. Besides, the money which came into the hands of her father was expended in the erection of permanent improvements upon the remaining 13.2 acres in which she has a one-fifth interest in remainder. We do not think the doctrine of limitation or laches can apply to defeat defendant's claim.

It is reasonably clear, and we so decide, that defendant was ignorant of his curtesy in the land at the times when he instituted the summary proceedings as guardian, and did not know of his interest until about 1910. Does the fact of his ignorance of the law and fact create an estoppel? The often quoted rule that "ignorance of the law excuses no one" is subject to many exceptions and modifications as firmly established as the rule itself. 10 R. C. L. p. 306,

"Ignorance of the law excuses no one," is a maxim of public policy, and wise, and yet often operates to shield injustice and operates harshly on the innocent and ignorant; and hence the rule is guardedly laid down by the courts, leaving an open door that courts of equity may, in particular cases, not be shut out from the capacity to prevent real injustice." Schuttler v. Brandfass, 41 W. Va. 204, 23 S. E. 809.

The doctrine is discussed in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, § 849, and the author lays down the following general rule:

"Wherever a person is ignorant or mistaken with respect to his own antecedent and existing private legal rights, interests, estates, duties, liabilities, or other relation, either of property or contract or personal status, and enters into some transaction the legal scope and operation of which he correctly apprehends and understands, for the purpose of affecting such assumed rights, interests, or relations, or of carrying out such assumed duties or liabilities, equity will grant its relief, defensive or affirmative, treating the mistake as analogous to, if not identical with, a mistake of fact."

Mistakes respecting the title or interest in real estate most frequently illustrate an exception to the general rule that ignorance of the law excuses no one. 10 R. C. L. 311; Irick et ux v. Fulton's Ex'rs, 8 Grat. (Va.) 193; Burton v. Haden, 108 Va. 51, 60 S. E. 736, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1038.

It is asserted that because defendant gave a bond for the money which came into his hands by virtue of the sales in a penalty double the amount, he is thereby estopped from denying that the money so received by him belongs to the infants, and therefore he must account to the plaintiff without any diminution on account of his claim for curtesy. It is a basic element in equitable estoppel that the act relied upon must be injurious, and prejudicial to him that asserts it as an estoppel; his position must be changed for the worse by relying upon or acting upon the act or conduct of the person against whom he claims estoppel. Bates v. Swiger, 40 W. Va. 420, 21 S. E. 874; Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 451, 26 S. E. 271, 36 L. R. A. 566; C. & O. Ry. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 40 S. E. 633, 914.

"Equitable estoppels only arise when the conduct of the party estopped is fraudulent in purpose or unjust in result. * * * The fundamental principle upon which this doctrine is based is the equitable one—the suppression of fraud and the enforcement of fair dealing." Herm. Estop. 862-865.

We fail to see where defendant has acted fraudulently in giving this bond or wherein the plaintiff has acted or been misled to her injury. That defendant may have been under a misapprehension as to his relationship to this fund, or under the impression and belief that he had no personal interest therein, does not estop him from showing the true facts afterwards ascertained. No one has been prejudiced by the giving of this bond, and the doctrine of estoppel does not apply. Davis Trust Co. v. Price, 77 W. Va. 681, 88 S. E. 111. The giving of the bond conditioned for the faithful accounting of the fund would not operate to change the true character or ownership of the money. The guardian, unlike an administrator or an executor, has not legal title to the ward's property. He is a trustee, but his powers are limited to mere custody and control of the property as property to which the ward has full and complete title. 21 Cyc. pp. 77 and 78. Possession by the guardian, therefore, of a fund in which both he and his ward have interests or titles, is not inconsistent with assertion of his title; at least not conclusively so. Legally, the fund in question was an inseparable one until settlement. The guardian had a life estate in it, and the ward an estate in remainder. Hence, it signifies little whether he held it in possession as guardian or in his individual name. He had a clear right to hold the entire fund in his own name. The interest of the wards was ground or reason for his holding as a fiduciary, although he was not bound to do so. A liquidated debt, or an incumbrance on the ward's estate, if clearly proved, may be credited against the funds held by the guardian. 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 111; Wallis v. Neale, 43 W. Va. 529, 27 S. E. 227; Snowhill v. Executor of Snowhill, 2 N. J. Eq. 38; Mathes v. Bennett, 21 N. H. 204.

[3] This leaves nothing in the way except the admissions in the summary proceeding, and they are not conclusive. That proceeding was not one between the guardian on the one hand and himself on the other. In his individual capacity he was no party to it. His deed does not bind him as between himself and his ward, because it was not made to the ward. It conveyed his estate to a third party. Are the statements, in the summary proceedings, to the effect that the wards owned the entire interests in the mineral and surface, and that the rights of no other person would be affected by a sale thereof, conclusive judicial admissions, whether made by Crouse as guardian or as an individual? The petitions on their face controvert the assertion of whole title and interest in the children and wards. It is stated therein that Sarah J. Crouse, the wife of petitioner, died intestate, seized and possessed of the tract of land. The curtesy of the husband therein, while not alleged in terms, is a conclusion of law from the statement of fact.

"Statements or admissions relating to a question of law are not admissible in evidence, for the reason that a party should not be affected by statements which may be attributed to a misapprehension of his legal right." 22 C. J. p. 298, § 325.

While judicial admissions are strictly construed and are usually binding in the case where made, they do not have the same force of conclusiveness in another case, but are regarded as being in the nature of extrajudicial admissions. 22 C. J. p. 329, § 370, title "Judicial Admissions."

"A party to an action is not concluded by an admission made by him or by one whose admission affects him, in the course of another action, but such admission may be explained or contradicted." 22 C. J. p. 423, § 506; 1 R. C. L. p. 499, § 40.

This is a case which strongly appeals to equity and good conscience. The land originally came to the defendant by inheritance from his father and purchase from his brothers and sisters. Without consideration other than "love and affection" he transferred it to his wife, who died leaving the legal title vested in the five children, subject to his curtesy. An advantageous offer of purchase is made to him, and under a mistake of fact the land is sold for full value without ascertaining or making provision for his curtesy, in proceedings to sell the remainder interests of the children, to which he was not a party. What has become of his life estate, and, if sold from him, where is the consideration? Where are the equities? Plaintiff stated in her cross-examination that she was willing to take the part of the purchase money her father was entitled to by reason of his curtesy, together with compound interest thereon, even if a mistake had been made by him in not setting up his claim in the summary proceedings. It cannot be questioned that he was entitled to his curtesy interest, and that it would have been allowed in those proceedings if it had been asserted. She would not have been prejudiced then if he had. She would have received what she was justly entitled to take. Now she wants more—the pound of flesh and the blood. Her inheritance has been enriched by the expenditure of the money received from the sale in permanent improvements on the 13.2 acres remaining. Under our interpretation of the decrees and proceedings had in the summary proceedings we do not think it was the intention or design that the father should lose, or that he has lost, his curtesy, and we hold that he is entitled to receive the same out of the money in his hands. The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded for that purpose.

Reversed and remanded.

CONAWAY v. OVERHOLT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trusts  $\S$  366(3)—Where a bill to enforce vendor's lien omits necessary trust beneficiaries, a demurrer thereto should be sustained.

A bill for enforcement of a vendor's lien against the land constituting part of the estate of a deceased vendee of the vendee, or subpurchaser, to which only the executor of his will and the trustees under the will are made parties defendant, and which fails to disclose the nature and extent of the interest or estate of the trustees in the land, omits the beneficiaries of the trust and does not in any way excuse or justify their omission, is defective as to parties, and a demurrer thereto should be sustained on that ground.

2. Equity  $\S$  117—On demurrer to bill for enforcement of vendor's lien, for want of necessary parties, the merits considered only to see if case falls within equity jurisdiction.

In such case, the merits of the cause of action will be considered only to the extent of determining that it is such as falls within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

Certified from Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Bill by Waltman H. Conaway against Raymond D. Overholt, executor, and others, for enforcement of vendor's lien. Demurrer to bill overruled, and case certified for review. Demurrer ordered sustained, and review of questions on merits refused for lack of necessary parties.

Waltman H. Conaway, of Fairmont, and T. M. McIntire, of New Martinsville, for plaintiff.

Thos. H. Cornett, of New Martinsville, for defendants.

POFFENBARGER, J. Having overruled a demurrer to a bill filed for enforcement of an alleged vendor's lien, and possibly for relief upon other grounds, the trial court has certified its decision to this court for review.

The inquiry turns upon the language of the clause in a contract or deed, relied upon as having reserved such a lien. W. H. Conaway, one of the plaintiffs, owning an undivided half of the equitable title to certain coal and mining privileges, sold and conveyed the same to his cotenant, Charles E. Conaway, for and in consideration of the sum of $8,100, of which $1,100 was paid in cash. Of the residue, $2,000 was to be paid in a short time, without interest, and the residue of the purchase money in two interest-bearing installments of $2,500 each, one on or before December 1, 1907, and the other on or before December 1, 1908. As to security of payment, the contract contained this stipulation:

"It is also understood, covenanted, and agreed that said Waitman H. Conaway is to have a vendor's lien upon said coal to the extent of said $7,000 remaining unpaid in any sale and conveyance thereof by said Charles E. Conaway. If said sum of $2,000 is paid on or before December, 1908, the said vendor's lien shall only be for $5,000, instead of $7,000."

Soon after this agreement or conveyance was made B. F. Overholt, with full notice thereof, and of the stipulation aforesaid, purchased of Charles E. Conaway an undivided one-half of said coal, and paid Waitman H. Conaway $1,000, one-half of the $2,000 aforesaid, by way of credit on what he was to pay Charles E. Conaway as purchase money. At the same time and as part of the same transaction he joined Charles E. Conaway in the execution of two $2,500 notes payable to Waitman H. Conaway, which represented the two $2,500 payments due from Charles E. to W. H. Conaway. He did not join in a note for $1,000 representing the other half of the $2,000 installment, because it had been assigned by W. H. Conaway to W. A. Weldebush, and by Weldebush to the Grafton Banking & Trust Company, after endorsement by John F. Phillips; but the bill alleges he assumed it and became personally liable therefor.

In February, 1907, David H. Cox, in whom the legal title to the coal still remained, and to whom only a small fraction of the original purchase money had been paid, conveyed it to Overholt and Charles E. Conaway, reserving a vendor's lien thereon for more than $44,000. Later, and on a date not disclosed, Overholt died and Raymond D. Overholt qualified as the executor of his will. At a date not disclosed, Chas. E. Conaway also died. The estate of B. F. Overholt paid all the purchase money due Cox, and took an assignment of his vendor's lien.

In a creditors' suit against the estate of Chas. E. Conaway the Overholt estate set up this lien, and claimed the benefit thereof by subrogation, to the extent of the payment of Conaway's half of the purchase money. On the sale of the Conaway half of the coal, under a decree entered in said cause, the trustees of the Overholt estate purchased it for the sum of $35,000 which sum was not more than sufficient for reimbursement of said estate, after payment of costs, etc.

In that suit the three notes above described were also set up and asserted as liens on the Chas. E. Conaway half of the coal, and were decreed to be liens thereon next after the lien for the Cox debt. Cox, B. F. Overholt, W. H. Conaway, Weldebush, the Grafton Banking & Trust Company, and Phillips were all parties defendant in that suit.

The two $2,500 notes were assigned by W. H. Conaway to B. F. Blackshere, and later paid by B. F. Overholt or his executor. The bank above mentioned obtained a judgment on the $1,000 note against W. H. Conaway, Weldebush, and Phillips which has been paid by Phillips.

[1, 2] In said creditor's suit, the bank, W. H. Conaway, Weldebush, and Phillips filed a petition by which they sought to charge the Overholt half of the coal with said $1,000 debt, as being secured by the stipulation in the contract between W. H. Conaway and Chas. E. Conaway, but their petition was rejected by an order saving to them any right they might have to charge that interest in the coal by a proper proceeding. This suit, in which all of them have joined as plaintiffs, is the means they have adopted for enforcement of their alleged right.

A ground of demurrer respecting sufficiency of the bill as to parties may preclude review of the decree as to the sufficiency of the bill in respect of other matters. In other words, it may not be possible, in the present state of the record, to say whether there is a vendor's lien, or whether there is right to charge the real estate, or obtain a personal decree for the debt in question, upon any other ground. In the absence of necessary parties, the inquiry cannot go beyond the question of equity jurisdiction of the cause of action indicated by the bill. Beckwith v. Laing, 66 W. Va. 246, 66 S. E. 354.

The only defendants to the bill are Raymond D. Overholt, West Virginia executor of the will of B. F. Overholt, deceased, and Helen Abigail Overholt and Raymond D. Overholt, trustees of the estate of B. F. Overholt. There is not an allegation in the bill, indicating the nature or extent of the interest the executor or the trustees have in the estate. The trustees may be the beneficiaries of the will and the trust created by it, but the bill does not say so. The trust is probably an active one, but as to that the bill is silent. The legal title to the real estate may be in the executor or the trustees, and it may not be in either. As to this, no information is furnished by any allegation of the bill. Likely the will makes one or more persons other than the trustees beneficiaries of trust, but, if so, they are not named. The trustees may have interests in the the trust, in their individual capacities, but they are not made parties in their own rights. As they are described in the body of the bill as trustees of the estate, sufficient interest on their part to make them proper parties is no doubt shown; but, presumptively, the trust was created for the benefit of somebody. The trustees of the estate may not have powers sufficiently broad to make them representatives of the beneficiaries of the will or the trust in respect of the coal in question, for all purposes. Their interest or title should be disclosed. If the nature of the cause of action, enforcement of a vendor's lien, does not constitute an exception to the general rule as to parties, the bill is clearly defective in that respect. Under it, all persons directly interested in the subject-matter are necessary parties, and cestuis que trustent are such persons. Beckwith v. Laing, cited; Pyle v. Henderson, 55 W. Va. 122, 48 S. E. 791. The nature of this cause of action constitutes no exception to the general rule, especially when the lien is asserted against land of the vendee or subpurchaser, as it is here. Clark v. Harpers Ferry Timber Co., 70 W. Va. 312, 73 S. E. 919; Elkins National Bank v. Reger, 70 W. Va. 113, 73 S. E. 244; Gebhart v. Shrader, 75 W. Va. 159, 83 S. E. 925; Morris' Adm'r v. Peyton's Adm'r, 10 W. Va. 1, 9.

That enforcement of a vendor's lien is an equitable cause of action needs neither demonstration nor citation of authority. It is an elementary proposition.

For the omission of allegations showing the nature and extent of the interest or estate of the trustees in the coal and excusing in some way omission of the beneficiaries of the trust, the bill is manifestly insufficient as to parties, and, on that ground, the demurrer should have been sustained, and will be by an order entered here. It is hardly necessary to observe that lack of apparently necessary parties precludes review of the decision upon any question pertaining to the merits of the demand set up by the bill.

The conclusion here stated will be recorded by a proper order and certified to the court below

Ex parte LAVINDER. Ex parte WOOLFORD. Ex parte INGRAM.
(Nos. 4358-4360.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Insurrection and sedition §5—Martial law cannot obtain in the absence of military operations and occupation of the territory.

Martial law operating, in the government of territory, as a substitute for the civil law, or as an addition thereto, so as to restrict the liberties of citizens and augment the powers of officers, is an incident of military operations and of actual military occupation of the territory so governed; wherefore it cannot obtain in the absence of such operations and occupation.

2. Insurrection and sedition §5—Existence of insurrection and Governor's proclamation do not put martial law in operation nor justify it before military occupation.

The existence of war between a state and citizens of a portion of its territory, arising out of an insurrection, does not of itself inaugurate martial law in such territory, nor does the proclamation thereof by the Governor put it in operation. Nor does the fact, nor the proclamation, nor both, afford any constitutional basis for a proclamation of martial law in such territory, unless nor until a military force is put into the field for administration and enforcement thereof.

3. Insurrection and sedition §5—Governor cannot inaugurate and enforce martial law by means of civil authorities acting under military officer.

In such case, it is not within the constitutional power of the Governor to inaugurate and enforce martial law within such territory by means of the civil authorities acting under the direction of himself and a military officer sent into it by him for the purpose. A mere military coloring of administration is insufficient.

4. Habeas corpus §16—Insurrection and sedition §5—Parties arrested under Code provisions authorizing arrest "in time of war" may be released by habeas corpus where arrest was not during time of war.

Sections 5 to 9, inclusive, of chapter 14 (sections 351-355) of the Code, are operative only in a time of actual war, and under them citizens cannot be arrested and detained, except in the time of such war, for acts not constituting offenses under the civil law, though prescribed and forbidden by executive regulations, rules, and orders set forth in proclamations of war and martial law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, In Time of War.]

Miller, J. dissenting.

Proceedings in habeas corpus by A. D. Lavinder, by Mount Woolford, and by Frank Ingram. Returns to writs held insufficient, and prisoners discharged.

H. W. Houston, of Charleston, for petitioners.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., Chas. Ritchie and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., and S. B. Avis, of Charleston, for respondent.

POFFENBARGER, J. Alleging illegal restraint and deprivation of his liberty by the sheriff of McDowell county, proceeding under orders of the acting adjutant general of West Virginia, A. D. Lavinder obtained from two of the judges of this court, acting in vacation, a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, requiring the production of his body in court, at the city of Charleston, at a special term, for judicial inquiry and determination as to the validity of his imprisonment. Upon similar complaints, Mount Woolford and Frank Ingram obtained such writs, returnable at the same time and place, and requiring the sheriff of Mingo county to produce their bodies before the court for like inquiry and determination.

Each of said parties was held as a military prisoner for infraction of a rule or order contained in a proclamation issued by the Governor of the state, declaring the existence of a state of war, insurrection, and riot in the county of Mingo, and purporting to inaugurate martial law throughout the whole of said county, and to require from all of its inhabitants and other persons within its limits obedience to certain orders, rules, and regulations prescribed in said proclamation, exceeding in their requirements those of the common and statute laws, some of which, unless made exceptional on the ground of necessity, and thus brought within the Constitution, contravene provisions of that instrument.

Under authority conferred by law, Lavinder had carried a pistol in Mingo county, he having been duly licensed so to do by an order of a competent court of Kanawha county, and the license so granted him being state-wide in its operation. His carriage of the pistol under such circumstances was treated as an infraction of one of the martial law regulations inhibiting the possession and carrying of arms in the county, and therefore as sufficient ground for his arrest and detention pending suppression of the insurrection. Immediately upon his arrest he was committed to the custody of the sheriff of Mingo county by an order of the acting adjutant general, and then, by a like order, transferred to the custody of the sheriff of McDowell county, on account of the crowded condition of the Mingo county jail. Woolford was seized and likewise detained in the Mingo county jail for having had pistol cartridges in his possession; and Ingram, for passing up and down through a tent colony of striking coal miners, contrary to orders given under said proclamation. None of these acts constituted a violation of any civil law, but all were prohibited by the Governor's rules and regulations, as interpreted and applied by his agent in the alleged military district, the acting adjutant general.

[1] Admittedly, there was no actual military organization or force representing the state government, in Mingo county, at the time of the arrests. The acting adjutant general, holding a military commission, was on the ground, and was directing the civil authorities of the county, the sheriff, constables, justices, policemen, and the posse comitatus, but they were not enrolled, enlisted nor organized as a military force. Under the law, the Governor had a potential military force in the state and county, the unorganized militia; but, being unenrolled, uncalled, and unorganized, it could not have been deemed to be an actual military force, nor treated as such. Although officially declared to be in a state of war, the county was not occupied by any military force of the state. The enterprise was an attempt to put into effect and enforce military or martial law by merely civil agencies. The presence of a military officer and action of the civil authorities, under his direction, constituted no more than mere military color in the situation and procedure.

The substitution of military for the civil law in any community is an extreme measure. Socially, economically, and politically, it is deplorable and calamitous. Its sole justification is the failure of the civil law fully to operate and function, for the time being, by reason of the paralysis or overthrow of its agencies, in consequence of an insurrection, invasion, or other enterprise hostile to the state, and resulting in actual warfare. And then such substitution at any place within the state cannot extend beyond the limits of the theater of actual war. Nance v. Brown, 71 W. Va. 519, 77 S. E. 243, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 996, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1; In re Jones et al., 71 W. Va. 567, 77 S. E. 1029, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1030, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 31. Martial Law within the territory of a country at war with another, or with rebellious citizens or subjects in possession of a part of its own territory, is not a necessary incident or consequence of the existing state of war. A concrete illustration of this proposition is found in the late World War. Though there were millions of men under arms in the United States, not a foot of its territory was subjected to martial law on the ground of the existence of the state of war between this country and certain European governments; nor, under principles declared in Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 2, 18 L. Ed. 281, could it have been, because there was no actual warfare in this country—no fighting, no battle lines, no area in which troops were assembled or moved to and fro, in the conduct of or preparation for immediate or probable combat. In the great Civil War, portions of the country lying without the theater of actual war, as here indicated, were constitutionally immune from martial law. Ex parte Milligan, cited.

[2] It is perfectly manifest that the proclamation of war did not, ipso facto, nor ex proprio vigore, inaugurate martial law in Mingo county. The Governor's attempt to inaugurate it and put it into effect in that county, in the manner hereinbefore described, was clearly futile and inoperative. The irresistible logic of the precedents already cited, and of all others bearing upon the subject, is that martial law is an incident of military operations within the area of actual, not merely theoretical, warfare. Being only an incident of actual warfare, such warfare is essential to its existence; and, being also a mere incident of actual military occupation of territory, an army in the field is equally essential and indispensable. No precedent, text, nor judicial opinion found in the books accords to martial law of the kind now under consideration, a wider scope or larger function than that just indicated. Upon the theory of the procedure under which these arrests were made, a citizen of revolting or enemy territory might be guilty of many infractions of martial law long before accrual of the power to make it effective. As an incident of the Civil War, that theory, if applied, might have piled up against a citizen of Georgia a three or four years' accumulation of offenses under federal military regulations of which he had had no knowledge, and required him to suffer imprisonment or other punishment for them on the arrival of federal troops within the state. There could have been no American martial law in Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, or Germany until the American troops actually occupied those countries, and then it was limited to the territories in actual occupation. It is a purely military measure, and its administration a strictly military function. To say the military chief may prescribe it and then devolve its enforcement upon the civil officers of the territory involves a serious departure from logic, as well as a contradiction in terms. It is as truly military in its administration as in its origin, nature, and institution or proclamation.

[3] The authority of the Governor to institute and enforce it, under circumstances warranting such action, accorded to him by certain decisions of this court, to which reference has been made, is found in section 12 of article 7 of the Constitution, only by construction of the terms used therein, in connection with other provisions of the organic law. That section makes him commander in chief of the military forces of the state, and expressly empowers him to call out the same to execute the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion. Power to suppress insurrection and repel invasion by the use of the military forces of the state impliedly carries power to accomplish those purposes in the recognized modes of warfare, which include martial rule within the area of actual hostilities. In other words, the Governor, being expressly authorized to conduct military operations for suppression of insurrection and in resistance of invasion, is impliedly authorized to conduct such operations in accordance with the usages and customs of war, and so has all the powers recognized as being incident to the office of commander in chief of any army engaged in such enterprises. This is a reasonable and fair interpretation of the terms of the section above referred to. Administration and enforcement of martial law by civil agencies could not be brought within the terms of that section in any way. Moreover, specification of one method of effecting a result is regarded, in constitutional construction, as an implied exclusion of all others, even though they may be deemed to be more convenient or efficacious than the one designated.

"The rule, that when an instrument gives a power it also gives, by implication, the means necessary to its exercise, is intended to render available those grants of power, which, without its application, would be inoperative and nugatory, by reason of the means necessary to their exercise not being also provided. But, when the means of enforcing a given power are furnished by law, the rule does not apply." Field v. People, 2 Scam. (Ill.) 79, 85.

Of course, this holding is limited to suppression of insurrection and repulsion of invasion, terms necessarily implying the use of force. If insurrectionists or foreign enemies can be dissuaded from their purposes by persuasion or other peaceable methods, the Governor may employ them and need not resort to force. But, when the application of military force is necessary, he is limited to the use of a military organization in the effectuation of his purpose. He cannot enlarge the powers of the civil officers nor restrict the legal rights of citizens by way of exercise of his power to achieve certain purposes by the use of a military force. In other words, he cannot by a mere order convert the civil officers into an army and clothe them with military powers for the purpose of suppressing an insurrection or repelling an invasion. He can raise an army only in the manner prescribed by law, and his military authority can be exerted in respect of things authorized to be done with the military forces only by means of an army.

This somewhat technical view of the subject is sustained by broader and more practical considerations. Martial law is a drastic and oppressive system. Under it the rights, privileges, and liberties ordinarily possessed and enjoyed by citizens are greatly restricted and abridged, and the powers of the military officers are infinitely larger than those conferred upon the civil officers. Hence, it ought not to be put into effect except upon occasions of dire and inexorable necessity. Limitation of the power of the Governor to invoke and apply it only on occasions of actual warfare and within the area of actual hostilities renders it impossible for him to set aside the civil laws and rule by his practically unrestrained will, under any other circumstances. Such a construction is not unreasonable, and it is highly necessary in the legal sense of the term. If he could proclaim martial law and enforce it by employment of the civil authorities, he would be often importuned to do so upon facts and circumstances wholly insufficient in reason to warrant such procedure; and, in some such instances, he might be induced by misapprehension or misrepresentation to yield to such importunities. The necessity and application of actual military force, as prerequisites, afford a reasonably certain basis, standard, or test by which he can always determine the propriety of resort to this high power, as well as obtain immunity from the embarrassment of groundless appeals for abridgement of the legal rights of citizens and enlargement of the powers of the civil officers.

Power in a chief magistrate, to effect such results under ordinary circumstances, would be suggestive of the despotism of unrestrained

ed monarchical government, complete abolition, inhibition, or preclusion of which is one of the chief aims or purposes of constitutional popular government. The framers of the federal Constitution were particularly careful to provide against it by many of the provisions of that instrument. Both the federal and the state Constitutions withhold it from the Legislature, as well as the executive. The war power only was excepted. For an occasion of such gravity, it was deemed inadvisable to attempt to define the powers of government, by any constitutional provision; wherefore the usages and customs of war constitute its limitations. Enlargement of that exception would amount to an undermining of a cornerstone of constitutional government. It is so high, mighty, and dangerous in character that it must be rigidly and strictly kept within clearly defined limits, even though they may seem to be arbitrary and technical.

[4] In the light of the same general principles, we interpret sections 5 to 9, inclusive, of chapter 14 (sections 351-355) of the Code, authorizing arrest in time of war of persons giving aid, support, or information to the enemy or insurgents, or combining or conspiring together to aid or support any hostile action against the United States or this state. Such high and extraordinary power was not intended to be conferred, unless nor until actual warfare is made manifest by the presence of an army in the field. The power is given by way of aid in the actual suppression of insurrection or resistance of invasion. It cannot be wielded except "in time of war." That does not mean theoretical or technical war. It means actual war. Ordinarily, a declaration of war is followed immediately by the movement of troops for attack or defense. The statute must operate according to the plain and ordinary meaning of its terms—not an obscure, exceptional, or strained interpretation. Besides, until the declaration of war is carried into effect by actual military or naval operations, there is no such an emergency as justifies the possession or exercise of such extraordinary powers as the statute confers in time of war. Lack of such a limitation, as we recognize and here state, would open the door to the possibility of abuses thereof, well calculated to impair and weaken the very foundations of constitutional government. Though we cannot assume that any chief magistrate would ever set up a merely pretextual state of war, as color or ground for seizure of extraordinary powers inconsistent with and subversive of liberty, the bare possibility of such action, under a loose interpretation of the statute, amply suffices for adoption of the strict construction we give it. Besides, as has been stated, it harmonizes with the general principles above adverted to, and carries them into effect.

Upon these principles and conclusions, the returns to the writs were held insufficient, and the prisoners discharged.

BARTLETT et al. v. JOHNSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Vendor and purchaser  §1—Presumption that vendor owning but one house and lot in a town intended to sell only that which he owned.

There is a presumption that a vendor of real estate intends to sell that which he owns, and where a contract for the sale of real estate describes the subject-matter of the sale as a house and lot situate in a certain town, and the vendor owns but one house and lot situate in the town mentioned, the contract will be construed as referring thereto.

2. Specific performance  §105(3) — Laches will not prevail where purchaser holds possession from date of sale until suit.

The defense of laches will not prevail in a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate, where the vendee holds the possession thereof from the date of the sale until the institution of the suit by him for the extraction of the legal title, even though many years may have elapsed between the making of the contract and the institution of the suit.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Bill for specific performance by Florence Bartlett and others against Elizabeth Johnson. Demurrer to bill overruled, and case certified. Overruling of demurrer affirmed.

George & Wilcox, of Philippi, for plaintiffs.
J. Blackburn Ware, of Philippi, for defendant.

RITZ, P. The circuit court of Barbour county having overruled a demurrer to the plaintiffs' bill for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate, certifies to this court the questions arising upon said demurrer.

On the 15th of June, 1907, the plaintiffs' ancestor W. J. Bartlett purchased from Simon Johnson a house and lot in North Philippi, and on that date said Simon Johnson executed and delivered to the ancestor of the plaintiffs a contract or memorandum of the sale in the following words and figures:

"This contract maid this 15 day of June, 1907, by & beetween Simon Johnson of the first part & W. J. Bartlette of the second part sole a lot and house in North Philippi for One thousand dollars paid in hand retains this property as long as I live. Simon Johnson."

The bill alleges that W. J. Bartlett was at the time of the sale in possession of the house and lot purchased from said Johnson, and that he remained in the possession thereof until his death, and that since his death his widow and heirs at law, the plaintiffs in this suit, have remained in the possession of the house upon said premises; that the said Simon Johnson at the time of said sale owned no other house and lot in North Philippi than the one which this suit seeks to have conveyed to the plaintiffs; and that the defendant Elizabeth Johnson is the widow and sole devisee of the said Simon Johnson, he having departed this life.

The demurrer to the bill is based upon two grounds: the first being that the contract of sale is too indefinite to be enforced, there being no sufficient designation therein of the property sold by Johnson to Bartlett; and, second, that the plaintiffs are barred from maintaining this suit by laches.

[1] It is true the contract of sale is rather indefinite so far as the subject-matter is concerned. It purports to sell a lot and house in North Philippi, and recites the consideration, and that the same has been paid. Can resort be had to extraneous evidence in order to identify the subject-matter of the contract? It is averred in the bill that the vendor had but one house and lot in North Philippi, and it is insisted that there is a presumption that he intended to sell that which he owned. If it is true that it may be presumed that the vendor intended to sell his own property, then there existed but one subject-matter to which the contract could be applied, and that is the house and lot in North Philippi claimed by the plaintiffs. There is no doubt but that resort may be had to evidence outside of the contract itself in order to establish the identity of the subject-matter of the contract. In other words, if there is anything in the contract which directs inquiry in a particular way for the purpose of identifying the subject, this direction will be followed. Now it is quite clear that if the contract had said "my house in North Philippi" there would have been no trouble in ascertaining the subject-matter of the contract, provided the vendor had but one house in North Philippi. Of course, if upon investigation it is found that he owned two houses and lots, or a half dozen houses and lots in North Philippi, then it might be impossible to apply the contract to any particular house and lot, but if such an inquiry had developed the fact that he was the owner of but one such house and lot, by the uniform trend of authorities the contract would be applied to that house and lot. In this case, however, the contract does not designate it as "my house and lot," but simply "a house and lot in North Philippi." It must be borne in mind in construing this contract, as well as all other contracts, that the purpose of the courts is to give them effect, if that may be done. There is no doubt but that Johnson intended to sell a house and lot in North Philippi to Bartlett, and we see no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that this intention to sell applied to the house and lot that he owned. It surely could not be assumed that he intended to sell a house and lot that he did not own and had no interest in. The presumption is that people are honest and intend to give value for what they get. Indulging this presumption, the contract then stands just as if written "my house and lot in North Philippi." and if by going to North Philippi it is found, as alleged in the bill, that the vendor owned but one house and lot there, then this is the house and lot intended. Of course, if there were more than one house and lot in North Philippi belonging to the vendor, this would render the description ambiguous, and might render the contract invalid, but in this case we have the allegation that Johnson owned but one house and lot in North Philippi, and, this being true, we are constrained to hold that this was the property referred to in the contract aforesaid. The doctrine that there is a presumption that the vendor of real estate intends to sell property owned by him is but another way of stating that there is a presumption that parties will deal honestly with each other, and that one who purports to sell property is the owner of it, and this presumption is resorted to in order that effect may be given to their contracts rather than to deprive them of the force which the parties intended them to have. 1 Jones on Law of Real Property in Conveyancing, § 347; Hurley v. Brown, 98 Mass. 545, 96 Am. Dec. 671; Mead v. Parker, 115 Mass. 413, 20 Am. Rep. 110; Fish v. Hubbard's Adm'rs, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 651. If the allegation of the bill that Johnson owned but one house and lot in North Philippi is true, and on this demurrer we must concede the truth of it, then there was but one subject-matter to which this contract could be applied after indulging the presumption that he intended to sell that of which he was the owner.

[2] The contention that plaintiffs are barred from maintaining this suit by laches is not tenable. It is averred that they are in possession of the property, and that they and their ancestor have had such possession ever since the contract of sale sought to be enforced. They were under no obligation to take any action so long as their possession was undisturbed, and their rights unquestioned. This doctrine is fully sustained by the case of Mills v. McLanahan, 70 W. Va. 288, 73 S. E. 927, and the authorities there cited.

The demurrer to the bill was properly overruled, and the questions certified are answered accordingly.

CLAYPOOLE v. McINTOSH et al.
(No. 177.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

1. Corporations  $\S$  228—Stockholders liable for unpaid subscriptions to amount necessary to liquidate debts.

Under C. S.  $\S$  1160, stockholders of an insolvent corporation are liable pro rata for their unpaid subscriptions to amount necessary to liquidate the corporate debts.

2. Bankruptcy  $\S$  145(1)—Corporate officers, who paid dividends when debts exceeded two-thirds of assets, liable to trustee for debts.

Under C. S.  $\S$  1179, officers of corporation, who paid out of the funds of the corporation dividends when debts of the corporation exceeded two-thirds of its assets, held liable to trustee in bankruptcy of the corporation for the amount of such debts and the proper costs and charges of the bankruptcy proceeding.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$  901—Presumption against error.

The presumption is against error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Devin, Judge.

Action by J. S. Claypoole, trustee of the estate of the Willis Grocery Company, against W. A. McIntosh and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants except and appeal. Affirmed. No error.

The action is instituted by plaintiff, trustee in bankruptcy of Willis Grocery Company, an insolvent corporation; the same being by order of bankruptcy court to collect assets to pay creditors from stockholders on their unpaid subscriptions, under section 1160, Consolidated Statutes, and against defendants, directors and officers in control of said corporation and its affairs, by reason of dividends paid out to themselves contrary to law as contained in section 1179, etc. On denial of liability, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"1. What amount of stock in the Willis Grocery was held by the defendants McKeel, McIntosh, and Weeks at the time the said company became insolvent?

"Answer: McKeel, $2,000.00; McIntosh, $2,000.00; Weeks, $1,000.00.

"2. What amount, if any, is due by each of said defendants on the stock held by them?

"Answer: $2,000.00; Weeks, $1,000.00.

"3. Were the defendants officers of the Willis Grocery Company?

"Answer: Yes.

"4. Did the defendants pay out of the funds of said Willis Grocery Company dividends when debts of said company were more than two-thirds of its assets, and, if so, in what amount?

"Answer: $6,644.00.

"5. Did the defendants pay to or for themselves, any part of the capital stock of Willis Grocery Company, and if so, in what amount?

"Answer: $5,308.00.

"6. What amount will be refunded to pay the debts of Willis Grocery Company, over and above the assets of the bankrupt estate of the Willis Grocery Company?

"Answer: $3,234.00."

Judgment on verdict for plaintiffs for $3,234, amount required to pay the corporate debts, and defendants excepted and appealed.

Whitehurst & Barden and Ward & Ward, of New Bern, for appellants.

H. P. Whitehurst and R. A. Nunn, both of New Bern, for appellee.

HOKE, J. [1] Both under general principles of corporate law, appertaining to the subject, and with us by express enactment, stockholders of an insolvent corporation are liable pro rata for their unpaid subscriptions to an amount necessary to liquidate the corporate debts. Whitlock v. Alexander, 160 N. C. 465, 76 S. E. 538; McIver v. Hardware Co., 144 N. C. 478, 57 S. E. 169, 119 Am. St. Rep. 970; Consolidated Statutes, chapter 22,  $\S$  1160. In the same statute (section 1179) it is also provided as follows:

"No corporation may declare and pay dividends except from the surplus or net profits arising from its business, or when its debts, whether due or not, exceed two-thirds of its assets, nor may it reduce, divide, withdraw, or in any way pay to any stockholder any part of its capital stock except according to this chapter. In case of a violation of any provision of this section, the directors under whose administration the same occurs are jointly and severally liable, at any time within six years after paying such dividend, to the corporation and its creditors, in the event of its dissolution or insolvency, to the full amount of the dividend paid, or capital stock reduced, divided, withdrawn, or paid out, with interest on the same from the time such liability accrued. Any director who was absent when the violation occurred, or who dissented from the act or resolution by which it was effected, may exonerate himself from such liability by causing his dissent to be entered at large on the minutes of the directors at the time the action was taken or immediately after he has had notice of it."

[2] The verdict of the jury on the fourth issue brings case of defendants directly within the provisions of this section 1179, to an amount more than sufficient to pay the corporate debts, and the judgment for the amount of such debts and proper costs and charges has been properly entered against them.

The only objection to the judgment insisted upon in the argument before us was to the allowance of $500 for costs and expenses of the bankruptcy court. It appeared that plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy, had on hand from other sources $636 available to creditors, subject to costs and fees of the bankruptcy proceedings, and the court merely instructed the jury that they should deduct the amount of $500 for such costs from this $636, and credit the amount of indebtedness with the difference, which would leave the balance due from defendants the amount found by the jury in response to the sixth issue. This was clearly permissible, and the objection made was, not to the allowance of the fees, but that the evidence on the subject is not as full and satisfactory as could be desired. We think the testimony of the trustee, made without objection on the cross-examination, is sufficient to uphold the amount allowed.

[3] The presumption is against error. Bernhardt v. Dutton, 146 N. C. 206-209, 59 S. E. 651. And we are of opinion that the objection is not sufficiently supported to justify the court in disturbing the results of the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

No error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

Brokers' Commissions—Evidence held to make a prima facie case entitling a broker to commissions so that it was error to grant nonsuit.

In an action for broker's commissions for the sale of real estate where the evidence tended to show that the broker had produced a purchaser, or contract of sale, in accordance with his agreement, a prima facie case for commissions was made and a judgment of nonsuit was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by F. B. Aycock against Ella W. Bogue, executrix of the estate of H. G. Bogue, deceased. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Civil action to recover broker's commissions alleged to be due under a contract of agency; said agreement being in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Authorization to Sell Land.

"North Carolina, Wayne County:

"In consideration of the sum of one dollar and other valuable considerations, to A. G. Bogue, the undersigned, paid by F. B. Aycock, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I hereby authorize F. B. Aycock, of Fremont, N. C., to sell, or contract to sell, to any person for me on or before the 1st day of December, 1919, at the price of $30,000.00, upon the following terms: $10,000.00 cash, $2,000.00 January 1, 1921, $2,000.00 January 1, 1922, $2,000.00 January 1, 1923, $2,000.00 January 1, 1924, $12,000.00 January 1, 1925. Secured by mortgage on land and interest annually at 6 per cent. the lot or tract of land belonging to A. G. Bogue situated and described as follows: Adjoining the lands of E. L. Pippin, Simon Aycock and others, containing 100 acres, more or less, and being land bought of Kennedy-Moye Realty Company, and known as Wyatt M. Barnes land.

"It is agreed that A. G. Bogue may rent out all crops for the year 1920.

"I agree and bind myself to pay said F. B. Aycock all over the price above mentioned, if he makes said sale, or contract of sale, for me on or before the time above specified.

"And I do hereby bind myself that I will make a good and indefeasible title in fee, free from all incumbrances, by warranty deed, to any person or persons whom the said F. B. Aycock may sell said land to, on or before the date above specified.

"This the 2d day of October, 1919.

"[Signed] A. G. Bogue. [Seal.]"

On the afternoon of December 1, 1919, the plaintiff produced one W. R. Ballance who was ready, able, and willing to buy in accordance with the terms of the above agreement and in keeping with his written contract to purchase. It appears that the signing of the deed by Bogue and his wife, by common consent and mutual acquiescence, was delayed until the next morning, December 2d, as it was desirable not to disturb Mrs. Bogue and her baby that night.

On the following day, and thereafter, Ballance declined to accept the deed on the ground that, under his contract of purchase, he was not bound to take the property unless the deal was consummated on or before the 1st day of December. His written agreement is as follows:

"Agreement to Purchase Land.

"North Carolina, Wayne County:

"In consideration of one ($1.00) dollar and other valuable considerations to me in hand paid by F. B. Aycock, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I do hereby agree and bind myself, my heirs and assigns, to purchase from the said F. B. Aycock, at the price of $31,500.00, upon the terms of $11,500.00 cash, $2,000.00 January 1, 1921, $2,000.00 January 1, 1922, $2,000.00 January 1, 1923, $2,000.00 January 1, 1924, $12,000.00 January 1, 1925, on or before the 1st day of December, 1919, the following described land adjoining the lands of E. L. Pippin, Simon Aycock and others, containing 100 acres, more or less, and being land purchased from G. A. Norwood and Kennedy-Moye Realty Company, and known as Wyatt Barnes land, owned by A. G. Bogue and under contract to be sold by F. B. Aycock.

"Said land to be conveyed to me in fee, free from incumbrances when said sale is made.

"Witness my hand and seal this the 21st day of November, 1919.

"[Signed] W. R. Ballance. [Seal.]

"Witness: J. H. Best."

At the close of plaintiff's evidence and upon motion of counsel for defendant, his honor entered judgment as of nonsuit. Plaintiff appealed.

Dickinson & Freeman and E. M. Land, all of Goldsboro, for appellant.

Langston, Allen & Taylor, of Goldsboro, for appellee.

STACY, J. There is evidence on the record tending to show that the plaintiff produced a purchaser, or a contract of sale, in accordance with his agreement, which prima facie entitles him to his commissions. Therefore the judgment of nonsuit was erroneous.

As to whether there has been any release or abandonment of the contract, so participated in by the plaintiff as to bar his right of recovery, can only be determined by a jury upon a full hearing and under proper instructions from the court. In the absence of all the evidence, we refrain from discussing the case, as it goes back for a new trial; and, in all probability, if Ballance is required to live up to his contract of purchase, which apparently is enforceable, the plaintiff will have no further cause for complaint.

Reversed.

KELLEY v. McLAMB et al. (No. 218.)

1. Receivers ¶19 — Receiver held properly appointed in view of debtor's disappearance leaving property uncared for.

Where proprietor of cotton gin and planing machine was indebted to a large number of creditors, was hopelessly insolvent, and had disappeared to avoid service of process leaving his property uncared for and idle, the court, in action by creditors to adjust liens of creditors on the property of such debtor, properly appointed a receiver before rendition of judgment, under C. S. §§ 860, 861.

2. Receivers ¶200—Compensation properly apportioned between creditors.

Compensation of receiver appointed to care of property which debtor, on his disappearance to avoid service of process, left idle and uncared for, with the consent of and for the benefit of the creditors, was properly apportioned among the creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Bond, Judge.

Action by W. D. Kelley, in behalf of himself and all other creditors of E. C. McLamb, against E. C. McLamb, the Hyman Supply Company, and others, in which a receiver was appointed for defendant E. C. McLamb. To review judgment directing the Hyman Supply Company to pay a portion of the costs and expenses of the receiver, the Hyman Supply Company excepts and appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to adjust certain liens of creditors on the property of their debtor E. C. McLamb. It will give a clear idea of the case to set forth the allegations of the amended complaint supplemented by certain facts not definitely stated therein. The complaint is as follows:

"The plaintiff, Walter D. Kelley, under leave of court first had and obtained, for his amended complaint and petition in the cause alleges:

(1) He does hereby reiterate and reaffirm each and every allegation contained in his former complaint and petition in the cause, in the same manner and of like effect as if herein specifically set forth and declared.

(2) That this action was commenced on November 24, 1920, the petition being filed on the same date in which the appointment of a receiver was prayed for; and the plaintiff does further allege that at the time of the commencement of this action the defendant E. C. McLamb had fled the county, and, since said date, has kept himself concealed at some point unknown to the plaintiff, in order to avoid the service of process; that various summonses have been issued against McLamb, and the sheriff of Sampson county has been unable to serve any of them or locate him.

(3) That heretofore on November 26, 1920, at 9 o'clock in the morning, after this action had commenced, and after the receiver, M. E. Britt, had entered upon the discharge of his duties as such, and while the said E. C. McLamb was hopelessly insolvent, which fact was well known to the defendant the Bank of Warsaw, said bank caused to be filed and recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Sampson county a certain mortgage deed, under the terms of which the defendant E. C. McLamb undertook to convey to the Bank of Warsaw all of the landed property belonging to him in the county of Sampson, the same consisting of eleven tracts of land, and forming practically his entire landed estate; which mortgage deed recites that the same is made for the purpose of securing several notes aggregating $150,000, loaned to the said E. C. McLamb by the Bank of Warsaw. The mortgage deed, dated November 19, 1920, was duly probated and filed for registration on the date above named, and now appears of record in Book 356, p. 416, of the Register's Office of Sampson county.

(4) The plaintiff is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief alleges, that, at the time of the execution of the mortgage, E. C. McLamb was indebted to the bank in a sum not exceeding $14,000, and having taken and accepted notes, secured by a mortgage deed, which it had recorded, for $150,000, the Bank of Warsaw thereby now holds the proceeds of the notes and mortgage amounting to $136,000, the property of the defendant E. C. McLamb, and now belonging to the receiver, M. E. Britt, to be administered by him for the benefit of the other creditors.

(5) The plaintiff further alleges that the defendant E. C. McLamb is the owner of $5,000, par value, of the capital stock of the Bank of Warsaw, which is now in possession of the bank, and that the stock is now a part of the assets of E. C. McLamb, and should be turned over to the receiver to be administered by him, together with the other property of McLamb, for the benefit of his creditors.

(6) The plaintiff further alleges that, at the time of the execution of the mortgage deed, or immediately prior thereto, there was an agreement between McLamb and the Bank of Warsaw that in consideration of the execution and delivery of the mortgage deed the bank would assume and pay off all of the debts and liabilities of E. C. McLamb and save his creditors harmless; and that the mortgage deed and notes secured thereby were executed by E. C. McLamb and his wife pursuant to that understanding and agreement; and the plaintiff therefore alleges that in consequence of that agreement, followed by the acceptance and registration of the mortgage deed above referred to, the Bank of Warsaw is now justly indebted to M. E. Britt, the receiver appointed in this cause, in the sum of $136,000, which amount should be paid in order that it may be prorated among the various creditors of E. C. McLamb.

Wherefore, the plaintiff demands judgment against the Bank of Warsaw in conformity with the foregoing allegations.

Upon the pleading, that is, the complaint and answer, and upon affidavits, Judge Geo. W. Connor, on December 3, 1920, entered an order, not excepted to, in which is the following clause:

"It further appearing to the court that the defendant E. C. McLamb was the owner of a valuable gin and planer mill in the town of Clinton, which property is now lying idle and is subject to fire, and upon which there are various recorded liens, it is further ordered and adjudged that the receiver be and he is hereby directed to insure said property in some standard insurance company for such amount as he may deem proper, in order that the rights of creditors may be safeguarded and protected; and the receiver will pay out the first moneys coming into his hands, it being understood that the costs of said insurance is to be hereafter placed against such creditors of the said E. C. McLamb as the court may deem just and proper; and the receiver, if he shall be so advised by counsel, is hereby authorized and empowered to employ a night watchman to guard said property during the continuance of this receivership, or until the property shall be sold under the future orders of the court."

Additional Facts.

E. C. McLamb, one of the defendants, purchased a lot in the town of Clinton, and during the early part of the year 1920 he set up on the lot a cotton gin and planing mill. Certain parts of the machinery, including boilers, engines, planers, etc., were purchased from the defendant Hyman Supply Company, under conditional sale contracts, all of which are admitted to have been properly recorded in Sampson county, prior to the institution of this action, and at the date of the issuance of the summons in this cause E. C. McLamb was indebted to the Hyman Supply Company in the sum of $7,471.76. The defendant Mc-

Lamb became indebted to various and sundry parties in amounts aggregating about $150,000, some of the debts being secured and others being in the shape of notes and open accounts. Upon the petition of the plaintiff, an order was entered by Judge Geo. W. Connor, on November 23, 1920, appointing M. E. Britt as temporary receiver of the mill property above referred to, and the receiver thereupon took into his custody and possession all of the machinery, etc., upon which the defendant Hyman Supply Company held a lien.

On January 28, 1921, the Hyman Supply Company moved the court for an order requiring the receiver to surrender to it all of the property referred to in the conditional sale contracts, or that the receiver be directed to sell the same and permit the Hyman Supply Company to bid in the property; its bid to be credited on its account against E. C. McLamb. The receiver filed an answer to the motion, and at Kenansville, N. C., on December 30, 1920, Judge Connor entered an order making the receivership permanent, and ordering the receiver to sell all of the property, including the property upon which the Hyman Supply Company had a lien, and in the order it was expressly provided as follows:

"Any of the lien creditors may bid on said property, the lien creditors having the right to bid in the property covered by their respective liens, and apply such bid on the debts due them, and the balance, if any, shall be paid over to the receiver, to be held subject to the further orders of the court."

In the order of Hon. Geo. W. Connor, Judge, dated December, 3, 1920, the court having before it the pleadings, including the answer of the appellant, directed the receiver to insure the property, if possible, and if no insurance could be secured, to employ a night watchman to guard and protect the same, and this item of expense, together with the taxes upon the property as shown on the expense account of the receiver, is claimed by plaintiffs to be clearly such a liability as should be charged against the appellant the Hyman Supply Company, whose property was protected thereby and which was asked for by the attorneys representing the appellant.

M. E. Britt was also appointed a referee and directed to ascertain the amount of the various debts, the priority of liens, etc., and at the same time it was adjudged that the lien of Hyman Supply Company was prior to all other claims. The receiver made sale of the property, after legal notice, on March 26, 1921, at which time Hyman Supply Company, acting under the authority of the order of sale as made by Judge Connor, purchased all of the property covered by its conditional sales contract, for the sum of $7,400. Said sale was reported to the court and duly confirmed, and a bill of sale made to Hyman Supply Company by said receiver.

At May term, 1921, the receiver and referee made a report, showing that at the time of said sale E. C. McLamb was indebted to Hyman Supply Company in the sum of $7,471.76, that the bid of the Hyman Supply Company on the property was $7,400, so that there is still a balance due said company by the defendant McLamb. The receiver also reported that other lien creditors had bid in certain property covered by their respective liens; that the total bids amounted to $26,500, all of the bids being made by creditors who held liens and who were acting under the order of Judge Connor, made at Kenansville, N. C., on December 30, 1920.

The receiver presented to the court an itemized expense account, covering the costs of night watchman, commissions, etc., amounting in the aggregate to \$1,164.14, and requested the court to charge the sum against the several purchasers at the sale in the proportion of their respective bids. The Hyman Supply Company filed exceptions to this report, and resisted the payment of any part of the costs and expenses of the receivership, because there was still a balance due it under its recorded contracts. The exceptions were overruled and judgment entered, directing the Hyman Supply Company to pay into the clerk's office a sum of money equivalent to  $\frac{74}{265}$  of said costs and expenses, amounting by actual calculation to the sum of \$325.08. To this judgment the defendant Hyman Supply Company excepted and appealed.

All of the material facts necessary for a proper determination of the question at issue are practically admitted in the case on appeal.

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellant.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above. [1] This, it seems to us, was a typical case for the appointment of a receiver, and the order of Judge Connor was eminently proper, and there appears to have been no serious objection to it, if any at all. We have held that a receiver will be appointed before judgment where plaintiff shows imminent danger of loss by defendant's insolvency (Bank v. Bridgers, 114 N. C. 381, 19 S. E. 642; Mahoney v. Stewart, 123 N. C. 106, 31 S. E. 384), or where there is reason to apprehend that the subject of the controversy will be destroyed, or removed, or otherwise disposed of by defendant pending the action (Ellett v. Newman, 92 N. C. 519; Thompson v. Silverthorne, 142 N. C. 12, 54 S. E. 782, 115 Am. St. Rep. 727), or where defendant is insolvent and all property must be sold to pay debts (Machine Co. v. Lumber Co., 109 N.

C. 576, 13 S. E. 869), or where it is alleged that defendant is attempting to defraud plaintiff (Stern v. Austern, 120 N. C. 107, 27 S. E. 31; Pearce v. Elwell, 116 N. C. 593, 21 S. E. 305). There are, of course, other cases where a receiver may, and will be, appointed by the court, as in the case of a trust, to completely execute or to facilitate its execution (Rousseau v. Call, 169 N. C. 173, 35 S. E. 414), or where a foreign corporation is insolvent, the court may appoint a receiver to protect resident creditors and for other purposes (Holshouser v. Copper Co., 138 N. C. 248, 50 S. E. 850, 70 L. R. A. 183; Silk Co. v. Spinning Co., 154 N. C. 421, 70 S. E. 820, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 897), and there are still other instances where the power will be exercised, but those above enumerated will suffice here. The statute provides:

"A receiver may be appointed: (1) Before judgment, on the application of either party, when he establishes an apparent right to property which is the subject of the action and in the possession of an adverse party, and the property or its rents and profits are in danger of being lost, or materially injured or impaired; except in cases where judgment upon failure to answer may be had on application to the court. (2) After judgment, to carry the judgment into effect. (3) After judgment, to dispose of the property according to the judgment, or to preserve it during the pendency of an appeal, or when an execution has been returned unsatisfied, and the judgment debtor refuses to apply his property in satisfaction of the judgment. (4) In cases provided in chapter entitled Corporations in the article Receivers; and in like cases, of the property within this state of foreign corporations. The article Receivers, in the chapter entitled Corporations, is applicable as far as may be, to receivers appointed hereunder." Consol. Statutes, vol. 1, § 860, and the cases applicable will be found well arranged in the notes to that section.

In certain cases, the court, in its discretion, may allow a bond to be given by any party who deems that he may be prejudiced by the appointment of a receiver, in lieu of such appointment. Consol. Statutes, § 861.

The very ground upon which this appointment was made was the danger of the loss or destruction of the property, and all of the parties were surely interested in its preservation and equally, or at least proportionately, benefited by it. Can it be that in either law, or surely in equity, the party who reaps the benefit should not bear his just share of the burden? We clearly think not. The general subject of costs and expenses allowable to a receiver by court of chancery is fully discussed in High on Receivers (Ed. of 1894) §§ 796-810. It is said there, in section 796:

"The appropriate method of procedure is to have his compensation fixed by the court, to be allowed out of the assets in his hands, and the amount thus determined to be due him may be taxed as costs in the action."

And again in the same section, at page 729:

"If, however, the appointment of the receiver was proper in the first instance, even though plaintiffs do not intimately prevail in the suit, it is within the discretion of the court to allow the receiver payment for his services and expenses out of the proceeds of the litigation, and an appellate court will not interfere with the exercise of such discretion when it has not been abused."

In French v. Gifford, 81 Iowa, 428, Judge Miller states the rule in such cases very lucidly, as follows:

"It is insisted by plaintiff's counsel that the compensation of the receiver should be paid out of the fund of which he had the custody and charge, and that he should be permitted to retain the same therefrom. Numerous cases have been cited to show that such is the uniform practice. Upon an examination of these cases it will be found that in every case there was no question made as to the legality or propriety of the appointment of the receiver; that in each case the receiver closed up the business and settled his accounts in pursuance of his appointment. The receivership in each case was for the benefit of those interested in the fund, and he was paid therefrom, which is only another method of apportioning the costs upon those entitled to the fund. The only case which has been brought to our attention, in which the order appointing the receiver was set aside, is the case of Verplank v. Mercantile Insurance Co., 2 Paige, 438, and in that case the chancellor ordered the receiver to turn over all the property, without allowing him any commissions therefrom. We think it would be an unjust and inequitable rule, if in all cases the receiver should be entitled to his compensation from the fund in his hands, without reference to the legality of his appointment. Under the operation of such a rule, innocent persons might be made to suffer great loss.

"The general rule as to costs, both at law and in equity, is that they shall be adjudged to the successful, and against the unsuccessful, party. Rev. § 33449. And they will be so adjudged, unless there exists some equitable consideration to justify a different disposition, or the case is otherwise provided for by law. In cases like the one under consideration, we may adjudge the costs to one or either of the parties, or apportion them."

[2] The court accordingly directed that the fund be charged with one-third of the receiver's compensation, and the plaintiff with the remaining two-thirds; and this accords with our law. The appellant, Hyman Supply Company, unfortunately misunderstands, or misconstrues, the nature of the essential facts which clearly impose upon it the duty of supplying its share to the general fund for the payment or satisfaction of the costs and expenses. It has received a clear benefit by having the property protected to which it looked for the payment of its claims. The receiver insured the same, or kept a watchman to guard it, so as to prevent its destruction by fire, or depredations upon it by evil-minded persons. The receiver has, besides, sold the property by agreement of the parties and the proceeds have been applied to the payment of the debts, the plaintiff receiving the major part, having a prior lien. The receiver was required to give bond for the faithful discharge of his official duties, and to keep his accounts, making proper entries from time to time. There is no suggestion that he has not been energetic in the performance of his trust and faithful in all things, and there is not the slightest impeachment of him in respect to his dealings and transactions as receiver. Why then should he not be compensated by the parties? It is certainly just and equitable that he should be, and the law usually follows equity in this respect and adjudges that the laborer is worthy of his hire. There is no objection to the amount of the costs and expenses or to any item of the account. The objection goes entirely to the right to recover anything of the appellant. We conclude that it is not only liable to contribute to paying the receiver, but that Judge Bond (acting in furtherance and final execution of Judge Connor's order to which no exception was taken) has properly and equitably apportioned the total amount of costs and expenses to be paid among the respective parties, and appellant should be content therewith.

The case of Humphrey v. Lumber Co., 174 N. C. 514, 93 S. E. 971, is not applicable to this case, where the facts are different. The receiver here was appointed with the consent of the Hyman Supply Company and for the protection of its property, if he was not appointed at its request, and for its benefit, which benefit it received, and of which the supply company availed itself as appears in the record. If it voluntarily receives the benefit, it must bear the burden. In this respect, if not in others, our case essentially differs from the Humphrey Case, supra. Not only should the supply company pay its fair proportion of the costs and expenses because it consented to the receivership and took benefit therefrom, but because the property on which it had a lien was exposed to great danger; E. C. McLamb having taken refuge in flight, leaving the property without any keeper, and in the throes of hotly contested litigation, thereby enhancing the danger of destruction by fire and idle intruders, and increasing the temptation to injure or destroy it. A receivership was needed more by the supply company, and it derived greater advantage therefrom, than any one else.

There being no error, we decline to reverse, or modify, the judgment.

Affirmed.

Where plaintiff's attorney consented to a reduction of the verdict on the court's intimation that the verdict would be set aside as against the evidence, and after entry of the judgment in the reduced amount it was made to appear, on plaintiff's motion, that the consent was contrary to plaintiff's instruction, the court had authority to entertain the motion and set aside the judgment.

4. Estoppel ⇨68(2)—Plaintiff, repudiating his attorney's act in consenting to reduction of verdict, cannot insist that the verdict as rendered shall stand.

Where plaintiff's attorney consents to the reduction of a verdict on intimation by the court that the verdict will be set aside as contrary to the evidence, and, on motion by plaintiff, it appears that the consent was unauthorized and contrary to plaintiff's instructions, it was improper to permit the verdict as rendered to stand; but the entire verdict should be set aside, under the doctrine of estoppel as to assuming inconsistent positions to another's prejudice.

5. Estoppel ⇨68(2)—Judgment declared, but not entered by agreement, may be entered nunc pro tunc on repudiation of agreement.

C. S. § 591, which requires that a motion to set aside a verdict be made before the judge who tried the cause and only at the trial term, does not interfere with the application of equitable principles; and where a judge has decided to set aside an entire verdict at the trial term, and is only prevented from doing so by reason of an agreement which has been repudiated by one of the parties, the party repudiating is estopped from resisting entry of the judgment nunc pro tunc.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨309—Tenant holding over after term held not bound as a matter of law to pay rent at increased rate.

Though a lease provides that the landlord may increase the rent at any time on notice, it cannot be held as matter of law, in summary proceedings in ejectment under the Landlord and Tenant Act, that plaintiff is entitled to judgment for an increased rental in accordance with notice, where defendant contends and shows by evidence that there was a contract, subsequent to the lease, whereby defendant, in consideration of the making of improvements, was not to be disturbed in his possession for the term of one year, which term had not expired.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by K. E. Bizzell against the Auto Tire & Equipment Company. Judgment for plaintiff for an amount less than the verdict was set aside, and the original verdict restored, and both parties appeal. Modified on defendant's appeal, and affirmed on plaintiff's appeal.

Summary proceedings in ejectment under the Landlord and Tenant Act (C. S. §§ 2341-2376), instituted before a justice of the peace, carried by appeal to the county court of Wayne county, and thence to superior court of said county, where it was tried before his honor, W. A. Devin, judge, and a jury, at November term, 1920. On the trial, plaintiff offered in evidence a contract of rental of the property to defendant at $57.50, for month beginning January 19, 1920; said contract containing, among others, the following provision:

"The party of the first part hereby reserves the right to raise the rent at any time, and it is further agreed that, if any part of the rent hereinbefore mentioned shall not be paid at the time agreed upon, although no demand shall have been made for same, the parties of the second party hereby contract and agree that this agreement shall serve as notice to vacate the premises within three days of such failure."

Defendants occupied under said lease, paying the stipulated rent till June 9, 1920, when plaintiff caused to be served on defendants a written notice to the effect that, if defendants should hold over "for one day after June 18, they would be held legally responsible for rent at $150 per month." Defendant alleged, and offered evidence tending to show, that subsequent to the written lease above referred to, plaintiff and defendant had mutually entered into a further agreement to the effect that if defendant should put certain specified improvements on the premises amounting to near $2,000, and which had been done, defendants would be allowed to keep the premises for at least one year, and that the rental should at no time be raised higher than $75 per month. The witnesses all testified that a fair monthly rental for the property would not exceed $60.

The jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Is plaintiff entitled to recover possession of the store building described in plaintiff's affidavit?"

"Answer: Yes."

"(2) In what amount is defendant indebted to plaintiff for rent of said building?"

"Answer: $111.66% per month."

His honor ruled, and so instructed the jury, on the second issue that, if first issue was answered for plaintiff, she was entitled to recover a fair monthly rental for the property. On the rendition of verdict and motion by defendant to set same aside, the court as against the weight of the evidence intimated that he would set aside the entire verdict as against the weight of the evidence, unless the plaintiff would consent to reduce the amount of the verdict to $60 per month. Thereupon, in open court, plaintiff's attorney consented, without being authorized to do so by his client, that the monthly value of the building as found by the second issue, be reduced from $111.66% to $60, and judgment was thereupon entered for $60 per month for the time building was occupied after notice, etc., said judgment reciting that plaintiff consented to same.

Defendant insisted on his position, and excepted and appealed from judgment as rendered, but same was not perfected. Plaintiff did not appeal, and made no motion in the case at November or at the January term of the court, but at April term, 1921, before his honor, Lyon, judge presiding, moved to set aside the judgment on the ground that the attorney acted without authority and contrary to their express instructions in consenting to a reduction of the verdict. On affidavits submitted, the court finds that said consent was given without authority; that but for said consent the judge presiding would have set aside the entire verdict. The court on his findings adjudged that the former judgment of Judge Devin be set aside, but, being of opinion that he was without authority to disturb the verdict of $111.66%, this being at a term subsequent to term when same was rendered, entered judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the original verdict and both plaintiff and defendants appealed.

Defendant's Appeal.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is very generally understood, uniformly so far as examined, that an attorney at law, by virtue of his employment as such in a given case, has the control and management of a suit in all matters of procedure, and, in the absence of fraud and collusion, can make such stipulations and agreements as may commend themselves to his judgment, in so far as they may affect the remedy he is endeavoring to pursue. Chemical Co. v. Bass, 175 N. C. 426, 95 S. E. 766; Gardiner v. May, 172 N. C. 192, 89 S. E. 955; Harrill v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 542, 57 S. E. 382; Westhall v. Hoyle, 141 N. C. 338, 53 S. E. 863; Hairston v. Garwood, 123 N. C. 345, 31 S. E. 653; Henry v. Hilliard, etc., 120 N. C. 479, 27 S. E. 130; 2 R. C. L. tit. "Attorneys," § 63. Under the principles stated it is held in many decisions on the subject that an attorney may consent to a judgment against his client, and the same will be considered as binding, although no actual authority is shown. Under ordinary conditions an implied authority is presumed from his office and employment. Harrill's Case, supra; Stump & Sons v. Long, 84 N. C. 616. And see numerous authorities to this effect in editorial note to Tobler v. Nevitt, 45 Colo. 231, 100 Pac. 416, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 702, 16 Ann. Cas. 925, appearing in 132 Am. St. Rep. at page 162.

It is also fully recognized that an attorney, by virtue of his office and ordinary employment in a case, has no implied power to compromise his client's cause of action, or to enter into stipulations or agreements which sensibly impair such client's substantial rights and interests presented and involved in the litigation. Moye v. Cogdell, 69 N. C. 93; Gibson v. Nelson, 111 Minn. 183, 126 N. W. 731, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 523, 137 Am. St. Rep. 549. And see concurring opinion of Walker, Judge, in Chemical Co. v. Bass, 175 N. C. 426, 95 S. E. 766, the same containing a helpful discussion and full citation of cases on the subject. Though it is sometimes said that the weight of judicial opinion is in favor of upholding consent judgments, entered under the implied powers of an employed attorney, some of the decisions referred to have been subjected to adverse comment by intelligent writers as trenching upon the second position stated, that an attorney may not without express authority enter into a compromise of the cause of action committed to him, and the sensible impairment of his client's rights thereunder. See editorial note to Clark v. Randall, 9 Wis. 135, appearing in 76 Am. Dec., pages 252-259, and 2 R. C. L. tit. "Attorneys at Law," § 91.

[2] And in this jurisdiction it has been expressly held that where a judgment has been taken by consent of the attorney, and it appears of record that such consent is pursuant to a compromise which sensibly impairs the client's substantial rights, and on motion made in apt time it is established that the consent and compromise is without express authority from the client, and even contrary to his instructions, such judgment will be set aside. And the same position should obtain where, though not appearing of record, it is shown on motion and proper proof that such a judgment has been entered, and the impeaching facts were known to the opposing litigant, or the attendant circumstances were such that knowledge should be imputed. Bank v. McEwen, 160 N. C. 414, 76 S. E. 222, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 542, and cases cited.

[3] Under these decisions, and others of like kind, and by courts of approved ability and learning, his honor clearly had the right to deal with the questions presented in the motion; it appearing that the agreement and consent judgment entered into by way of compromise and adjustment was not only without authority, but contrary to the express instructions of the client, and that by such judgment plaintiff was precluded from insisting on her claim for $150 monthly rental, and also deprived of the $111.66% monthly rental, which had been awarded her by the jury. And this case of Bank v. McEwen is authority for the position, also, that when the facts call for the application of the principle its effect and operation is not prevented because the course has been taken with the sanction and approval of the court. This by no means intimates that his honor would have permitted or signed the judgment entered, had the lack of authority been made known. That was only made to appear at the later hearing, and we deem it not improper here to note, also, that no blame is laid by any one on the attorney who, always faithful to his client's interest, did the duty that he thought was required of him under the circumstances presented.

[4] While we thus uphold the power of the court to take cognizance of the questions presented in the motion, we are of opinion that his honor should have gone further and set aside the entire verdict as the only lawful adjustment of the rights of the parties on the premises. It is an equitable principle, very generally recognized, that in a given transaction a man may not assume and maintain inconsistent positions to the prejudice of another's rights. And the principle so stated is usually allowed to prevail either in court proceedings or in transactions between individuals. Ingram v. Power Co., 181 N. C. 359-411, 107 S. E. 209; Maxton Auto Co. v. Rudd, 176 N. C. 497, 97 S. E. 477; Lipsitz v. Smith, 178 N. C. 98-100, 100 S. E. 247; Brown v. Chemical Co., 165 N. C. 421, 81 S. E. 463; Railroad v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258, 24 L. Ed. 693. In the case of Maxton Auto Co. v. Rudd, supra, it is said that—

"The position is usually referred to the doctrine of estoppel in pais, which rests, in its last analysis, on the principles of fraud."

From the facts presented in the record, it appears that plaintiff on the first issue had established the right to eject defendant, and on the second had recovered $111.66% monthly rental for a wrongful detention. The judge from the bench gave intimation that, unless the plaintiff agreed to a reduction of the amount awarded on the second issue, he would set aside the entire verdict, and the court on the present hearing finds as a fact that his honor would have done so. Acting on this, the counsel in good faith, believing he was within his authority, consented to the reduction, and plaintiff thereby succeeded in maintaining her recovery on the first issue. We have held that the agreement, being in the nature of the compromise and contrary to the client's instructions, could be set aside at plaintiff's demand; but when she repudiates the benefits she must surrender the advantages that arose to her from the action of her attorney, and under a proper application of the authorities cited, and the principles they approve and illustrate, his honor should have set aside the entire verdict, thus giving the parties opportunity to relitigate the issues. This was the course pursued in Bank v. McEwen, supra, a case that is decisive of the principal questions presented on defendant's appeal.

[5] In making this disposition of defendant's appeal, we are not unmindful of section 591, Const. St., which requires that a motion to set aside a verdict may be made before the judge who tried the cause and only at the trial term. That statute, however, refers to motions made in the ordinary course and practice of the court, and does not and is not intended to impair or interfere with equitable principles controlling the conduct of the litigant in the subsequent course of a proceeding. As a matter of fact, the trial judge had decided to set aside the entire verdict and at the trial term, and was only prevented from doing so by reason of the agreement which plaintiff has repudiated, and, this being true, she is estopped from resisting the entry of such judgment nunc pro tunc.

On defendant's appeal, the judgment will be modified to accord with this opinion, and the costs of said appeal will be divided between the parties.

Modified.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

[6] Plaintiff appeals in the cause, insisting for error that the court should have ruled that, on a wrongful holding over, the defendant was liable for $150 monthly rental as a matter of law, and this by reason of the notice given, and the stipulations of the contract, that she reserved the right to raise the rent at any time, and that, if any of the rent was not paid, though no demand was made, that defendant would surrender the premises on three days' notice, etc.

There are authorities to the effect that, where a landlord in proper time before termination of lease notifies the tenant that, if he continues to occupy longer, it shall be at a rental specified, and the tenant, after such notice received, holds over without demur or protest, there will be an obligation to pay the higher rental as specified. 2 McAdam, Landlord & Tenant (3d Ed.) § 279. But this we apprehend is on the ground of acquiescence, and from which an implied contract to pay the higher rental could be reasonably inferred. It may be that such a principle might be extended to a case where a tenant, after such a notice given, withholds possession wantonly without any fair and reasonable belief in his right, though on this supposition we make no present decision. It is ordinarily true that the obligation to pay rent must arise out of contract, express or implied, and we are very well assured that, on the facts of this record, defendant may not be held to a rental of $150 as a matter of law, merely on plaintiff's notice that such an amount would be insisted on after the stipulated date; it appearing that defendant withheld possession under claim of right and with evidence on his part tending to show that, by a contract subsequent to the principal lease and in consideration of valuable improvements, plaintiff had agreed that defendant's possession should not be disturbed within the year, which had not expired, and no witness having so far testified that the fair rental value would exceed $60 per month. On the record, plaintiff has established no contract, express or implied, for a greater rental than the fair and reasonable value of the property, and his honor correctly held that, in case a wrongful withholding should be established, this should be the measure of plaintiff's recovery. Martin v. Clegg, 163 N. C. 528, 79 S. E. 1105; De Young v. Buchanan, 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 149, 32 Am. Dec. 156.

There is no error, and on question presented on plaintiff's appeal the judgment is affirmed.

No error.

LEWIS v. NUNN et al. (No. 224.)

Appeal and error — 1099(3)—Decision on prior appeal conclusive on subsequent appeal involving similar facts.

Holding of Supreme Court on prior appeal that a tender of the entire mortgage debt by mortgagor was necessary to stay action on the part of the trustee, on default by mortgagor in payment of installment note when due, held conclusive on subsequent appeal, involving substantially similar facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Bond, Judge.

Action by J. C. Lewis against F. R. Nunn and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants except and appeal. Judgment affirmed. No error.

The action is by purchaser of land at foreclosure by sale of trustee under a deed to secure four several promissory notes, maturing, $75 on November 1, 1918, $200 on November 1, 1919, $200 on November 1, 1920, and $600 on November 1, 1921, and with a stipulation that, on failure to pay the notes and interest on either of them, or any part thereof, when due, then "all the amounts due in said bonds shall immediately become due and payable." There was default in payment of first note and interest, and on due advertisement property was sold by trustee, at which sale plaintiff purchased and received his deed, etc. Defendant alleged and offered evidence tending to show that the creditor had agreed to indulge defendant as to payment of first note, and that prior to sale, and after its maturity, he had tendered the amount of the first note and accrued interest thereon, together with all other interest on the debt due at time of tender. The cause was submitted to the jury, and verdict rendered on the following issue:

"(1) Are defendants or either of them entitled to redeem the land in controversy in this action? Answer: No."

Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant excepted and appealed, assigning for error the charge of the court that on the evidence, if believed, the jury should answer the issue as stated.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellants.
Moore & Croom and Cowper, Whitaker & Allen, all of Kinston, for appellee.

HOKE, J. This cause was before us on a former appeal, and will be found reported in 180 N. C. 159, 104 S. E. 470. On questions more directly relevant to the present trial, it was held there:

"(1) That the mere promise of the mortgagee to extend the time to the mortgagor for the payment of the mortgage note without more has no legal consideration, and is unenforceable.

"(2) Where several notes secured by mortgage are in series, and due at different dates, with provision that upon default in payment of one, all shall become due and payable with interest, after such default in the payment of the note first becoming due, a tender of payment of the note thus due, and interest on all of them in the series, is an insufficient tender."

In this aspect of the matter, the evidence pertinent is substantially the same as that offered at the former trial, there being no testimony or claim on the part of defendant that there had ever been any tender of the amount of the debt, "but only of the note first due, and the accrued interest on the entire sum." His honor correctly ruled that the decision on the former appeal was conclusive, and that in any view of the case the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

In his very earnest and forcible argument before us, counsel for appellant insisted that, while the agreement for indulgence would not constitute a binding contract for lack of a consideration, it should be considered in reference to the first note a waiver of the stipulation maturing the entire debt under the principles recognized and approved by this court in Blizzell v. Roberts, 156 N. C. 272, 72 S. E. 378. Without intimation that such a position could be maintained on the facts presented in this record, we think it is not open to appellant, in view of our decision on the former appeal, that a tender of the entire debt was required to stay action on the part of the trustee. That decision on substantially similar facts affords the controlling rule by which the rights of the parties in the present case must be determined, and the recovery by plaintiff must be sustained.

In Holland v. Railroad, 143 N. C. at page 437, 55 S. E. at page 836, it was said "that a party who loses in this court cannot review the decision in a second appeal, as the proper way is by a petition to rehear." See Public Service v. Power Co., 181 N. C. 356, 107 S. E. 226.

Judgment for plaintiff affirmed.
No error.

SMITH-COURTNEY CO. v. BOARD OF ROAD COM'RS OF HERTFORD COUNTY et al. (No. 109.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

1. Courts §97(5)—Decisions of United States Supreme Court, construing federal Constitution, control.

State courts, in construing the federal Constitution, should follow the decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

2. Constitutional law §127—Legislature may restrict or revoke powers of municipal corporations, but not so as to impair obligations of contract.

A Legislature may at any time restrict or revoke at its pleasure any of the powers of a municipal corporation, including, among others, that of taxation, provided its action in that respect shall not operate directly upon the contracts of the corporation, so as to impair their obligation, by abrogating or lessening the means of their enforcement.

3. Constitutional law §121(1)—Rule against impairment of obligation of contracts applies to state and agents.

The prohibition of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, cl. 1, against the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts, applies to the contracts of a state, and to those of its agents acting under its authority, as well as to contracts between individuals.

4. Mandamus §112—Municipal corporation compelled to levy taxes to pay moneys due under contract.

The courts, on treating as void legislation abrogating or restricting power of taxation delegated to a municipality upon the faith of which contracts were made with it, and on the continuance of which alone they can be enforced, can proceed by mandamus and compel at the instance of parties interested the exercise of that power as if no such legislation had ever been attempted.

5. Municipal corporations §51—Disincorporation does not void legal subsisting contract.

Disincorporation of municipality by legal proceedings does not void its legally subsisting contracts, and on the reincorporation of the same inhabitants the obligation to pay devolves upon the new corporation.

6. Constitutional law §143—Statute making vote necessary to assumption of obligation by new municipality unconstitutional.

A statute making a vote of taxpaying voters necessary to the assumption by a new municipality of a debt of its predecessor, which has been abolished, is an unconstitutional attempt to impair the obligation of a contract, if a liability existed without such vote before the statute.

7. States §191(2)—Mandamus against county officers held not "suit against state."

Mandamus to compel county auditors and county treasurers to levy a tax to pay a judgment based on a township debt is not a suit against the state, within the inhibition of the federal Constitution, because such officers have been forbidden by statute to exercise any such power.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Suit against the State.]

8. Constitutional law §137—Statute reducing rate of taxation held to impair obligation of contract.

Act March 3, 1921, abolishing the township system for constructing and improving roads and substituting the county system, and fixing the tax limit at 25 cents on each $100 worth of property, in so far as it prevents the payment of debts due by a township under contracts entered into when the statutes permitted a levy of taxes at the rate of 50 cents on $100 worth of property, is invalid, as impairing the obligation of contracts.

9. Appeal and error §1106(3)—No disposition of cause where all interested persons not present.

A proceeding in mandamus by one of several creditors of a township to compel county officers to levy taxes to pay a debt could not be finally decided without the presence of the other creditors, where the sole plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to the full amount of his claim, and not merely a pro rata part of the tax to be levied, as provided by statute, for the payment of all similar debts of the township, and an appeal, having been taken from a judgment, was remanded, to the end that the other creditors might be made parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by the Smith-Courtney Company against the Board of Road Commissioners of Hertford County and others. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Remanded, with instructions.

Lloyd J. Lawrence, of Murfreesboro, for plaintiff.

W. D. Boone, of Winton, for defendants.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to compel the defendants, by a writ of mandamus, to levy the necessary tax to pay a debt to plaintiff of $400, contracted and due by the former board of road supervisors of Murfreesboro township, for machinery, tools, and equipment to be used, and which were used, by the board in the construction and improvement of the public roads of the said township; the board of road supervisors being authorized by statute (Pub. Loc. Laws 1913, c. 562) to contract the debt so due to the plaintiff. It is alleged in the case, and appears therefrom to be the fact, that there are claims of other parties due to them and contracted for the same purpose as was the claim of the plaintiff, the total of all of the claims amounting to $11,000, or about that amount. It is further alleged that at the time of contracting the said debts the statute permitted a levy of taxes at the rate of 50 cents on $100 worth of property, and $1.50 on the poll, the original rate being 30 cents on the $100 worth of property and 90 cents on the poll, which by the law of 1919 was increased to 50 cents on the $100 worth of property and $1.50 on the poll, so that, at the time the debt of plaintiff and those debts of the other creditors similarly situated were contracted, the limitation to the levy of taxes for the payment of the same was as above set forth; that is, 50 cents on the $100 worth of property and $1.50 on the poll. By an act passed on March 3, 1921, the Legislature abolished the township system for constructing and improving the roads of the county, and substituted the county system, thereby forming one entire unit of the county, and placing the control and supervision of the public roads in a county road commission, and fixed the tax limit for road purposes (construction and maintenance) at 25 cents on the $100 worth of property and 75 cents on the poll, and by section 26 of said act the Legislature authorized a special and additional tax not exceeding 10 cents on the $100 worth of property and 30 cents on the poll in Murfreesboro township to discharge the existing indebtedness.

[1-7] The plaintiff contends that this reduction of the rate of taxation, from 50 cents on the $100 worth of property and $1.50 on the poll, to 25 cents on the $100 worth of property and 75 cents on the poll, and of the special tax to 10 cents on the $100 worth of property and 30 cents on the poll, impairs the obligation of the contract made with the township prior to the date of the reduction, and is therefore in violation of the Constitution of the United States forbidding the passage of a law by any of the states impairing the obligation of a contract (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, cl. 1); that as the later statutes withdraw the means of fully enforcing the payment of the debt due to the plaintiff, it follows that the obligation to pay all of the debt, or to fully perform the contract in that respect, is impaired, at least, to that extent. While we will not enter upon a full or elaborate discussion of the constitutional question raised here, but leave it for the hearing on the merits, if the case comes back to us, we may refer, at this time, to a few of the many cases decided by the federal Supreme Court, which is the one of last resort upon this phase of the matter in controversy. It has been held by that court that a Legislature may, at any time, restrict or revoke at its pleasure any of the powers of a municipal corporation, including, among others, that of taxation, provided its action in that respect shall not operate directly upon the contracts of the corporation, so as to impair their obligation, by abrogating or lessening the means of their enforcement. Legislation producing this latter result directly, by operating upon those means, is prohibited by the Constitution, and must be disregarded. The prohibition of the Constitution against the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts applies to the contracts of the state, and to those of its agents acting under its authority, as well as to contracts between individuals. The courts, treating as void the legislation abrogating or restricting the power of taxation delegated to a municipality, upon the faith of which contracts were made with it, and upon the continuance of which alone they can be enforced, can proceed and by mandamus compel, at the instance of parties interested, the exercise of that power, as if no such legislation had ever been attempted. The Louisiana act of March 6, 1876 (Act No. 31 of 1876), was held to be invalid so far as it limited the power which the city of New Orleans possessed, when the bonds were issued upon which the judgment in that action was recovered, to levy a tax for their payment. In re Wolff v. Mayor, etc., of New Orleans, 103 U. S. 358, 26 L. Ed. 395.

Where a municipal corporation is dissolved, and a new corporation is created, composed of substantially the same community, including substantially the same taxable property, within reduced territorial limits, organized for the same general purposes, and holding by transfer, without consideration, the public property of the former, it is the successor of the old corporation, and is liable for its debts. The obligations of municipal corporations, upon bonds duly issued by them, are secured by all the guaranties which protect the engagements of private individuals. Any legislative enactment which withdraws or limits the remedies for the enforcement of obligations assumed by a municipal corporation, where no substantial equivalent is provided, is forbidden by the Constitution of the United States. Port of Mobile v. Watson, 116 U. S. 289, 6 Sup. Ct. 398, 29 L. Ed. 620. Disincorporation of a municipality by legal proceedings does not void its legally subsisting contracts, but on the reincorporation of the same inhabitants, and of a territory including street improvements for which bonds were given, the obligation to pay them devolves upon the new corporation. A statute making a vote of taxpaying voters necessary to the assumption of a new municipality of a debt of its predecessor, which has been abolished, is an unconstitutional attempt to impair the obligation of the contract, if a liability existed without such vote before the statute. Shapleigh v. San Angelo, 167 U. S. 646, 17 Sup. Ct. 957, 42 L. Ed. 310.

Mandamus to compel the county authorities, through whom taxes are assessed and collected, to levy a tax to pay a judgment on township bonds cannot be denied on the theory that, because the Legislature of the state might, under its Constitution, have vested in the township authorities the power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, it could not vest such power in county officers. The exercise by a state of its right to alter or destroy its municipal corporations is ineffectual to impair the obligation of municipal contracts. County auditors and treasurers, who are the instruments employed by the state Legislature to assess and collect taxes, may be compelled by mandamus to levy a tax to pay a judgment on township bonds, although the corporate existence of the township has been abolished by the state Constitution, and its corporate agents removed. Mandamus to compel county auditors and county treasurers to levy a tax to pay a judgment on township bonds is not a suit against the state, within the inhibition of the federal Constitution, because such officers have been forbidden by the state Legislature to exercise any such power. Graham v. Folsom, 200 U. S. 248, 26 Sup. Ct. 245, 50 L. Ed. 464. The levy and collection of taxes by the city of New Orleans to satisfy outstanding indebtedness of the metropolitan police board, contracted on the faith of the exercise of the taxing power for its payment, do not exhaust the city's power in the premises, where the city has applied the taxes to other purposes, and has failed to turn them over, upon demand, to the board or its representative.

The receiver of the metropolitan police board in the state of Louisiana, as representative of the interested creditors, is unconstitutionally deprived of the right of taxation by the city of New Orleans for the payment of their claims, which right existed before the enactment of Acts La. 1870, No. 5, by the provisions of that act under which the payment of the judgment recovered by such receiver against the city upon outstanding indebtedness of the board, contracted on the faith of the exercise of the city's power to levy taxes for its payment, may be indefinitely postponed until such time as the city is ready and willing to make such payment. State of Louisiana v. Mayor of New Orleans, 215 U. S. 170, 30 Sup. Ct. 40, 54 L. Ed. 144.

The cases above cited will show the varying phases in which this question as to the impairment of the obligation of contracts has been presented, and will be of service in the further consideration, of this case. The merger of an existing municipal corporation, owing debts, in another, or the abolishment of a municipal corporation owing debts and the legal effect upon its existing contracts, was presented and decided in Broadfoot v. Fayetteville, 124 N. C. 478, 32 S. E. 804, 70 Am. St. Rep. 610; U. S. v. Memphis, 97 U. S. 284, 24 L. Ed. 937; Mt. Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 25 L. Ed. 699. The debts of a municipal corporation are not extinguished by a repeal of its charter, as is demonstrated by Broadfoot's Case, supra, and the several cases cited therein, among which we especially refer to Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472, 26 L. Ed. 197; O'Connor v. Memphis, 6 Lea (Tenn.) 730; Wolff v. New Orleans, supra; Mobile v. Watson, supra; Amy v. Selma, 77 Ala. 103. It was said in Port of Mobile v. Watson, supra, that—"The remedies for the enforcement of such obligations assumed by a municipal corporation, which existed when the contract was made, must be left unimpaired by the Legislature, or, if they are changed, a substantial equivalent must be provided. Where the resource for the payment of the bonds of a municipal corporation is the power of taxation existing when the bonds were issued, any law which withdraws or limits the taxing power and leaves no adequate means for the payment of the bonds is forbidden by the Constitution of the United States, and is null and void." Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 4 Wall. (71 U. S.) 535, 18 L. Ed. 403; Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595, 24 L. Ed. 793; Ralls County Court v. U. S., 105 U. S. 733, 26 L. Ed. 1220; Louisiana v. Pilsbury, 105 U. S. 278, 26 L. Ed. 1090; Louisiana v. Mayor of New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 3 Sup. Ct. 211, 27 L. Ed. 936; Comrs. v. Rather, 48 Ala. 433; Edwards v. Williamson, 70 Ala. 145; Slaughter v. Mobile County, 73 Ala. 134.

[8] The proposition we have somewhat discussed receives strong support and striking illustration in Edwards v. Kearzey, supra, which went to the United States Supreme Court from this court, and in which our homestead exemptions were held to be of no avail against the full recovery of pre-existing debts, because they substantially withdrew from a creditor his right, and remedy, to have his contract with the debtor enforced, or placed an obstacle in the way of its proper enforcement, thereby impairing its obligation. It would seem, therefore, that the later statutes, reducing the limit of taxation as it existed when this contract was made, impaired its obligation and, so far as they did so, were invalid, but we will not finally and conclusively decide this question until all interested parties are before us.

[9] We hold that this controversy cannot be finally and fully decided, and settled, without the presence of the other creditors for several reasons, and among them one is that the sole plaintiff here is claiming that he is entitled to the full amount of his claim, and not merely to a pro rata part of the tax to be levied, as provided by one of the statutes cited above, for the payment of all similar debts of Murfreesboro township. It was stated in the argument here that it would take five or six years to pay the existing debts, if levies could only be made under the provisions of the last two statutes, which would amount to a stay law, and would impair the obligation of the contract. Jacobs v. Smallwood, 63 N. C. 113, Fed. Cas. No. 7163.

We would be deciding the case by piecemeal should we dispose of it, without hearing from the other creditors, or taking such action and proceedings beforehand as would make the judgment binding upon them. We therefore remand the case, to the end that the other creditors similarly concerned may come in voluntarily, or be brought in, so that they may plead and be concluded by whatever judgment is finally rendered; and it will be so certified. The judge may order an amendment of the pleadings, or a replacer, as he may deem necessary, in order to protect the rights of all parties, and to afford all parties ample opportunity to be heard upon the issues involved.

We will not now consider the question concerning the poll tax and its application to special purposes, as it does not necessarily arise in this appeal. The property tax, it is conceded, has been substantially reduced from what it was when the debts due the plaintiff and others were contracted, and this is sufficient to show that the obligation in each of those contracts was impaired, as the means of enforcing them have been denied, or rather diminished, sufficiently to seriously prejudice the rights of those creditors.

Remanded, with instructions.

CLARK, C. J. (concurring in the result).
The statute sought to be enforced, chapter —, Public Local Laws 1921, entitled "An act to appoint road commissioners for Hertford county," under which the plaintiff asks a mandamus to levy this tax, specifies that its sole purpose is the construction and maintenance of the roads, and for that purpose authorizes a levy of 25 cents on the $100 worth of property and 75 cents on the poll, and section 26 of said act further authorizes a special and additional tax, not exceeding 10 cents on the $100 worth of property and 30 cents on the poll in Murfreesboro township to discharge the existing indebtedness for roads in that township. The opinion recognizes the validity of this legislation upon general principles, from which I do not dissent; but it is proper to note, however, that so much of this statute which authorizes the levy of a tax on the poll "for road purposes" is invalid, because in violation of an explicit provision in the state Constitution, which, as adopted in 1868, provides (article 5, § 2):

"The proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor, but in no one year shall more than 25 per cent. thereof be appropriated to the latter purpose."

This provision of the Constitution remains unaltered. When there has been a levy for general purposes, the validity of the poll tax has not always been brought in question, because presumably, when collected, the proceeds of the poll tax would be applied to the constitutional purposes to which it is restricted; i. e., education and the poor. But this particular act is restricted to a specific purpose therein expressed, that the tax is to be levied for the construction and maintenance of roads. So much of the act as levies a poll tax for such purpose is therefore unconstitutional and invalid. This, however, can be struck from the act without impairing the validity of the property tax. This course has been pursued in several cases.

As we have now declared a legislative policy of incurring an indebtedness of $50,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of roads, it is well to note that, however laudable such purpose may be, the Legislature is forbidden by the Constitution to derive any funds for that purpose from the levy of a poll tax. It is true that at common law, at a time when there was a monopoly of land ownership by the barons in England, there was inaugurated a system by which those who had no wheels or produce to require the use of roads were conscripted without pay to render labor to make the roads for those who had need to use them. When our convention met in 1868, while we did not abolish the poll tax entirely, as nearly all the other states have done, we did restrict the state and county capitation tax to $2, and inserted as a further and just protection that the proceeds of the poll tax should be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor.

The question now presented, under the Constitution, as now amended, whether, if a mandamus issue to enforce collection of taxes under this statute, it shall embrace an order to collect a capitation tax for that purpose, has never heretofore been before this court in any case. Under the Constitution (article 5, § 1) as it stood before the amendment ratified in November, 1920, there was a requirement that "the state and county capitation tax combined shall never exceed $2"; but there was also a provision that the state and county capitation tax "shall be equal * * * to the tax on property valued at $300 in cash." By reason of this requirement of an equation between the capitation tax and the property tax on $300, there were conflicting decisions whether, when the tax on property exceeded that limitation, the tax on the poll should also exceed it, and there were also conflicting decisions whether, when there was such excess, the tax on the poll could be applied for the benefit of bondholders and other purposes, or was restricted to "education and the support of the poor." In a unanimous opinion by Judge Connor (Railroad v. Commissioners, 148 N. C. 220, 61 S. E. 690), and Perry v. Commissioners, 148 N. C. 522, 62 S. E. 608 (Hoke, J.), it was held that the poll tax "could never exceed $2 on the head," and must be applied to "education and the support of the poor." And there were other cases to the same effect. On the other hand, in Moose v. Commissioners, 172 N. C. 419, 90 S. E. 441, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 1183, it was held by a divided court (Clark, C. J., and Walker, J., dissenting) that the limitation of $2 applies only where the levy is for the ordinary expenses of the state and county government, and only under such levy was the restriction to be observed that the poll tax should be applied only to "education and the support of the poor."

We also had decisions that, inasmuch as the restriction to $2 on the poll in its terms applied only to the "state and county capitation tax," cities and towns were under no such limitation, and instances were frequent where the total tax levied upon a laboring man, who had nothing to be taxed except his head, often amounted in the aggregate to $9 or $10. These conflicting decisions have ceased to have any bearing, because under the Constitution as now amended the "equation of taxation" between the poll and property has been stricken out, and the Constitution (article 5, § 1) now reads:

"The General Assembly may levy a capitation tax on every male inhabitant of the state over 21 and under 50 years of age, which said tax shall not exceed $2, and cities and towns may levy a capitation tax which shall not exceed $1. No other capitation tax shall be levied."

Section 2 of that article of the Constitution, which provides that "the proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor," remains unaltered. It will therefore be seen that there is no equation of taxation under a construction of which the poll tax can now ever exceed $2 for state and county, or be applied to other purposes than for education and the support of the poor, nor can the cities and towns levy more than $1 as a capitation tax. The language of the Constitution is now made plain: "No other capitation tax shall be levied." There is no equation of taxation to authorize a judicial construction to the contrary. It is also clear from this language that no capitation tax can be levied upon women, or upon men, except between 21 and 50 years of age. It follows that the mandamus, if it shall issue in this case, cannot require the levy of any capitation tax for the maintenance and construction of roads. So much of the statute as provides therefor must be disregarded and stricken out. The valid portion of the statute which authorizes the levy of a property tax for that purpose is not affected by the invalid requirement of a poll tax.

In England from which we derive so much of our legislation a poll tax was twice levied for short periods over 500 years ago, and then it caused what was known as the "Jack Cade" and also the "Wat Tyler" rebellions. It was each time promptly repealed, and has never been collected since, except for 2 or 3 years in the reign of William III, more than 200 years ago, when, again, it was very promptly repealed. The poll tax was not mentioned in the Constitution made at Halifax in 1776. In the Revised Statutes of 1835 the poll tax was 20 cents, which was levied also on slaves, who were not taxed ad valorem. In the Revised Code of 1854 the poll tax was 40 cents and it is current history that it was levied largely because slaves were not taxed according to their value as property.

The Constitution of 1868, in view of this steady growth of the poll tax in amount, placed a limit by providing, "The state and county capitation tax combined shall never exceed $2 on the head," and added a just provision that its proceeds should be applied to "education and the support of the poor." In Judge Connor's well-considered opinion in Railroad v. Commissioners, 148 N. C. 220, 248, 61 S. E. 690, 699, he emphasized these provisions and adds: "This question can never arise again." It did, however, arise again; a contrary view being taken by a majority of the court in Moose v. Commissioners, supra. The question is now settled, as already stated, by the amendment, which, striking out the equation of taxation, restricts the amount of the capitation tax absolutely and adds: "No other capitation tax shall be levied." In Railroad v. Commissioners, 148 N. C. 253, 61 S. E. 702, it is said that our poll tax "is criticized by Hollander on State Taxation, 104, who points out that in this state, in which 60 per cent. of the taxes are paid by persons owning less than $500, the result is that the small taxpayer, if he pay the poll tax also, pays nearly double the rate of the larger taxpayers."

It was doubtless considerations such as these that procured the adoption of the amendment by which the equation of taxation was stricken out, and the total capitation tax, including that by municipalities, was restricted to $3 total, with the unequivocal declaration that "no other capitation tax shall be levied," and retaining unaltered at the same time in the Constitution the provision that "the poll tax shall be applied to education and the support of the poor." It is not without significance that simultaneously with the adoption of the policy of appropriating $50,000,000 for roads there should be this constitutional protection extended to the "man with the hoe"—sometimes called "the forgotten man"; for the same Legislature (1921) took notice of the constitutional provision authorizing the exemption of personal property "to a value not exceeding $300," and by chapter 38, § 72, p. 270, enacted the exemption of that amount for the first time, though the authority had been in the Constitution for more than 50 years.

We must take notice of the evident intent of the constitutional amendment and of the Legislature that no part of the appropriation for roads or any other purpose than "education and the support of the poor" shall be raised out of a capitation tax, which besides is absolutely limited in amount—even for education and the support of the poor—if levied by the state and county to $2, and to a levy of $1 by municipalities.

HARRIS et al. v. McDONALD. (No. 2159.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Ejectment §95(2) — Deed insufficient to make prima facie case of title, when grantor is stranger to title.

A deed from one who is apparently a stranger to the paramount title, and who is not shown to have ever been in possession of the premises conveyed, is insufficient to make out a prima facie case showing title in the grantee claiming thereunder.

2. Adverse possession §61 — Administratrix cannot claim adversely to estate.

An administratrix in possession, and while acting as such, cannot claim adversely to the estate of her intestate.

3. Ejectment §95(2) — Estoppel §15 — Grantee in possession not estopped to deny grantor's title; production under notice does not show claim under deed; defendant must show better title than that under deed produced, unless he denies claiming thereunder.

One in possession of land and claiming it as his own may fortify his title or buy his peace of adverse claimants as often as they may appear, and without being estopped to deny the title of such subsequent vendors.

4. Descent and distribution §66, 75—Land descends to children subject to widow's rights; no presumption that widow elected to take child's part.

Upon the death of the husband and father intestate, the title to his realty vests in his children, subject only to the widow's right to take a child's part or have dower assigned therein; and unless it affirmatively appears that within the time prescribed by law the widow elected to take a child's part, no presumption arises that she ever had any vested interest in such realty.

5. Descent and distribution §66 — Widow's election to take child's part may be shown by circumstances; no presumption that estate was insolvent.

That the widow elected to take a child's part in the estate of the husband may be affirmatively shown by circumstances, as well as by direct evidence.

6. Wills §634(8)—Devise to children of life tenant, should she leave any, held to give contingent remainder.

Under a will devising a two-thirds interest in the estate of the testatrix to testatrix's daughter, "for her use during her natural life, and at her death to her children should she leave any, and if she should leave no children or descendants of a child or children, then to [testatrix's] brother [naming him], should he be in life, or if he is dead then to his children surviving share and share alike," the children of testatrix's daughter, all of whom were born some years after the death of testatrix took a contingent two-thirds remainder interest in the estate.

7. Guardian and ward §79—Contingent remainder cannot be sold under order of ordinary.

Such contingent estates of minors cannot be sold by their guardian under order of the court of ordinary.

8. Guardian and ward §81—Contingent remaindermen not estopped by guardian's deed.

An estoppel must be by one's own act. Hence contingent remaindermen are not estopped by their guardian's deed because they did not move to set aside the guardian's sale within a reasonable time (seven years) after they attained their majority; the life tenant or holder of the precedent estate being still in life.

9. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  186—Written direction that will be destroyed ineffective, when witnessed by only two witnesses.

A request in writing (attested in this case by two witnesses only) to destroy a will is an effort to revoke the will by written instrument; and in view of Civ. Code 1910, § 3918, "an express revocation by written instrument must be executed with the same formality and attested by the same number of witnesses as are requisite for the execution of a will"—that is, three subscribing witnesses.

10. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  173—Direction to third person to destroy insufficient to effect revocation.

Mere direction to destroy a will, not followed by actual destruction, will not effect a revocation, in view of Civ. Code 1910, § 3919, which provides that "an express revocation may be effected by any destruction or obliteration of the original will, or a duplicate, done by the testator, or by his direction, with an intention to revoke."

11. Wills  $\Leftrightarrow$  274, 342—Judgment admitting to record not void because petition does not affirmatively appear; objections to letters of administration accompanied by will held sufficient petition for probate.

A judgment of the court of ordinary admitting a will to record is not void because it is not affirmatively shown that such judgment was based on a written petition to probate the will. The court of ordinary is a court of general jurisdiction, and proceedings prior to judgment will be presumed.

12. Infants  $\Leftrightarrow$  57(2)—Judgment admitting will to record on agreement not void, because one party was a minor, where she enjoyed estate after majority more than seven years.

A judgment of the court of ordinary admitting a will to record, based upon an affidavit of one of the subscribing witnesses to the will and an agreement by the devisees that the will be probated, is not void because one of the devisees (the sole heir at law of the testatrix) was a minor at the time of the making of the agreement; it appearing that such devisee and heir at law enjoyed the estate devised to her by the will for more than seven years after her majority.

13. Direction of verdict held error.

Applying the principles ruled above, the pleadings and evidence raised issues which should have been submitted to the jury for determination, and the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by H. R. Harris and others against Mrs. D. L. McDonald, executrix. Judgment on a directed verdict for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error Reversed.

Mitchell & Mitchell, of Atlanta, and B. W. Fortson, of Arlington, for plaintiffs in error. Pope & Bennet, of Albany, and M. C. Edwards, of Dawson, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. This was an action of ejectment. On the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant and against the plaintiffs for the premises in dispute. The plaintiffs filed a motion for new trial, which was subsequently amended. To the judgment overruling the motion the plaintiffs excepted.

The plaintiffs sought to recover upon the theory that their grandmother, Mrs. Sarah M. Harper, was the owner of the land at the time of her death in 1872, having purchased it from William H. Davis in 1870, and that under the third item of the will of Mrs. Sarah M. Harper a two-thirds interest in the land was devised to her daughter, Lula N. Harper, who afterwards became the mother of the plaintiffs, "for her use during her natural life, and at her death to her children should she leave any, and if she should leave no children or descendants of a child or children, then to [testatrix's] brother, McCormick Neal, should he be in life, or if he is dead then to his children surviving, share and share alike"; that plaintiffs, who were born some years after the death of their said grandmother, took a contingent two-thirds remainder interest in the land, that interest being contingent upon their mother leaving them in life at the time of her death; that their mother afterwards married Henry R. Harris, Jr., and in 1887 conveyed the land to defendant's testator, J. J. McDonald; that the life tenant, plaintiff's mother, died in 1917, leaving surviving her the plaintiffs in this case, who thereupon became seized of a two-thirds interest in the land in fee.

To prove their case the plaintiffs introduced: (1) A warranty deed from William H. Davis to Sarah M. Harper, dated January 4, 1870, conveying to her the premises in dispute for a consideration of $8,000; (2) a certified copy of the will of Mrs. Sarah M. Harper, and the probate thereof; (3) A warranty deed from Lula Harper Harris, the life tenant under the will, as to a two-thirds interest in the land, to defendant's testator, J. J. McDonald, dated January 28, 1887, conveying to him for a consideration of $3,500 the premises in dispute; (4) proof of the marriage of Lula Neal Harper to Henry R. Harris, Jr., in 1873, and that plaintiffs were the sole surviving children of Lula Harper Harris; and (5) proof of the death of Lula Harper Harris on June 11, 1917, and the filing of this suit on November 18, 1917. The deed from William H. Davis to Sarah M. Harper and the deed from Lula Harper Harris to defendant's testator, J. J. McDonald, came from the custody of the defendant, in response to a notice to produce, and both deeds were recorded on November 8, 1902.

The defendant also introduced a deed from Henry R. Harris, Jr., the plaintiff's duly qualified guardian, to E. H. Thornton, dated December 8, 1888, conveying to him, for a consideration of $255, a one-fourth and a one-twelfth undivided interest in the premises in dispute. This deed contained the following recital:

"The interests hereby conveyed being the entire interest in said land given to said children by their grandmother, Mrs. Sarah M. Harper."

The defendant also introduced in evidence a deed from E. H. Thornton to defendant's testator, J. J. McDonald, dated December 10, 1888, and conveying to J. J. McDonald, for a consideration of $1,166.66 a one-third undivided interest in the premises in dispute. All deeds appearing in the record and introduced both by plaintiffs and defendant were recorded on November 3, 1902, in the same Deed Book, consecutively paged.

To meet the prima facie case thus made out the defendant undertook to show: (1) That Robert G. Harper, a citizen of Newton County and the husband of Sarah M. Harper, was in possession of the land at the time of his death in January, 1868, and that the whole title then passed to his sole heir at law, Lula Neal Harper, afterwards Lula Harper Harris, the mother of the plaintiffs, and that consequently her deed to J. J. McDonald conveyed the fee; the defendant contending that Mrs. Sarah M. Harper, under whom plaintiffs claimed, never had any title to the land, because, as the widow of Robert G. Harper, she was not an heir at law, and there was no evidence to show that she had elected to take a child's part of his estate. (2) That William H. Davis (who conveyed to Mrs. Sarah M. Harper, under whom plaintiffs claimed) never had title to nor possession of the land, and that consequently his deed to Sarah M. Harper did not convey title, and Mrs. Sarah M. Harper, the administratrix of Robert G. Harper, could not prescribe under the deed. (3) If Sarah M. Harper ever had any interest in the land, that interest passed upon her death to Lula Neal Harper, her sole heir at law, the defendant contending that the alleged will of Sarah M. Harper had been annulled by her written direction to destroy the same after its execution, and that the alleged probate of the will, based upon an agreement made between Lula Neal Harper, a minor, and McCormick Neal, if binding at all, was binding only between Lula Neal Harper and McCormick Neal, and that the after-born children of Lula Neal Harper could claim no benefit thereunder by way of estoppel or otherwise, and that the alleged probate was ineffectual because no written application for the probate of said will was made to the court of ordinary. (4) If plaintiffs ever had any interest in the land, the same was divested by the sale of that interest, made by their duly qualified guardian to E. H. Thornton, who afterwards conveyed said interest, if any, to J. J. McDonald; the defendant contending that the interest of plaintiffs, if any, was a vested interest, under the will, and could be sold by the guardian, but, if said interest was a contingent interest, it was nevertheless divested by the legal sale made by the guardian, since a sale by a guardian is not adverse to, but for the benefit of, the estate represented by him, and, if the sale by the guardian was illegal, the plaintiffs were estopped, because they did not move to set aside the sale within seven years after the youngest of them had attained majority. (5) The defendant really claimed under Lula Harper Harris, as the sole heir at law of Robert G. Harper.

[1-3] William H. Davis, so far as disclosed by the record, never had title to the land. He never had possession of the land.

"A deed from one who is apparently a stranger to the paramount title, and who is not shown to have ever been in possession of the premises conveyed, is insufficient to make out a prima facie case showing title in the grantee claiming thereunder." Bleckley v. White, 98 Ga. 594(3), 25 S. E. 592.

See, also, Nesmith v. Hand, 128 Ga. 508, 57 S. E. 763.

Mrs. Sarah M. Harper could not prescribe under the deed, because she was the administratrix of the estate, and while acting as such could not claim adversely to the estate. Moreover, she died within less than two years after the execution of the deed. Was the defendant estopped to deny title in William H. Davis? The fact that the defendant produced under notice the deed from William H. Davis to Sarah M. Harper does not show that the defendant necessarily claimed under the deed.

"Where, in the trial of an action for the recovery of land, the plaintiff relied upon the contention that he and the defendant held under a common grantor, which was denied by the defendant, proof by the plaintiff that the defendant had in his possession a chain of title to the premises in dispute, one link of which was a conveyance from the person claimed by plaintiff to be such common grantor, was not, without more, sufficient to authorize a verdict for plaintiff, as the defendant, for aught that appeared, may have held a valid title from a different source." McConnell v. Cherokee Mining Co., 114 Ga. 84, 39 S. E. 941.

It is settled that a defendant in ejectment may rely upon two sources of title. When, however, a deed comes from his custody and is admitted in evidence against him, the burden is cast upon him to show a better title than the deed conveys, if his title under the deed is not sufficient to meet the case made by the plaintiff, unless the defendant expressly denies that he claims under the deed. Brinkley v. Bell, 126 Ga. 480, 483, 55 S. E. 187. See, also, Barnes v. Maddox, 136 Ga. 164, 71 S. E. 129. J. J. McDonald, the grantee of Lula Harper Harris, was dead. The defendant could not, therefore, show by the direct testimony of J. J. McDonald that he claimed the whole title under Lula Harper Harris as the sole heir at law of Robert G. Harper. It appears, however, without dispute, that there was a paramount title in Robert G. Harper, who died in possession of the land. One in possession of land and claiming it as his own may fortify his title, or buy his peace of adverse claimants, as often as they may appear, and without being estopped to deny the title of such subsequent vendors. Yerby v. Gilham, 147 Ga. 342, 94 S. E. 246.

[4, 5] If Mrs. Sarah M. Harper elected to take a child's part of the estate of Robert G. Harper, she became the owner of a one-half undivided interest in the lands in dispute. Mrs. Sarah M. Harper qualified as administratrix of Robert G. Harper on or about August 5, 1868. Plaintiffs introduced a certified copy of her petition to the court of ordinary, made within the first year of administration, for an order "permitting her to carry on the farm for the benefit of the heirs, herself and one child of said deceased," and of the order of said court granting the petition at the November term, 1868. Plaintiffs also introduced a certified copy of Sarah M. Harper's petition (filed October 4, 1869) to the court of ordinary for "leave to sell the land for distribution among the legatees and for payment of debts," reciting that "a fair division of said land cannot be had among the heirs," and the order of court at the November term, 1869, granting the same.

"There is no presumption of law that a widow will elect, or has elected, to take a child's part in the estate of her husband. Jossey v. Brown, 119 Ga. 758. It must affirmatively appear that she elected to take a child's part within the time prescribed by law. This may appear by an election in writing, duly signed, filed, and recorded in the office of the ordinary; but this is not the only method of proving the fact of such election. The fact of election may be shown by circumstances establishing the same, as well as by direct evidence. If the circumstances are such as to establish that an election has been made in time, it is as much affirmatively established as if there were direct evidence to that effect." Rountree v. Gauden, 128 Ga. 737, 740, 58 S. E. 346, 347.

It is settled in this state that upon the death of the husband and father intestate the title to his realty vests in the children, subject only to the widow's right to take a child's part, or have dower assigned therein; and unless it affirmatively appears that within the time prescribed by law the widow elected to take a child's part, no presumption will arise that she ever had any vested estate in such realty. Snipes v. Parker, 98 Ga. 522(2), 25 S. E. 580; Farmers' Banking Co. v. Key, 112 Ga. 301(1), 37 S. E. 447; La Grange Mills v. Kener, 121 Ga. 429, 49 S. E.

300; Heard v. Kenney, 146 Ga. 719, 92 S. E. 211.

The application of the widow, as the personal representative of the estate, for permission to carry on the farm for the benefit of the heirs at law (the widow and one child), made within the first year of administration, is a circumstance from which the jury would be authorized to infer that the widow elected to take a child's part in the estate. While the application for permission to sell was made after the expiration of the first year of the administration, it is nevertheless of some probative value, and tends to show that the widow had elected to take a child's part. The fact that Mrs. Harper purchased the land from Davis and dealt with the land as her own also tends to show that she had elected to take a child's part in the estate. If the estate of Robert G. Harper was solvent, it was to the interest of the widow to take a child's part. There is no presumption that the estate was insolvent.

[6] If Mrs. Harper elected to take a child's part in the estate of her husband, then she had a vested interest in a one-half undivided interest in the land belonging to his estate. The third item of the will of Mrs. Sarah M. Harper is as follows:

"After paying my debts and deducting the property mentioned in the second item of this my last will and testament, I give and bequeath to O. H. Jones in trust for my daughter, Lula N. Harper, two-thirds of my estate for her use during her natural life and at her death to her children should she leave any, and if she should leave no children or descendants of a child or children, then to my brother McCormick Neal, should he be in life, or if he is dead then to his children him surviving share and share alike."

The testatrix died in 1872. At the date of her death Lula N. Harper was unmarried and had no children. Lula N. Harper afterwards intermarried with Henry R. Harris, Jr., and six children were born to her, one of whom died intestate during the lifetime of the life tenant and left no children, but left a widow. The other five children survived the life tenant (who died in 1917) and are the plaintiffs in this case. If the devise had been simply "and at her death to her children," the remainder would have vested in the children as they were born; but the superadded words, "should she leave any," made the remainder contingent. Until the death of Lula N. Harper it could not be ascertained whether she would leave any children. If she had survived her children, none of them would have ever acquired any interest. There was a limitation over to McCormick Neal if Lula N. Harper "should leave no children or descendants of a child or children," but the remainder was "to her children should she leave any." Until the death of Lula N. Harper it was an uncertainty whether she would leave children at her death; the devise, "to her children should she leave any," is the exact equivalent of the expression "such child or children, they being the heirs of her body, that she may leave in life." Construing the language last above quoted, this court has held the remainder to be contingent. Smith v. Smith, 130 Ga. 532, 61 S. E. 114, 124 Am. St. Rep. 177. The vesting of the remainder is made dependent upon the event of the remainderman surviving the life tenant. The superadded words in the will under construction manifest the intention of the maker to vest the remainder only upon the contingency of the remainderman being in life at the time of the death of the life tenant, and serve to distinguish the provision of the will under construction from the provisions of the instruments construed (for example) in the following cases: Crawley v. Kendrick, 122 Ga. 183, 50 S. E. 41, 2 Ann. Cas. 643; Cooper v. Mitchell Investment Co., 133 Ga. 769, 66 S. E. 1090, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 291; Burney v. Arnold, 134 Ga. 141, 67 S. E. 712; Milner v. Gay, 145 Ga. 858, 90 S. E. 65; Gibbons v. International Harvester Co., 146 Ga. 467, 91 S. E. 482; and Cock v. Lipsey, 148 Ga. 322, 96 S. E. 628.

It is to be noted that the will under construction contains no divesting clause or clause of defeasance, as did the will construed in Sumpter v. Carter, 115 Ga. 893, 42 S. E. 824, 60 L. R. A. 274. There are no words of substitution in the will under construction, as in the will construed in Fields v. Lewis, 118 Ga. 573, 45 S. E. 437. In the will under construction in that case there were words of substitution, and the superadded words were held to apply to the substituted devisees. In the case of McDonald v. Taylor, 107 Ga. 44, 32 S. E. 879, there was no uncertainty as to the person. The remainderman was named. No other person could ever take as remainderman. The superadded words in the will in that case were probably considered as words of defeasance, and upon this theory it was properly held that the remainder was vested. In no case decided by this court has the language of this will been construed as giving a vested remainder. The analogous cases hold the remainder to be contingent. See Griswold v. Greer, 18 Ga. 545; White v. Rowland, 67 Ga. 546, 44 Am. Rep. 731; Watson v. Adams, 103 Ga. 733, 30 S. E. 577; Crawford v. Clark, 110 Ga. 738, 36 S. E. 404; Isler v. Griffin, 134 Ga. 195, 67 S. E. 854. See also Fleming v. Hughes, 99 Ga. 444, 27 S. E. 791.

We do not overlook the rule of construction that, if there be doubt as to whether a remainder is vested or contingent, the remainder will be construed as vested rather than contingent, and as vesting at the earliest opportunity. We do not overlook the distinction between vesting in right and taking effect in possession or enjoyment, pointed out in many of our cases. On the other hand, no favor to a vested interest can defeat the plain intention of the will in controversy, and, as we construe the will, those children of Mrs. Lula Harper Harris who were in life at the death of Mrs. Lula Harper Harris took a contingent two-thirds remainder interest in the estate of the testatrix.

[7] While the question seems to be an open one in this state, we are of the opinion that the contingent estate of the minor children of Mrs. Lula Harper Harris could not be sold by their guardian under order of the court of ordinary. It has been held that a guardian may sell a vested remainder under an order granting leave to sell the land, his ward having no estate in the land except the remainder so sold. Wallace v. Jones, 93 Ga. 420 (5), 21 S. E. 89; Webb v. Hicks, 117 Ga. 338, 43 S. E. 738. It has also been held that a contingent remainder is not the subject of a levy and sale. Mattox v. Deadwyler, 130 Ga. 461, 60 S. E. 1066; Harber v. Nash, 126 Ga. 777, 55 S. E. 928. In Watson v. Adams, 103 Ga. 733, 30 S. E. 577, it was held that a contingent remainder is not subject to an attachment. It is agreed that the cases cited above, to the effect that no legal sale of a contingent remainder ad invitum by the sheriff under execution can be made, are not necessarily controlling upon the question presented. Williams v. O'Neal, 119 Ga. 178, 45 S. E. 978, is not applicable. See Jolly v. Lofton, 61 Ga. 154. Civil Code, § 4181, reads as follows:

"A future interest or estate may be conveyed by deed; but it must operate to transfer the title immediately, or the instrument will be testamentary and revocable."

It is obvious that this provision of the Code is not in point. On the contrary, section 4117 of the Code, which reads in part as follows, "A bare contingency or possibility can not be the subject of sale, unless there exists a present right in the person selling, to a future benefit," is more nearly in point. In Watson v. Adams, 103 Ga. 733, 30 S. E. 577, 579, it was said:

"The legacy in the land devised to him by the will was a bare contingency, and that during the lifetime of his mother there existed in him no present right to a future benefit."

Under section 3537 of the Civil Code (Civil Code 1910, § 4117) such a contingency can not be the subject of sale. While in certain circumstances a court of equity has jurisdiction to decree a sale of land, including every possible interest of contingent remaindermen, such jurisdiction is founded largely upon the fact that a sale of such property, including such interest, cannot be had under an order from the court of ordinary. Compare Cooney v. Walton, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 167; Donaldson v. Donaldson, 151 Ga. —,

[8] We are also of the opinion that the plaintiffs were not barred because they did not move to set aside the guardian's sale within a reasonable time (seven years) after they attained their majority. Until the death of the life tenant it could not be determined whether they would have any interest in the land. See Howell v. Wilson, 137 Ga. 710 (1), 74 S. E. 255. While contingent remaindermen may maintain an equitable suit to prevent waste (see Kollock v. Webb, 113 Ga. 762 (2), 39 S. E. 339) this court has never decided that such remaindermen can maintain a suit to cancel a deed as a cloud upon their title. If the plaintiffs themselves had executed a deed to Thornton, it would have been necessary for them to move to cancel the same within seven years after they attained their majority. Nathans v. Arkwright, 66 Ga. 179. The conveyance of a contingent remainder is upheld upon the principle of estoppel. Isler v. Griffin, 134 Ga. 102 (4), 67 S. E. 854. In order to give rise to the estoppel the conveyance must have been the act of the person subsequently asserting title. An estoppel must be by one's own act. There is no evidence tending to show that plaintiffs ratified the sale by accepting or receiving the purchase price.

[9, 10] The remaining question, therefore, is whether the will was revoked by Mrs. Harper's written direction to cancel it after its execution, and, if not so revoked, whether the will was legally probated. It appears that Mrs. Harper, after the execution of the will, left the same with the ordinary of Fulton county, the county of her residence. On March 18, 1872, Mrs. Harper, then in the state of New York, addressed the following letter to the ordinary:

"On receipt of this letter you will please turn over to Mr. John Neal, Sr., the will which I made on January 9, 1872, or about that date, and, if it is recorded, cancel the record, as I have decided not to make that disposition of the property. Mr. Neal will please destroy the will, as it is worthless, not being according to my desire. Please preserve this letter, and it shall be authority for both yourself and Mr. Neal to act as desired. This change of intention on my part is made from deliberation, and not from any influence, whatever, exercised by others."

The letter was signed by Mrs. Harper, and was witnessed by two witnesses only. The written request to destroy the will is nothing more than an effort to revoke the will by written instrument. Under Civil Code, § 3918:

"An express revocation by written instrument must be executed with the same formality and attested by the same number of witnesses as are requisite for the execution of a will."

Civil Code, § 3918, provides that:

"An express revocation may be effected by any destruction or obliteration of the original will, or a duplicate, done by the testator, or by his direction, with an intention to revoke."

Under this section it is necessary that the will be actually destroyed or obliterated. Mere direction to destroy, not followed by actual destruction, will not effect a revocation. The suggestion is made that Mrs. Harper did not lose her right to destroy the will because the public officer failed in his duty. It was not the official duty of the ordinary to destroy the will. This question is in principle controlled by Howard v. Hunter, 115 Ga. 357, 41 S. E. 638, 90 Am. St. Rep. 121.

[11] The judgment of probate is attacked upon the ground that no petition to probate the will appears in the evidence. It appears that an application for letters of administration on the estate of Mrs. Sarah M. Harper was filed in the court of ordinary of Fulton county. It was alleged in the application that Mrs. Harper died intestate. McCormick Neal objected to the grant of letters of administration, upon the ground that Mrs. Harper died testate, and attached to his objections the will of Mrs. Harper. In the circumstances aforesaid, it cannot be held that there was no petition, or the equivalent of a petition in writing, to probate the will. Even if there were no petition, the court of ordinary is a court of general jurisdiction. The judgment admitting the will to record is all that is necessary. The petition and other proceedings prior to judgment will be presumed. The judgment can in no event be collaterally attacked. Patterson v. Lemon, 50 Ga. 231, 236; Medlin v. Downing Lumber Co., 128 Ga. 115 (1), 57 S. E. 282; Hooks v. Brown, 125 Ga. 122, 53 S. E. 583; Churchill v. Jackson, 182 Ga. 666, 64 S. E. 691. The case of Fischesser v. Thompson, 45 Ga. 459, holding that a proceeding in the court of ordinary not based on a written petition is void, was reviewed, and in effect overruled, in Barclay v. Kimsey, 72 Ga. 725.

[12] It is insisted that the probate of the will is void, because based upon an agreement made between Lula Neal Harper (afterwards Lula Harper Harris) and McCormick Neal. It appears that plaintiffs' mother, at the time the agreement was made, was only 18 years old; but she held the life estate under the will from 1872 to 1887, when she conveyed to the defendant's testate. At the date of this conveyance she was 33 years old. Although a minor at the time the agreement was made, it would seem that she was bound by the agreement, under Civil Code, § 4233. It further appears that the will was actually probated by the judgment of the ordinary. It was probated on the affidavit of a subscribing witness to the will. In addition, the agreement between Lula Neal Harper and McCormick Neal was made the judgment of the court. This agreement was expressly made for the purpose of settling a family controversy. Probate in common form becomes conclusive after the lapse of seven years; and if, after the lapse of seven years, an heir is still a minor, he has four years after the arrival of age within which to call the probate in question. Sutton v. Hancock, 118 Ga. 436, 45 S. E. 504. Upon a careful review of the evidence in this case we are of the opinion that the probate of the will of Mrs. Sarah M. Harper was not void for any of the reasons urged by the defendant in error—certainly not upon an inspection of the record. A valid judgment admitting the will to record is, of course, conclusive on the question of revocation discussed above.

[13] The rulings above made sufficiently cover the assignments of error on the admissibility of evidence, in so far as those assignments of error are meritorious. In view of those rulings, it follows that the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant, and in subsequently overruling the motion for new trial.

Judgment reversed.

MUNFORD et al. v. PEEPLES et al.
(No. 2193.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Wills ⚡573(2), 601(1), 612(3)—Bequest in trust held to give absolute fee, not cut down by further provisions.

Where a testator, by item 5 of his will, bequeathed to his son, R. S. Munford, in trust for the testator's daughter, L. M. Peebles, one half of his shares of the capital stock of a certain mining company (the other half being bequeathed to the son by another item absolutely), vesting the trustee with full and complete control of said stocks, with the exclusive right and authority to vote same at all stockholders' meetings, and to sell the stock as in his judgment may be best for the interest of all parties concerned, and where the testator also provided, in a subsequent clause of item 5 of the will, that the trustee shall pay to the daughter, "or to the heirs of her body, should she be dead, all dividends that may accrue upon said shares of stock, and the proceeds of any sale that he may make of same, to be hers or theirs, as the case may be, absolutely. But should my said daughter * * * die leaving no issue of her body, children, or children of children, before the executing of the trust herein created, then the stock herein bequeathed to my son * * * as trustee, or the residue thereof should any have been sold, shall be and become the property of the said [son] absolutely." Held, that the daughter takes an estate in fee, which is not cut down to a less estate by item 5 or any subsequent part of the will.

2. Pleading ⚡214(3)—Trusts ⚡189, 371(1)—Wills ⚡671, 682(2)—In favor of legatee of full age and sound mind held executed; allegations of petition taken as true on demurrer; petition to have trust declared void not demurrable; will giving trustee power of sale held to require sale within reasonable time; will giving property in trust held not to create trust for contingent remainderman.

Where an estate was bequeathed by a testator to a named trustee for his daughter, as set out in headnote 1, and a petition was filed by the daughter against the trustee, alleging that at the time the testator executed his will she was over 21 years of age, of sound mind, and had since that time remained of sound mind and fully capable of receiving, owning, controlling, and enjoying property in her own right without the intervention of a trustee, and also alleging malfeasance and nonfeasance on the part of the trustee, and praying for injunction, receiver, and that such devise be declared to convey the absolute fee to her, such petition was not subject to demurrer on the ground that the trust was executory, and not executed, and the court did not err (at a regular term of court) in overruling the demurrer on that ground; and where, on a hearing for temporary injunction, the evidence for the plaintiff was sufficient to sustain the allegations of her petition, the court did not err in granting a temporary injunction.

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. L. M. Peebles and others against R. S. Munford and others. Judgment overruling demurrer and continuing a restraining order, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

L. S. Munford died, leaving his last will and testament, which was admitted to probate in solemn form, the material portions of which are as follows:

"Item 5. I hereby give, devise, and bequeath to my son, Robert S. Munford, in trust for my daughter, Lewis Munford Peebles, wife of O. T. Peebles, one-half ( $\frac{1}{2}$ ) of my shares of the capital stock of the Etowah Development Company, and one-half ( $\frac{1}{2}$ ) of my shares of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Cartersville, Ga., hereby vesting him, the said Robert S. Munford, with full and complete control of said stocks with the exclusive right and authority to vote same at all stockholders' meeting, and to sell the Etowah stock as in his judgment may be best for the interests of all parties concerned, but the bank stock may be sold at the instance of the said Lewis Munford Peebles, and upon her written request. Said trustee shall pay to said Lewis Munford Peebles, or to the heirs of her body should she be dead, all dividends that may accrue upon said shares of stock, and the proceeds of any sale that he may make of same, to be hers or theirs, as the case may be, absolutely. But should my said daughter, Lewis Munford Peebles, die leaving no issue of her body, children, or children of deceased children, before the executing of the trust herein created, then the stock herein bequeathed to my son, Robert S. Munford, as trustee, or the residue thereof should any have been sold, shall be and become the property of the said Robert S. Munford, absolutely.

"Item 6. I hereby give, devise, and bequeath to my daughter, Lewis Munford Peebles, wife of O. T. Peebles, in trust, for and during her natural life for the joint use and benefit of herself and children, including the children she now has as well as those that may hereafter be born to her, the following real estate, to wit: (A) All of my lands lying on and adjacent to Pettitt's creek in the fifth district of the third section of Bartow county, Georgia, including the following farms, to wit: That certain farm known as my old home place, where I lived for many years; also the farm known as the Old Bishop place, the same being sometimes known as the old Rock House place and adjoining the home place aforesaid; also, the farm known as the old Munford Mill place. (B) Also, that certain farm lying on, or near, Pettitt's creek in said county, formerly known as the J. G. Lowery place; with all of the live stock, farming tools, and machinery on each of said farms, for use in the operation of such farms, to be treated as part and parcel of such farm and to go with such farm to said devisees in the same way and on the same limitations as the farm itself. (C) Also, that certain storehouse and lot on the South side of Main St., in the city of Cartersville, Ga., now occupied by J. W. Vaughan & Co. (D) Also, that certain storehouse and lot on the south side of Main St., in Cartersville, Ga., now occupied by the Bank of Cartersville. (E) Also, that certain house and lot on the north side of Leake St., in Cartersville, Ga., now occupied by J. C. Fink and adjoining on west the residence lot of Capt. Bob Anderson. (F) Also, that certain town lot, with the two frame buildings thereon, located on the southwest corner of Bartow and Carter Sts. in the city of Cartersville, Ga. It is my will and desire that on the death of my said daughter, Lewis Munford Peebles, all of the real estate mentioned in this item and devised and bequeathed to her, in trust for herself and children during her natural life, shall then vest in, and is hereby devised and bequeathed in fee simple, to the children of my said daughter who may survive her, and to the surviving child or children of any deceased child or children who may have died before their said mother; the child of such deceased child or children to receive the share or interest which would have been received by such deceased child or children, had such deceased child or children have survived my said daughter; the said Lewis Munford Peebles only having the right to use, for the benefit of herself and children, the income arising from the property devised in this item."

"Item 9. In the event of the death of my daughter, Lewis Munford Peebles, leaving surviving her one or more children under twenty-one years of age, or one or more grandchildren who are children of a deceased child of my said daughter, then and in either of such events I hereby appoint my son in law, Oscar T. Peebles, as testamentary guardian of any and all of such minor children or grandchildren, with authority to take charge of and manage and control the property and interests of such minor children or grandchildren of my said daughter, given them under this will, during their minority; but the appointment of said testamentary guardian is conditioned upon his first giving a good and sufficient bond in double the value of the property and effects to come into his hands as such guardian, payable to the ordinary of Bartow county, Georgia, signed as surety by some good and solvent fidelity insurance company doing business in Georgia, in compliance with the laws thereof, and conditioned for the faithful discharge by the said Oscar T. Peebles of all the duties of his office as such guardian; said bond, and the surety thereon, to be approved by the ordinary of Bartow county, Ga. On failure of my said son-in-law to accept said guardianship, or to make and file in the office of the ordinary of Bartow county, Ga., with his approval, the bond required above, within four months after the death of my said daughter, then and in that event his appointment as guardian shall not take effect, and I hereby appoint my son, Robert S. Munford, as testamentary guardian of the minor children and (or) grandchildren, as aforesaid, of my daughter, and no bond shall be required of him as such guardian.

"Item 10. It is my express will and desire, and I hereby positively direct, that none of the property bequeathed and devised to my daughter, Lewis Munford Peebles, in trust for herself and her children, during her natural life, shall at any time for any cause or purpose, or by order of any court upon any pretext, be sold by her for reinvestment or any other purpose; but only the annual income may be disposed of by her, and the same prohibition and restriction is hereby placed on the power of the testamentary guardian of the minor children and (or) grandchildren of my said daughter, should any there be; the intention of this will and testament being, that the property I have devised and bequeathed for the benefit of my said daughter and her children, and the children of her deceased children dying before her, shall remain intact during her lifetime and during the term of said guardianship, if any there should be. I positively forbid and prohibit any encroachment whatever on the corpus of said bequest and devise, until the trust herein and hereby created is fully executed."

After the testator's death, and the probate of his will, the trustee named voted the shares of stock in the Etowah Development Company, and exercised exclusive control over the shares bequeathed to Mrs. Lewis Munford Peebles, until the filing of the present suit. Mrs. Peebles and others filed an equitable petition against Robert S. Munford, as trustee, individually and as executor, and against Etowah Development Company, alleging that she was over 21 years of age, was of sound mind, was sui juris, and laboring under no legal disability, and was fully capable of receiving, owning, controlling, and enjoying property in her own right without the intervention of a trustee, alleging also various acts of mismanagement, malfeasance, and nonfeasance against Robert S. Munford as trustee, etc., and praying that the will be construed, especially the fifth item thereof; that the trust created therein be declared an executed trust and invalid; that the ownership of the shares of stock be declared not subject to defeasance in the event of Mrs. Peeples' death at any time after the death of the testator; that the trustee be required to transfer and assign the shares of stock, held by him as trustee, to Mrs. Peeples on her election to take the same in satisfaction of her legacy without a sale, etc.; that R. S. Munford, individually and as executor of L. S. Munford, and as trustee, be enjoined from selling or attempting to sell any portion of the stock without special order of the court, etc., and that, until the removal of Munford as trustee, a receiver be appointed to manage and control the shares of stock; and for general relief; etc. The defendant demurred and answered. The plaintiff amended her petition, which was demurred to, and the demurrers were overruled, to which judgment the defendant excepted.

On the interlocutory hearing the restraining order was continued of force pending the further order of the court, provided the plaintiff, Mrs. Peeples, would execute a bond in the sum of $100,000, conditioned to pay the Etowah Development Company damages in the event it is held on final hearing that the right to vote the stock in controversy was in Robert S. Munford at the time of filing the suit, and that he was not subject to removal, etc. In the event plaintiff failed to make the bond, the temporary restraining order was to be dissolved, provided the defendant, Munford, executed a like bond in the sum of $100,000, etc. To this judgment Munford excepted.

G. H. Aubrey and J. T. Norris, both of Cartersville, for plaintiffs in error.

Neel & Neel, of Cartersville, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. The first question to be considered is: What estate did Mrs. Peeples take in the stock bequeathed by the fifth item of testator's will? Did she take a life estate only, or did she take an absolute or defeasible fee? Considering first the language of item 5 alone, it will be observed that R. S. Munford was created trustee for testator's daughter, Lewis Munford Peeples, alone. The trustee is not expressly declared trustee for any one else, in this item of the will. It confers on the named trustee "full and complete control" of the stock, with the exclusive right and authority to vote it at all stockholders' meetings, and to sell it "as in his judgment may be best for the interests of all concerned," etc. This item also provides that the bank stock may be sold at the instance of the cestui que trust and upon her written request, which was done, and the bequest as to that stock is not under consideration here. The trustee is directed, in item 5, to pay to Mrs. Peeples, "or to the heirs of her body should she be dead, all dividends that may accrue upon said shares of stock, and the proceeds of any sale that he may make of same, to be hers or theirs, as the case may be, absolutely." It is further provided that, should testator's daughter, Mrs. Peeples, "die leaving no issue of her body, children, or children of deceased children, before the executing of the trust herein created, then the stock herein bequeathed to my son, Robert S. Munford, as trustee, or the residue thereof should any have been sold, shall be and become the property of the said Robert S. Munford, absolutely." What estate, then, did Mrs. Peeples take in the property bequeathed under this item of the will? Nowhere in this item does the testator expressly give the stock to his daughter "for life," nor does he use language of similar import.

It will be observed in this connection that by item 6 of his will the testator gives, devises, and bequeaths to his daughter, Mrs. Peeples, in trust, "for and during her natural life, for the joint use and benefit of herself and children, including the children she now has, as well as those that may hereafter be born to her," certain lands, city property, and personal property. At the end of this item (6) the testator again alludes to the real estate mentioned in this item, and provides that on the death of his daughter all of the real estate "devised and bequeathed to her, in trust for herself and children during her natural life, shall vest in, and is hereby devised and bequeathed in fee simple, to the children of my said daughter who may survive her," etc. In item 10 of the will the testator again provides that the "property bequeathed and devised to my daughter, Lewis Munford Peeples, in trust for herself and her children, during her natural life" (italics ours), shall not "be sold by her for reinvestment or any other purpose." Considering these expressions of limitation for life in the items of the will other than item 5, that is, the limitation of the property devised to the daughter in trust for life, and considering that there is no such express limitation for life, in item 5, as to the stock bequeathed, it is convincing to our minds that the testator did not intend that his bequest of the stock in the Etowah Mining Company, to his daughter, in item 5 of the will, should be for her life only. In item 5 the stock is given in trust for Mrs. Peebles without limiting it to her life, but it is expressly provided that the trustee has the right to sell the stock as in his judgment may be best for the interest of all parties concerned, and pay the proceeds thereof to her or them as the case may be, absolutely. It is true that the testator directs the trustee to pay the cestui que trust, Mrs. Peebles, or to the heirs of her body should she be dead, all dividends that may accrue upon the shares of stock, etc.; but we do not think that this language will cut down the original gift, even if this refers to the mining stock (which we construe to be an absolute fee), to a life estate, or to a base or defeasible fee.

The general rule is that courts will not by construction reduce an estate, once devised absolutely in fee, by limitations contained in subsequent parts of the will, unless the intention to limit the devise is clearly and unmistakably manifest. Smith v. Slade, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 106, and cases cited; Wilcher v. Walker, 144 Ga. 526, 529, 87 S. E. 671. We are of the opinion that the intention of the testator to limit the devise to his daughter to a life estate is not clearly and unmistakably manifest in his will. The bequest in item 5 is to R. S. Munford, as trustee for Mrs. Peebles, of the Etowah Development Company stock, and to no other person. The language of the testator as expressed in the first part of this item was sufficient to vest in Mrs. Peebles the fee to the mining stock. The question arises: Does the subsequent language, directing the trustee to pay Mrs. Peebles, "or to the heirs of her body should she be dead," the dividends accruing on the stock, and the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be hers or theirs absolutely, cut down the estate from an absolute fee to a lesser estate? We do not think so. Certainly not in the absence of some clause clearly limiting the interest of Mrs. Peebles to less than a fee. It is true that under section 3660 of the Civil Code of 1910, limitations over to "heirs," "heirs of the body," "lineal heirs," "lawful heirs," "issue," or words of like import, shall be held to mean children, whether the parents be alive or dead; and, under such words, children and the descendants of deceased children, by representation in being at the time of the vesting of the estate, shall take an estate in remainder. But in such case there must be a previous life estate in the parent. But here the testator has not expressly bequeathed the stock in trust for Mrs. Peebles for and during her natural life, and at her death the remainder to her children. Had he done so, undoubtedly Mrs. Peebles would have taken only a life estate, and on her death, leaving children surviving her, they would take the stock as remaindermen.

But such is not the case; and this conclusion is borne out by the use of the language of the testator in other items of the will, with reference to other and different property devised, where the language creating a life estate in Mrs. Peebles, with remainder over, is clear and unmistakable. It would have been easy for the testator, by item 5, to create a life estate in Mrs. Peebles in the mining stock, with remainder over, if he had so intended, as he did so clearly in items 6 and 10 of the will, where he expressly created a life estate in Mrs. Peebles as trustee, with remainder over to her children, etc. See Craig v. Ambrose, 80 Ga. 134, 136, 137, 4 S. E. 1, where the devise was to a certain woman and "her bodily heirs." It was held that at the death of the testator the fee vested in the woman. "A devise of real estate to 'A. or his heirs,' gives to A. an estate in fee, the word 'or' being read 'and.'" Hawkins on Wills, 180. An owner of land executed a deed to certain land to a named woman "and her bodily heirs." "This is to be distinctly understood: That this twenty acres is all that she will get of lot No. 301; also this is not to be sold for any consideration; it is to remain hers and her children's, hers and their natural lives." The tenendum clause was to the woman and "her bodily heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in fee simple." It was held that such deed conveyed a fee-simple estate to the woman, by virtue of section 3661 of the Civil Code of 1910. Stamey v. McGinnis, 145 Ga. 226, 88 S. E. 935; Ewing v. Shropshire, 80 Ga. 374, 7 S. E. 554. As bearing upon the intention of the testator in item 5, in using the words "or heirs of her body," and that these words were not intended to create a remainder over to the children of Mrs. Peebles living at her death, it is to be borne in mind that the testator expressly provided for the children of Mrs. Peebles in item 6 of his will, where he bequeathed to them an equal share with their mother in the income of certain city property and farms, and at the mother's death the children are given the remainder in fee simple.

Let us consider another view as to the meaning of item 5. It is a well-understood rule in this state that the law favors the vesting of estates at the earliest possible time, and—

"Where there are divesting clauses in a will, the law is disposed to give them such effect as to vest the estate indefeasibly at the earliest possible moment. Language doubtful in its meaning should not be construed to lessen the fee previously devised." Crumley v. Scales, 135 Ga. 300, 308, 69 S. E. 531; Civil Code 1910, § 3680.

Where a testator in his will bequeathed property to his wife during her natural life, and at her death to be equally divided among all his surviving children and the legal rep-representatives of such as may be deceased, it was held that the words of survivorship had reference to the death of the testator, and not to the death of the tenant for life, and that all the children of testator who were in life at his death took vested remainders under the will, to be enjoyed at the death of the tenant for life. Vickers v. Stone, 4 Ga. 461. For additional cases stating the rule favoring the vesting of certain legacies at testator's death, see Mendel v. Stein, 144 Ga. 107, 86 S. E. 220; Crossley v. Leslie, 130 Ga. 782 (5), 786, 788, 61 S. E. 851, 14 Ann. Cas. 703; Wilcher v. Walker, 144 Ga. 526, 528, 529, 530, 87 S. E. 671; Crumley v. Scales, 135 Ga. 300, 305, 309, 69 S. E. 531; Clanton v. Estes, 77 Ga. 352, 1 S. E. 163; Legwin v. McRee, 79 Ga. 430, 4 S. E. 863; Fields v. Lewis, 118 Ga. 573, 45 S. E. 437. In the Crumley Case, supra, the testator had four daughters, all of whom, except one, had children at the time the will was executed. The testator devised to the three other daughters specific lots, in language clearly creating in them life estates and remainders to their children, respectively, upon their deaths. To two of these daughters, in separate items of the will, he gave two other lots "absolutely and in fee simple," and no language was used indicating that the property so given was to go to any one upon the death of the devisee. To the daughter who had no children he devised a lot for and during her life, and provided:

"But if she should leave no child or children, to go to her sisters, * * * or their children, in three equal shares."

By the twelfth item of his will the testator disposed of the residuum of his estate, as follows:

"I give, devise, and bequeath, absolutely in fee simple, all the balance of my property which I may own at the time of my death, both real and personal, and wherever located, in equal shares to my four daughters [naming them]. Should any of my said children die leaving child or children, such child or children shall take the share of their deceased parent."

It was held that—

"Under the twelfth item of the will, all four daughters having survived the testator, each of them was entitled to her respective share therein devised in fee simple, and their children did not, under the will, acquire any interest whatever in the property so devised."

It is stated in 2 Alexander on Wills, § 996, as a general rule, that if it appears from the whole will that payment of any legacy was merely for the convenience of the estate, or of the one charged with payment, the beneficiary will take a vested interest at the death of the testator, and the vesting of the estate will not be deferred, where payment is directed to be deferred until certain property be sold. Civil Code 1910, § 3899, provides that—

"An unconditional gift of the entire income of property, or interest accruing from a fund, will be construed into a gift of the property or fund, unless the provisions of the will require a more limited meaning."

In Swann v. Garrett, 71 Ga. 506, 509, Blandford, J., said:

"Where a testator directs that his executors shall sell certain property and divide the proceeds between certain named legatees, it is optional with the legatees to elect to take either the property itself or the money arising from the sale of the same. Such a bequest is as much of the property itself as of the money arising from the sale of the same; to allow the legatee to take property, instead of money arising from the sale, is no violation of the testamentary scheme of the testator; the purpose of testator is that the legatees, who are the objects of his bounty, shall have his property; and if this can better be accomplished by the legatees taking the property itself, rather than have a sale of the same and taking money arising from such sale, what objection can be raised to this course?"—citing 1 P. Williams, 130, 389, 471; 1 Roper on Legacies, 547; 2 Jarman on Wills, 188, note; 2 Story's Equity, 1213, 1215; Purveyor v. Purveyor, 16 Ala. 489. And see Smith v. Dunwoody, 19 Ga. 256, 257, 258; Thomas v. Owens, 131 Ga. 255, 62 S. E. 218.

This doctrine of reconversion, or equitable conversion, is based on the principle that equity will not compel the execution of a trust against the wishes of the person beneficially interested. Corpus Juris lays down the general rule as follows:

"In the application of the doctrine of equitable conversion, it is a well-settled rule that, if money is directed by a will or other instrument to be laid out in land, or land is directed to be turned into money, the party entitled to the beneficial interest may in either case, if he elects so to do, cause a reconversion of such property and take it in its original state, notwithstanding there is a positive direction to convert the property; and such an election is an affirmative element in the establishment of his right to the property. Such an election, however, can not be made if the rights of others will be injuriously affected thereby." 13 C. J. 885, § 81.

From the foregoing we conclude that the bequest in item 5 of testator's will creates an absolute estate in fee in Mrs. Peeples, and that the subsequent provision in said item that the trustee named "shall pay to said Lewis Munford Peeples, or to the heirs of her body should she be dead, all dividends that may accrue upon said shares of stock, and the proceeds of any sale that he may make of same, to be hers or theirs, as the case may be, absolutely," is not a limitation or lessening of the fee-simple estate first bequeathed, but is "alternative or substitutionary, and is to have effect only in the event of the first devisee dying before the death of the testator." Crumley v. Scales, 135 Ga.

300, 305, 309, 69 S. E. 531. It follows that the bequest in item 5 confers on Mrs. Peeples, who survived the testator, the title in fee to the stock of the Etowah Development Company, and that she is entitled to it without a sale by the trustee, if she so elects; she being of legal age and laboring under no legal disability.

[2] 2. The next question to be considered is whether the trust created by item 5 of the testator's will is executed or executory. This question was first raised by the demurrer to the petition, which demurrer was overruled by the court. It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that item 5 created a valid continuing trust for Mrs. Peeples, on the ground of wasteful and spendthrift habits of Mrs. Peeples; in other words, that it created "a spendthrift trust" for her. But the petition alleges to the contrary. On this point it is alleged that at the time testator made his will Mrs. Peeples was over 21 years of age and of sound mind, and has since that time remained of sound mind, and is fully capable of receiving, owning, controlling, and enjoying property in her own right without the intervention of a trustee, and was not then, and is not now, of the class of persons specified in section 3729 of the Civil Code of 1910, for whom trust estates may be created in this state; and therefore the plaintiff insists that the bequest of one-half of the shares of stock in the Etowah Development Company to Robert S. Munford, in trust for plaintiff, is not a valid continuing trust, but became an executed trust for the benefit of the plaintiff alone, and that she is now entitled to have the perfect legal title to the bequest vested in her, free from the attempted trust. These allegations, so far as well pleaded, must be taken as true on demurrer, and we are of the opinion that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer for any reason assigned; and on the trial of the merits of the injunction feature of the case, the court did not err in granting the injunction.

Under item 5 of the will, in case of the sale of the mining stock by the trustee, the proceeds of the sale are to be turned over to Mrs. Peeples absolutely and in her own right; and if the testator thought his daughter capable of managing the income from and proceeds of the sale of the stock, as he evidently did, it is difficult to see why she should not have the capacity to vote her own stock in electing directors, who can secure competent persons to conduct the operations of the Etowah Development Company, and otherwise to protect her own interests in connection with the stock. The question resolves itself into this: Can a trust estate be created in this state for the benefit of a person who is sui juris? In such a case, says Turner, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Thompson v. Sanders, 118 Ga. 928, 930, 45 S. E. 715, 716:

"The statute of uses immediately transfers the legal estate to the usee, and no trust is created, although express words of trust are used. So absolute is the statute that it will operate upon all conveyances attempting to set up such a trust, although it be the plain intention of the settler that the estate should vest and remain in the trustee named; for the intention of the citizen cannot control express enactments of the Legislature or positive rules of property."

It was stated and held in the above case:

"Where a testator by his will devised certain land to W. S., 'in trust for his wife, M. A., and her children, during his life, and at his death to be their property, and this property not to be sold for debts contracted by him, to have and to hold the same in trust for his wife and children,' the trust was immediately executed as to the wife, she being of age, and as to the children as they respectively came of age."

And see Gray v. Obear, 54 Ga. 231, 235; Banks v. Sloat, 69 Ga. 330; Kille v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 1; Harrold v. Westbrook, 78 Ga. 5, 2 S. E. 695; Parrott v. Dyer, 105 Ga. 93, 31 S. E. 417; Brantley v. Porter, 111 Ga. 886, 36 S. E. 170; Fleming v. Hughes, 99 Ga. 444, 27 S. E. 791, and cases cited; Wright v. Hill, 140 Ga. 567, 79 S. E. 546; Armour Fertilizer Works v. Lacy, 146 Ga. 196 (2), 91 S. E. 12; Lester v. Stephens, 113 Ga. 495, 499, 39 S. E. 109. And see cases in which realty, or realty and personalty, was devised and bequeathed. Bowman v. Long, 26 Ga. 142, 147; De Vaughn v. Hays, 140 Ga. 208, 78 S. E. 844.

The Civil Code of 1910, § 3729, provides as follows:

"Trust estates may be created for the benefit of any minor, or person non compos mentis. Any person competent by law to execute a will or deed may, by such instrument duly executed, create a trust for any male person of age, whenever in fact such person is, on account of mental weakness, intemperate habits, wasteful and profligate habits, unfit to be entrusted with the right and management of property: Provided, the requisitions of the law in all other respects are complied with; and provided further, if when so created by deed, the same shall be recorded where the cestui qui trust resides, within three months from its execution, and if not so recorded the same shall be null and void: Provided also, if at any time the grounds of such trust shall cease, then the beneficiary shall be possessed legally and fully of the same estate as was held in trust, and any person interested may file any proper proceeding in the superior court, where the trustee resides, to have the trust annulled on that ground, if he so desires. Any person having claims against the beneficiary may avail himself of the provisions of the Code in relation to condemning trust property at common law."

Even if the trust created can be construed as a "spendthrift trust," the plaintiff is seeking in the manner provided in the foregoing section of the Code to have the trust declared void for the reasons stated in the petition, viz. that she is over 21 years of age and fully capable of managing her own property. We think she has met this requirement. See De Vaughn v. Hays, 140 Ga. 208, 211, 78 S. E. 844.

In the instant case the provisions of the will do not expressly create a "spendthrift trust," but, on the contrary, the testator's direction, in item 5, that the trustee might sell the mining stock and turn over to the cestui qui trust the proceeds of the sale absolutely, indicates to the contrary. Other provisions of the will also give the daughter valuable property absolutely, which negatives the idea of the testator creating a "spendthrift trust" for his daughter. And still other provisions of the will than in item 5 created Mrs. Peeples a trustee, for herself and children, of valuable property devised. In addition to the foregoing, the testator, in item 8 of his will, provided that after payment of all of his just debts and expenses of executing his will and administering his estate, and after satisfying the "foregoing legacies," his estate—

"be divided as nearly as practicable into two equal shares, including therein all property, both real and personal, including jewelry and silverware, accounts, notes, stocks, bonds, choses in action of every character, and property of every description, whether tangible or intangible, except money, in kind, and that the money of my estate, including that arising from my life insurance, be then apportioned to each of my said two shares of property in kind, in such proportion as to equalize the two shares in valuation; and I give, devise, and bequeath one of said equal shares to my son, Robert S. Munford, absolutely, and I give, devise, and bequeath the other of said equal shares to my daughter, Lewis Munford Peeples, absolutely."

And then the testator provides, in case of disagreement as to the valuation of the property left by the residuary clause of his will, as to how the disagreement shall be settled. It seems evident, therefore, from this and other items of the will to which reference has been made, that the testator was of the opinion that his daughter had the capacity to manage property which was bequeathed to her absolutely. In the Illinois case of O'Hare v. Johnston, 273 Ill. 458, 113 N. E. 127, the court, having under consideration a will for construction and whether it created a spendthrift trust, said:

"He [testator] would hardly have appointed his son one of the executors, if he had considered him a person not to be trusted with business matters."

And it seems to us that the testator in the instant case would not have appointed his daughter as trustee, for herself and her children, of valuable property, as he did in item 6 of the will, if he had considered her a spendthrift and incapable of managing her own business affairs, or the interests of her children. We know of no presumption in such circumstances in favor of a spendthrift trust; and if testator had so intended, it would have been an easy matter for him to have said so. But he has failed to say so expressly. It may be that he created the trust for an entirely different reason, but that is left entirely to conjecture. Whatever the reason for creating this trust, if it is done contrary to law, and made for one sui juris, and contrary to public policy, the intention of the settlor must yield to the rule of law which prohibits the creation of trusts for one sui juris. However, this general statement must be understood with the qualification that—

"If there be limitations over, and restrictions in favor of other persons, for whose use a trust is capable of being created, the trust estate would be upheld." Sargent v. Burdett, 98 Ga. 111, 117, 22 S. E. 667, 668.

In the present case we are of the opinion that there is no life estate created with limitation over. The power was given the trustee in item 5 of the will to sell the stock of the Etowah Development Company, "as in his judgment may be best for the interests of all parties concerned." It is insisted that this gave the trustee the power to refuse to sell it, and, further, that it conferred on him a personal right, in that he owned most of the other stock, and therefore he could exercise a discretion in using the power which would be for his personal advantage. It is also insisted, on the other hand, that the only reasonable construction of this item of the will is that the trustee should make the sale within a reasonable time, and turn over the proceeds to the cestui que trust, Mrs. Peeples, as the sole beneficiary, provided she should not die before the sale occurred. We think the latter view the better one. Otherwise the trustee could arbitrarily prolong the trust in his own interest as against the interest of the cestui que trust. The rule has been stated that—

"Where the creator of a trust makes its duration discretionary with the trustee, still such discretion is not arbitrary, but must be exercised reasonably and in the interest of the cestui que trust." 39 Cyc. 95, note 47; Avery v. Avery, 90 Ky. 618, 14 S. W. 593; Cushman v. Cushman, 102 App. Div. 377, 92 N. Y. Supp. 833; In re Walkery, 108 Cal. 627, 41 Pac. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 181; In re Cooper's Estate, 150 Pa. 576, 24 Atl. 1057, 30 Am. St. Rep. 829, 831.

But it is further insisted by the plaintiff in error that the trust created in item 5 was created in order to protect his contingent remainder; that the legal title to the stock was put in him, with the discretion to sell the Etowah Mining stock "as in his judgment may be best for the interests of all parties concerned," and thus to prevent Mrs. Peeples from disposing of it during her lifetime and defeating the contingent remainder in case of the sale or disposition of the stock before the death of the plaintiff. The reply to this contention is that the trust is created expressly for the plaintiff. No one else is named as cestui que trust in the will, and this fact throws much light on the question as to whether one of the purposes of the trust was the protection of the contingent remainder of Robert S. Munford. And even if the trust should be construed as one created for Mrs. Peeples as life tenant, it could not by reason of that fact alone be also construed to mean that it was created to protect the contingent remainder estate, unless the testator's intention in this respect is clearly expressed, or necessarily implied from the language of the will; and we think no such language is contained in the will. And this being so, we think that in the circumstances of the case the trust for Mrs. Peeples, the owner of the estate preceding the contingent remainder estate, will be considered as executed from the death of the testator, and that Mrs. Peeples is entitled to the possession of, and title to, the property free from any trust whatever. Compare Smith v. Frost, 144 Ga. 115, 86 S. E. 235; Tillman v. Banks, 116 Ga. 250, 252, 42 S. E. 517; Glover v. Stamps, 73 Ga. 209, 54 Am. Rep. 870; Overstreet v. Sullivan, 113 Ga. 891, 39 S. E. 431; also Brantley v. Porter, Fleming v. Hughes, Kile v. Fleming, and Harrold v. Westbrook, supra. In the Fleming Case, Simmons, C. J., speaking for the court, said:

"As shown by the decisions of this court first above mentioned, and the authorities cited therein, our Married Woman's Act of 1866 terminates a trust far quicker than the statute of uses. Under the latter statute, a trust for a woman, married or single, became executed only by the death of herself or her husband in her lifetime; while, under our act first mentioned, the trust, if created before, terminates at the date of the act, if the cestui que trust was then 21 years of age, and if afterwards, upon like condition, it became a legal estate instant, from the date of the deed, or the death of the testate, whether the estate be solely for the beneficiary, or there is a limitation over in trust, or not. Therefore the cases of Aakew v. Patterson, 53 Ga. 209, Ford v. Cook, 73 Ga. 215, Knorr v. Raymond, 73 Ga. 764, Cushman v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 772, 774, 775, and other cases like them, where trusts were expressly created for both the life tenants and remaindermen, and the life tenants died before our Married Woman's Act, as well as such cases of trust as have been determined otherwise than as above after said act, without its effect being made a question for this court to decide, are clearly distinguishable from, and have no application whatever to, the case at bar. Moreover, under the old law in England, and possibly in this state before the Code, a trust to preserve a contingent remainder, which was only necessary because such a remainder was then liable to be defeated by the premature termination of the life estate by forfeiture or otherwise, was usually by granting or devising the remainder after the life estate, and during the life of the life tenant, to a trustee for that express purpose, with a legal remainder over to the contingent beneficiaries after the death of the life tenant (Tiedeman on Real Property, 424; 2 Washburn on Real Property, 509; 4 Kent's Com. 256; 2 Blackstone, 171, 172; Fearne on Contingent Remainders, m. p. 323; 2 Leading Cases in American Law of Real Property, p. 367; note 17 Am. St. Rep. 839), or by making the grant or devise direct to a trustee for the life tenant, with the legal remainder over (Moody v. Walters, 16 Vesey, 294)."

In the instant case the trust is expressly declared to be for Mrs. Peeples, and no trust is expressly declared, or arises by necessary implication, in favor of the contingent remainderman, Munford; and, this being so, it follows that no trust can be declared created for the contingent remainderman. See, in this connection, Overstreet v. Sullivan, supra. If it was the purpose of the testator in creating the trust to preserve the contingent remainder for the plaintiff in error, he would doubtless not have directed the trustee, if he deemed it best for the interests of all parties concerned, to sell the mining stock and turn the proceeds over to Mrs. Peeples absolutely. If the purpose was to protect the contingent remainder in the event of sale, the testator would, in all probability, have had the trust attach to the proceeds of the sale of the stock, and would have empowered the trustee to retain the proceeds of the sale during the life of the first taker (Mrs. Peeples) and pay her the interest thereon during her life, with remainder over. But this was not done, but instead a trustee was appointed, with power to sell the stock, the trustee, according to the evidence, being a mining expert, who could sell to better advantage than his sister, who was not, and then turn over the proceeds of the sale to her absolutely.

In the view we take of this case, we think there was no intention of the testator, as gathered from the whole will, to create a trustee for the contingent remainderman. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in any of the rulings, nor in granting the order complained of, including the temporary injunction.

Judgment affirmed.

PENTON v. MYERS PARK PLACE CORPORATION et al. (No. 2135.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Executors and administrators ⇨520—Vendor and purchaser ⇨130(7)—Prescriptive title sufficient basis for suit for specific performance; court held to have jurisdiction of suit by foreign executrix to sell land.

A testator, a citizen of the state of New Jersey, died on April 28, 1884, leaving a will which was duly probated in that state. By the terms of the will all the property of the testator, wherever being, was left to his wife "for and during her natural life." After termination of this life estate, one half of the income from the entire property was directed to be paid to Mary, the daughter of James Wayne Cuyler, a deceased son of the testator; and the other half of such income was directed to be paid to Alice H. Cuyler, the mother of Mary and widow of testator's son, so long as she remained such widow. Should Alice H. marry again, $10,000 from the corpus of testator's estate should be paid to her in lieu of the "income" above mentioned, and from and after such marriage the whole of the income from the rest of testator's estate should be paid to Mary so long as she should live. Should she die leaving a child or children, or the representative of children, and should her mother, Alice H. Cuyler, be living and unmarried, the executors were directed to pay to her out of the estate of the testator the sum of $10,000, and to divide the rest of the estate equally among such child or children or the representatives of children of Mary, the daughter, that may be living at the time of her death. Should she die without leaving child or children, or the representative of children, leaving her mother, Alice H., alive and unmarried, then Alice H. should receive the sum of $10,000, and all the rest, residue, and remainder of the estate should go to the heirs at law of the testator's two deceased brothers, Richard R. Cuyler and Telemon Cuyler, to be equally divided among them, and to their executors, administrators, and assigns forever. Should Alice H. not be alive or should she be married at the time of the death of Mary, and should Mary die without leaving child or children or the representative of children, all of the estate of the testator should be equally distributed to the heirs at law of his above-named deceased brothers. By a codicil Alice H. was nominated as coexecutrix of the will.

Only one of the nominated executors and Alice H., executrix, qualified. The executor subsequently died, leaving Alice H. as sole surviving executrix. The first life estate terminated at the death of the testator's widow on June 29, 1885. Mary, the daughter of Alice H., became Mary Edgerton by marriage; and there were three children, the issue of said marriage—Cecely, a daughter, who had attained majority prior to June 14, 1911, and two sons, Philip and Rowland, who died unmarried before said date, without leaving child or children. By a second marriage said Mary became McCreery, and the issue of that marriage on June 14, 1911, was one child, Isabel, 8 years of age. Another child was born after the date just mentioned. There were living also, on June 14, 1911, one daughter and grandchildren and great-grandchildren of the two deceased brothers of the testator. Of the property left by the testator there were certain lands in Chatham county, Ga. On June 14, 1911, Alice H., never having married again, instituted a suit in the superior court of Chatham county, Ga., in her individual capacity and as sole surviving executrix. Her daughter Mary and such of her children as were then in life, and the descendants above mentioned of the testator's two deceased brothers, were named as parties defendants. All of the defendants except one, being nonresidents of the state, were served by publication, and guardians ad litem were appointed for such of them as were minors, and they accepted the appointment and served as such. The resident defendant was also duly served. The petition alleged all that is stated above, and further: "Petitioner shows that all the above 200 acres of land is farming lands, and unproductive, save for small rentals; that some 40 acres of said tract known as Cuyler lots Nos. 7 and 8 became part of the city of Savannah about the year 1906, known as the south part of lot 8 Kehoe Ward, the north part lot 8 Oliver Ward, and all of lot 7 Oliver Ward, and shortly thereafter the property was assessed for taxes upon the basis of city lots; and that petitioner, in February, 1910, paid $1,013.92 city taxes for the years 1907 and 1908, and, having gotten the assessment reduced, your petitioner thereafter has been compelled to pay in the neighborhood of $325.25 annually as city taxes on this property, not to mention the state and county taxes, $93.72 annually; and your petitioner avers that the income from said land, amounting to less than $100 annually, is wholly insufficient to pay the taxes, and that petitioner has been compelled to pay the taxes out of her own pocket, and the estate is now due her upon the item of taxes alone $3,500, and said items will increase indefinitely unless this honorable court afford some relief to petitioner. Petitioner shows that an offer has been made to buy these 40 acres, also one of the swamp lots, the north 15 acres of lot 26, at $150 per acre or $2,250; and other offers will be made, these 40 acres known as the south part of lot 8 Kehoe Ward, the north part of 8 Oliver Ward, and all of lot 7 Oliver Ward, for the sum of $22,500, of which $5,000 is cash, balance payable in one, two, three, and four years at 5 per cent. per annum. And your petitioner is advised and believes that this would be a good sale for the property; and she desires to sell from time to time all of said property and make title to the same in order to reimburse herself, and in order that the balance of the purchase price may be preserved and distributed in accordance with the will of John M. Cuyler, it being manifestly to the best interest of all concerned that this be done." The prayer was: "That the executrix be authorized to sell the said tract of about 40 acres, formerly known as 7 and 8 Cuyler lots, and that she be authorized to execute and deliver a deed to the purchaser as above stated; that the proceeds of the sale be applied to repay her for her advances; that the surplus be turned over to her as executrix under the laws of Georgia governing the distribution of funds to foreign executors, or upon such terms as to the court may seem proper."

The defendants appeared and demurred to the petition, on the following grounds: (1) That said petition sets forth no cause of action. (2) That, from an examination of the will exhibited with said petition, it appears that the executrix under said will is not clothed with any trust in relation to the title to said lands, and without being so clothed is without power to institute proceedings for the sale of said land. (3) That said petition shows no facts that would authorize the payment of taxes out of the funds arising from said sale, in the event that said sale can be made." The demurrer was overruled. The answer admitted all of the allegations of the petition, and added the following: "Further answering said petition, your defendants show unto the court that, while they admit the facts shown in said petition and that they are all of the parties interested under said will, they deny that the said plaintiffs and particularly that the said executrix has any right or power to bring about the sale of the said property; for it will be seen from an examination of the will in said case that said executrix is not clothed with any trust in relation to the title of said lands, and consequently said executrix cannot have or maintain said proceedings."

At the time of filing the suit the plaintiff also filed in the court a copy of the probated will of the testator and the proceedings thereon in the surrogate's court of New Jersey, duly exemplified under the act of Congress. On the trial the jury returned the verdict: "We, the jury, find in favor of the contentions of plaintiff." On the verdict so rendered the court entered the following decree: "Whereupon it is considered, ordered, and adjudged that the prayers of said petition be and the same are hereby granted. (1) That Alice Cuyler, executrix, of the estate of John M. Cuyler, be and she is hereby directed to make, execute, and deliver a deed conveying in fee simple, unto Collins Brothers Company and their assigns, at and for the sum and price of $550 per acre for 40 acres, more or less, being approximately twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars ($22,500), with interest thereon from October 19, 1911, at the rate of five per cent. (5%) per annum, those forty acres (40), more or less, of land situate, lying, and being in the county of Chatham, and known upon the map or plan of the city of Savannah as the south part of lot 8 Kehoe Ward, and the north part of lot 8 Oliver Ward, and all of lot 7 Oliver Ward; said land being more fully described in the petition in this case, reference to the same being hereby made."

The Myers Park Place Corporation, as remote grantee of Alice H. Cuyler, executrix of the will of John M. Cuyler, deceased, instituted an equitable action in the superior court of Chatham county, against George H. Penton and Alice H. Cuyler as executrix, for specific performance of a contract for the sale of two certain lots of land in a subdivision of Cuyler lot No. 7 in Oliver Ward, which plaintiffs had contracted to sell to said Penton, and to settle plaintiff's rights as against the estate of the testator. Penton raised two objections to the grant of the relief prayed against him: (1) That the testator did not have a deed to said lot No. 7, and that the estate did not have any title to said lot which the executrix could convey; (2) that the court decreeing the sale of the land was without jurisdiction to render the decree, and consequently the sale did not divest the title of all persons who might be interested under the will.

The case was submitted to the judge for decision without a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. The defendant excepted. So far as necessary to be stated, the agreed facts are as follows: There could not be found of record any deed to the testator conveying said lot No. 7, but that lot was included in the property claimed by the widow of the testator as part of the estate of the latter, when she died in 1885. Shortly before her death she turned the property over to certain persons to manage it as agents of the testator's estate. Subsequently the representatives of the testator's estate took actual possession of all of lot No. 7, with other property of the testator, and maintained such possession openly, notoriously, exclusively, and continuously for a period of more than 20 years before June 14, 1911. Upon the foregoing statement of facts we rule as follows:

1. On the basis of the agreed statement of facts, the trial judge was authorized to find that the estate of the testator had a valid prescriptive title to the land specified in the contract that was the basis of the suit for specific performance.

2. The court of equity had jurisdiction to entertain the suit for leave to sell the land and the decree ordering the sale was valid and binding upon all persons who might take under the will. Cooney v. Walton, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 167; Donaldson v. Donaldson, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 172.

3. The evidence submitted by agreed statement of facts was sufficient to authorize the decree for specific performance.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

POWELL et al. v. STATE. (No. 2588.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨15—Two defendants, adjudged guilty of contempt, may bring joint bill of exceptions on one writ of error.

Where a rule nisi for contempt of court was brought against two defendants jointly, and they made a joint answer thereto and were tried together, and the judge, sitting both as a court and jury, after hearing evidence rendered two separate judgments, in one of which he adjudged one of the defendants to be in contempt of court and sentenced him to pay $100 and to serve 20 days in jail, and in the other he adjudged the other defendant to be in contempt of court and sentenced him to pay $100, the two defendants in these circumstances may bring a joint bill of exceptions from such judgment to the court having jurisdiction thereof. Nothing in the foregoing ruling is to be construed as preventing each of the defendants from excepting to the judgment in his own case.

2. Contempt ⇨44—City court of Miller county had authority to punish for contempt.

Conceding, without deciding, that the city court of Miller county "has no inherent power to define contempts of court," still under section 4643 of the Civil Code of 1910 the city court of Miller county has authority to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempt of court in the circumstances enumerated in the second question propounded by the Court of Appeals, and which is answered in the second division of the opinion.

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Contempt proceeding by the State against H. C. Powell and another. From judgments adjudging them guilty of contempt, the defendants took exceptions to the Court of Appeals, which certified questions to Supreme Court. Questions answered.

G. B. Cowart, of Colquitt, Benton Odom, of Newton, and E. E. Cox, of Camilla, for plaintiffs in error.

N. L. Stapleton, Sol., of Colquitt, for the State.

HILL, J. 1. The Court of Appeals requested instructions upon the following questions, a determination of which is necessary for a decision of this case:

"(1) A rule nisi for contempt of court was brought against two defendants jointly; they made a joint answer thereto, and were tried together. After hearing evidence, the judge, who was sitting both as court and jury, rendered two separate written findings and judgments. In one he adjudged one of the defendants to be in contempt of court, and sentenced him to pay $100 and to serve 20 days in jail; and in the other he adjudged the other defendant to be in contempt of court and sentenced him to pay $100. Under these circumstances, can the two defendants bring a joint bill of exceptions to this court?

"(2) If the above question is answered in the affirmative, then an answer is requested to the following question: Several criminal cases against Dewey Powell and Frank Heard were pending in the city court of Miller county, and Elisha Roland had been subpoenaed to attend at a certain specified term of the court as a witness for the state in those cases. The witness Roland lived in Early county. Upon the hearing of the contempt proceedings the evidence for the state showed that after the witness Roland had been subpoenaed, but before he had appeared at court, the fathers of Dewey Powell and Frank Heard saw him in Early county and endeavored to bribe him to leave the state, and not to appear and testify against their sons in the city court of Miller county. There was also evidence which authorized a finding that the father of Dewey Powell, while the above-mentioned cases were pending in the city court of Miller county, and after the witness Roland had been subpoenaed as a witness therein, and before he had appeared at court, endeavored in the county of Miller to bribe another person to prevent the witness Roland from attending court as a witness against his son. Conceding that the city court of Miller county has no inherent power to define contempts of court, and is limited to those set out in section 4643 of the Civil Code of 1910 (Hewitt v. State, 12 Ga. App. 163, 76 S. E. 1054), has that court authority, under the foregoing circumstances, to punish the fathers of Dewey Powell and Frank Heard, or either of them, for a contempt of court?"

[1] 1. The first question propounded by the Court of Appeals must be answered in the affirmative. Undoubtedly each one of the defendants had the right to except to the judgment rendered against him separately, but the two defendants can bring a joint bill of exceptions to review the judgments by one writ of error. The case of Futch v. Mathis, 148 Ga. 558, 97 S. E. 516, was where two separate actions were brought against two defendants, and by agreement of counsel they were consolidated and tried as one case, and separate verdicts and judgments were rendered in each case in favor of the plaintiffs. By agreement of counsel representing both suits, motions for new trial were consolidated and heard as one motion upon one record, and there was but one judgment overruling the two motions, and but one bill of exceptions was brought to this court. It was held in that case that each of the defendants had the right to except to the overruling of the motion for new trial in his own case. But it was further held that the consolidation of the two motions for new trial, and the overruling of the motions in one judgment, did not authorize the two defendants to unite in one bill of exceptions to review judgments in two distinct cases by one writ of error. The writ of error in that case was dismissed, because this court was of the opinion that there was no provision of law for such procedure, and that the Supreme Court was without jurisdiction to entertain such bill of exceptions. The following cases were cited in support of that view: Western Assurance Co. v. Way, 98 Ga. 746, 27 S. E. 167; Center v. Fickett Paper Co., 117 Ga. 222, 43 S. E. 498; Dickey v. State, 101 Ga. 572, 28 S. E. 980; Averitt v. Simpson, 147 Ga. 352, 94 S. E. 242; Cutter v. Central Bank, etc., 147 Ga. 754, 95 S. E. 285. And see, also, to the same effect, Walker v. Conn., 112 Ga. 314, 87 S. E. 408; Erwin v. Ennis, 104 Ga. 861, 31 S. E. 444; Bates v. Harris, 112 Ga. 32, 34, 37 S. E. 105; Wells v. Coker Banking Co., 113 Ga. 857, 39 S. E. 298; Purvin v. Ferst's Sons & Co., 114 Ga. 689, 40 S. E. 723; Cole v. Stanley, 118 Ga. 259, 45 S. E. 282; Valdosta Guano Co. v. Hart, 119 Ga. 909, 47 S. E. 212.

In the cases cited in support of the Futch Case, supra, and like cases, there were two cases to be tried, but by agreement or order consolidating the two cases they were tried as one; and in the case of Brown v. L. & N. R. Co., 117 Ga. 222, 43 S. E. 498, this court held that an order passed upon agreement of counsel that two suits, each based solely upon a common-law cause of action in favor of different plaintiffs and against the same defendants, did not have the effect to merge the two cases into one, but the effect of such order was to provide simply that the suits should be consolidated only to the extent of being tried together. But in the present case it appears that there was but one rule nisi against the defendants jointly for contempt; and while there were two separate judgments by the judge, sitting both as court and jury, the judgment was the same in each case, except as to the decree of punishment inflicted upon each defendant, which was different. So that the present case is distinguishable from the Futch Case, and those upon which it was based, and similar cases, in that there were two cases really, and judgments entered in those cases; whereas there was but one case tried in the present instance. This being so, we think that a single bill of exceptions will lie in the case under consideration, and that the court in which the bill of exceptions is pending has jurisdiction to determine the same.

[2] 2. Conceding, without deciding, that the city court of Miller county "has no inherent power to define contempts of court," we will consider whether that court has power to punish for contempts, under Civil Code (1910) § 4643. That section is as follows:

"The powers of the several courts of this state to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempt of court shall not extend to any cases, except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of said courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of said courts, party, juror, witness, or other person or persons to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts," etc.

The latter part of the same action provides that—

"The disobedience or resistance of any officer of said courts, party, juror, witness, or other person or persons to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts" (italics ours), shall be a contempt of court.

From the statement of facts contained in the second question propounded by the Court of Appeals, we think it is clear that the fathers of the boys indicted were not "disobedient" to, but did, under the above section of the Code, "resist," the lawful writ of the court. The word "resist" here no doubt was used by the Legislature in its ordinary and usual signification. The word "resist" is defined in the Standard Dictionary as follows:

"To oppose, strive against, or obstruct; * * * to bring to naught, to baffle," etc.

And the conduct of the contemnors in this case falls within practically all of the descriptive terms contained in this definition. The bribing or attempting to bribe the witness who had been subpoenaed to appear against the sons of the respondent was opposing, striving against, or attempting to obstruct the processes of the court, and was intended to bring to naught and baffle such processes of the court, and therefore, in every respect, falls within the meaning given by the lexicographers to the word "resist" as contained in section 4643 of the Civil Code of 1910, and should be given the meaning here ascribed to it in view of the context of the statute, though it would not necessarily be applicable to the term "resist" as used in Penal Code (1910) § 311, because there the act of resisting contemplated and denounced as criminal is one committed while the officer is in the act of executing or attempting to execute some process of the court. We think, therefore, that the city court of Miller county has authority, under the circumstances detailed in question 2, to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment upon the fathers of Dewey Powell and Frank Heard, or either of them, for a contempt of court under Civil Code, § 4643, on the ground that they bribed or attempted to bribe the witness from attending court in obedience to the subpoena.

We do not think, however, that the mere effort to secure the services of a third person to induce the witness not to attend, where there is nothing to show that this effort to secure such services resulted in an effort upon the part of the third person to bribe the witness, would of itself constitute a contempt within the meaning of this statute.

We think, therefore, the second question propounded by the Court of Appeals must likewise be answered in the affirmative, except as to the conduct of one of the contemnors in endeavoring to bribe a third person to prevent the witness Roland from attending court as a witness against the respondents' sons, which would not be a contempt of court, as indicated above.

All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1921.)

Appeal and error 588—No review of evidence, unless properly briefed.

There being no bona fide effort to brief the evidence in the case, the so-called brief of evidence being largely composed of objections to evidence and the argument of counsel thereon, colloquies between counsel and between counsel and the court, and various statements of the court in ruling on the admissibility of evidence, such document will not be considered as a brief of evidence. Accordingly, this court will not review the evidence, and, as no question is presented by the bill of exceptions which can be intelligently considered and passed upon without reference to the evidence, the judgment below must be affirmed. Bishop v. Brown, 138 Ga. 738, 75 S. E. 1119, and citations.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Schools and school districts 97(4½)—Demurrer to petition to validate school bonds held properly overruled.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer filed by the interveners to the amended petition and answer.

2. Appeal and error 1078(1)—Assignments, not referred to in brief, treated as abandoned.

Assignments of error, to which no reference is made in the brief of the plaintiff in error, will be treated as abandoned.

3. Schools and school districts 91—Statute providing for election for issuance of bonds for consolidated district held valid.

It is contended that the act under which the election was held is illegal and void, and that the bonds cannot be validated, for the reasons: (a) Said act does not provide how or in what manner money to pay off the bonds shall be raised; (b) said act does not specify the property upon which nor the territory within which a tax for that purpose shall be levied; (c) said act does not vest in any person or persons authority to issue, sell, and dispose of the bonds, nor to levy and collect a tax for their liquidation. This contention appears to be without merit, upon consideration of the act of 1919 (Acts 1919, pp. 288, 349), known as the "Code of School Laws." Section 143 of the act of 1919 provides: "When one-fourth of the registered qualified voters of a school district, consolidated district, or county, in which a local tax is now or may hereafter be levied for school purposes, or of a district in a county now levying a local tax, shall be filed with the board of trustees, or board of education of such a school district, consolidated district or county, a petition asking for an election for the purpose of determining whether or not bonds shall be issued for the purpose of building and equipping a school house or houses for said school district, consolidated district or county, the required number of petitioners to be determined by the said board of trustees, or board of education, it shall be the duty of said board of trustees, or board of education, to fix the amount, denomination, rate of interest, and dates when due, and call such election in terms of law now provided for a county issue of bonds. * * * The said board of trustees, or board of education, in case the election is for a bond issue, shall follow the law as required of county authorities as embodied in section 440 et seq. of the Code of 1914, volume 1, in the issue thereof." Section 442 of Civil Code of 1910 provides: "When said notice is given and said election held in accordance with the preceding section, if the requisite two thirds of the voters of the county, municipality, or division at said election vote for bonds, then the authority to issue the bonds in accordance with paragraphs 1 and 2, section 7, article 7 of the Constitution is hereby given to the proper officers of said county, municipality, or division." Section 145 of the act of 1919 provides: "The county authorities, in levying and assessing taxes for the purpose of paying the interest and returning and paying off said bonds shall, in the event that the entire county is not embraced within the area or territory in which said election is held, levy and assess such taxes only against the property located within the area or territory within which said election is held. For the purpose of taking care of the expense of these bonds for districts, consolidated districts, or county, the board of trustees or board of education shall recommend and the board of commissioners shall levy a tax not to exceed five mills on the school district, consolidated district, or county, as the case may be."

4. Schools and school districts  $\Leftrightarrow$ 97(4)—Burden on persons attacking validity of school bonds to show proper petition was not presented.

It is contended that there is no evidence of the fact that one fourth of the qualified voters petitioned the Board of Trustees to call the election for bonds. After such election has been held the burden is upon those attacking its validity to show that a proper petition was not presented, and interveners in this case failed to establish their contention. Wilson v. Dunn, 143 Ga. 361, 85 S. E. 198; Ray v. Swain, 148 Ga. 208 (2), 96 S. E. 209.

5. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$ 1078(4)—Schools and school districts  $\Leftrightarrow$ 97(4½)—Evidence as to vote on issuance of bonds held sufficient to support judgment of validation; assignment as to evidence considered abandoned.

The evidence submitted to the court as to whether or not there was the requisite number of qualified votes in favor of the issuance of bonds is, without contradiction, to the effect that there were 112 registered qualified voters in the district, that 68 voted in favor of bonds, and 3 voted against bonds. This evidence was sufficient to support the judgment of validation.

(a) Some of this evidence was objected to, and error was assigned on its admission; but there is no reference in the brief of plaintiff in error to these assignments of error, and accordingly they will be considered as abandoned.

6. Schools and school districts  $\Leftrightarrow$ 97(7)—It is no reason for invalidating bonds that they are dated prior to date of election.

Where an election is held on the question of issuing bonds, as in the present case, on the 9th day of a given month, and it is proposed that such bonds, if issued, are to be dated on the 1st day of the same month, and shall bear interest from date at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and are to be paid off within 30 years, the fact that the bonds bear date eight days previous to the date of the election affords no reason why said bonds should not be validated.

7. Schools and school districts  $\Leftrightarrow$ 97(4½)—Provision for payment of bonds unnecessary before application for validation.

Where an election for bonds was held on the 9th day of July, 1920, and it is proposed that all of said bonds shall be paid off and retired on the 1st day of July, 1950, the fact that said bonds are dated July 1, 1920, will not make said bonds void on the ground that their issuance is not in conformity with paragraph 2, § 7, art. 7, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1910, § 8564), which provides as follows: "Any county, municipal corporation, or political division of this state, which shall incur any bonded indebtedness under the provisions of this Constitution, shall, at or before the time of so doing, provide for the assessment and collection of an annual tax, sufficient in amount to pay the principal and interest of said debt within thirty years from the date of the incurring of said indebtedness." It is not necessary under the Constitution that provision for the payment of such indebtedness shall be made until "at or before" the liability is created, and such provision need not be made before the application for validation. Epping v. City of Columbus, 117 Ga. 263 (12).

8. Assignment of error—Abandonment.

All other assignments of error not specifically dealt with are either abandoned or are without merit.

Error from Superior Court, Treutlen County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

Petition by the Solicitor General of the Oconee Circuit, seeking validation of bonds proposed to be issued by the Orland Consolidated School District, in which A. R. Davis and others intervened. There was a judgment validating the bonds, and interveners bring error. Affirmed.

The solicitor general of the Oconee circuit filed a petition seeking the validation of bonds to the value of $20,000, proposed to be issued by Orland consolidated school district, Treutlen county, the proceeds to be used for the purpose of building and equipping a schoolhouse in said district. The petition recited that a petition bearing the signatures of more than one-fourth of the registered qualified voters of the district, requesting that an election be held to determine whether the bonds should be issued, was presented to the board of trustees of said school district; that the board provided by proper resolution for the holding of the election, and caused notice to be published in the newspaper in which the advertisements of the sheriff of the county are carried, in full compliance with the law relating thereto; that the election was duly held; that the returns and tally sheets of said election, properly certified and presented to the board of trustees, showed that, of the 112 registered qualified voters in said district, 68 of 71 ballots cast in said election were favorable to the issuance of the bonds; that this number constituted a majority of the registered voters in said district, and more than two-thirds of the total number of votes polled; that said board of trustees had in writing personally notified the solicitor general of the facts above stated, and that the petition for validation was filed within 20 days from the date of the service of such notice. An answer was filed by Orland consolidated school district, which admitted all the allegations of the petition for validation, and averred that the district had no outstanding bonded indebtedness, that the total assessed value of property in the district amounted to $326,117, and that the proposed issue of bonds would be within the constitutional limitation upon the debt which could be created by the district.

It is shown by the petition for validation that the election was held July 9th. There appears in the record a copy of a resolution adopted by the board of trustees, dated July 10, 1920, providing that notice in writing of the result of the election be forthwith given to the solicitor general, and that he be requested to institute proper proceedings for the purpose of procuring the validation of the bonds. The petition for validation was filed on August 3, 1920, and it alleged that notice in writing of the result of the election was by the board of trustees served upon the solicitor general personally on July 23d. Certain taxpayers intervened, and demurred to the petition for validation and the answer thereto, upon the grounds: (1) Because the petition failed to show the date of service upon the solicitor general of written notice of the result of the election; (2) because the petition and answer are defective, in that they fail to show or have attached the list of voters used in said election or the list of qualified voters of said district, and in that they fail to show the order of the trustees of said district calling said election, and in that they fail to show the tally sheets of said election, and also fail to show an order organizing said Orland school district; (3) that said petition and answer are insufficient, in that they fail to show the facts necessary to authorize the validation of said bonds.

The demurrer was overruled, and the interveners then filed a plea denying all the material allegations of the petition, and objecting to the validation of the bonds, on the grounds: (1) That the order and notice calling said bond election is insufficient, for the reasons: (a) It fails to name the dates and years interest payments are to be made, and fails to show the amount of interest to be paid annually or semiannually. (b) It provides that the proposed issue of bonds shall bear date July 1, 1920, and shall bear interest from that date, which date was prior to the holding of the election. (2) That said bonds cannot be legally validated and issued, for the reason that the call for election and notice thereof does not provide for the payment of the bonds within 30 years. (3) That the petition for validation of said bond issue shows that it was not filed in the clerk's office of Treutlen superior court within 20 days from the date that notice in writing of said election was served on the solicitor general. (4) That the election and the act under which it was held are illegal and void, and that the bonds cannot be validated, for the reasons: (a) Said act does not provide how or in what manner money to pay off the bonds should be raised. (b) Said act does not specify the property upon which nor the territory within which a tax for that purpose shall be levied. (c) Said act does not vest in any person or persons authority to issue, sell, and dispose of the bonds, nor to levy and collect a tax for their liquidation.

Upon these pleadings the matter proceeded to trial, and after hearing the evidence the court entered a judgment validating the bonds. There are assignments of error on the overruling of objections to evidence, but there is no mention of these in the brief for the plaintiffs in error.

(No. 2230.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Deeds §47—Secretary of grantee banking corporation could attest conveyance.

In this state a secretary of a banking corporation, who is not a stockholder therein or otherwise beneficially or pecuniarily interested in the transaction, is not disqualified from attesting, as an official witness, a deed of conveyance in which the corporation is the grantee; there being no express statute forbidding such officer to act. 1 O. J. 808, § 117; 1 R. C. L. 272, § 44; cases cited in note to Ardmore Nat. Bank v. Briggs Mach. Co., 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1075-1078; Woodland Bank v. Oberhaus, 125 Cal. 320, 57 Pac. 1070; Florida Savings Bank, etc., v. Rivers, 36 Fla. 575, 18 So. 850; Horbach v. Tyrrell, 48 Neb. 514, 67 N. W. 485, 489; 37 L. R. A. 434; Ogden B. & L. Ass'n v. Manach, 186 Ill. 554, 63 N. E. 1049, 89 Am. St. Rep. 330; Bardaley v. German-American Bank, 113 Iowa, 216, 84 N. W. 1041; Banking House, etc., v. Stewart, 70 Neb. 815, 98 N. W. 34; Keene Guaranty Sav. Bk. v. Lawrence, 32 Wash. 572, 73 Pac. 690; Girard v. Null, 90 Neb. 713, 134 N. W. 272. Analogous cases in this state are those in which an attorney at law for a mortgagee or grantee in a security deed has been held to be a competent official witness to the execution of the paper. Jones v. Howard, 90 Ga. 451, 27 S. E. 765, 59 Am. St. Rep. 231; Austin v. Southern Home Ass'n, 122 Ga. 439, 50 S. E. 382; Harvard v. Davis, 145 Ga. 580, 89 S. E. 740.

(a) In Hastey v. Roberts, 149 Ga. 479, 100 S. E. 569, it was said: "A stockholder or officer, though incompetent to take an acknowledgment of a mortgage on realty as a notary, because he is a stockholder or officer of the mortgagee corporation, is not incompetent as a nonofficial witness to the signature of the mortgage." That case did not involve the power of an official witness to attest the paper, and the record filed in this court shows further that the attesting witness was a stockholder

In the light of the facts, the language of this court above quoted did not amount to a binding ruling that an officer, who was not also a stockholder or otherwise pecuniarily interested in the transaction, was incompetent as an official witness to the paper.

2. Corporations  $\S$ 426(10)—Corporation held to have ratified conveyance of personality as security for loan, where placed to its credit and checked out.

A paper whereby a corporation purported to convey legal title in personal property to a bank as security for a loan of money concluded as follows: "In witness whereof, the said borrower has hereunto set his hand and seal this 24th day of March, 1919." The instrument was signed: "Universal Light & Power Co., L. D. Wyly, Prest." No corporate or other seal was affixed. The paper was offered in evidence on the trial of a bail trover proceeding instituted by the bank against a third person claiming a special property in the goods under a transferee of the alleged maker of the paper. In this connection there was evidence tending to show that the money advanced by the bank on the strength of the security was placed by the bank on deposit to the credit of the corporation (named as maker of the paper); that the corporation had a place of business in the city of Savannah, which was in charge of L. D. Wyly, who was president of the corporation; that the corporation was conducting such business and carried a general account with the bank; that in the course of the business of the corporation the money advanced by the bank was regularly checked out. Held that, even if there was not sufficient proof of specific original authority from the corporation to its president to execute the paper, the corporation, having received the fruits of the loan by checking out the money in the regular course of its business, could not repudiate the act of its president in signing the paper, but would be held to have ratified his act. Jones v. Ezell, 134 Ga. 553, 68 S. E. 303; Bank of Garfield v. Clark, 138 Ga. 798 (2), 76 S. E. 95.

3. Nonsuit improper.

Applying the principles stated in the preceding notes, the Court of Appeals erred in affirming the judgment of the trial court excluding the paper from evidence, thus rendering it impossible for the plaintiff to prove title to the property in controversy, and granting a nonsuit.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Action in trover by the Citizens' Trust Company against O. J. Butler and others. From a judgment of the Court of Appeals (103 S. E. 852), affirming a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings certiorari. Reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Wills  $\S$ 497(3)—Great-grandchildren held not included in devise to grandchildren.

The court did not err in the construction of the will, nor in the decree rendered in accordance therewith, in so far as complaint is made in the case before us.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Wills  $\S$ 602, 603(3)—Grandchild held to take fee-simple title, defeasible on dying without children.

Under a will devising land to a granddaughter, to be sold and distributed among testator's children and grandchildren on her death without child or children, held, that such granddaughter took fee-simple title, defeasible on her dying without child or children.

3. Wills  $\S$ 497(3)—Great-grandchildren held not to take under will, where parent conveyed contingent interest.

Where granddaughter of testator took fee-simple title to land, defeasible on her dying without child or children, going "to my children and my grandchildren, to be divided between them," etc., and grandchild of testator by a son conveyed, or attempted to convey, his contingent interest to such granddaughter and then predeceased her, leaving children who were great-grandchildren of the testator, held, that such great-grandchildren did not take under the will, and such contingent interest in the land passed to a grantee in a deed executed by the granddaughter prior to her death, irrespective of when the contingent interest vested.

4. Wills  $\S$ 497(2, 3)—"Children" does not include grandchildren, and "grandchildren" does not include great-grandchildren.

The word "children," in a will, does not include grandchildren, and the word "grandchildren" does not include great-grandchildren, unless the will discloses a contrary intention (citing Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, "Children"; "Grandchildren").

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Petition by J. K. Blackwell, as administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the will of James Aken, deceased, and others, for construction of the will. From an adverse judgment, Lillie Davidson and another bring error. Affirmed.

W. S. Florence, of Monticello, for plaintiffs in error.

A. Y. Clement, A. S. Thurman, Greene F. Johnson, and E. M. Baynes, all of Monticello, for defendants in error.

Blackwell, as administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the will of James Aken, filed a petition for construction of the will and direction. As far as it appears, all persons interested therein were made parties, and the case was by agreement submitted to the judge on the pleadings, the case being controlled by a question of law. The court rendered a judgment, to which only two of the parties, Lillie Davidson and Florence Pouder, excepted. The remaining parties being content with the judgment, only so much of the record need be stated as concerns the plaintiffs in error.

The will of James Aken was executed on February 21, 1871, and a codicil to the same was executed on September 5, 1871. The testator died in 1872, and the will was probated in solemn form during the same year. The testator had only four children, Sam, Mary, Charles P., and John C., all of whom, except Charles P., predeceased the testator. Mary, who by marriage became Mary Geiger, left one child, Ellen, who afterwards became Ellen Pendergrass. Sam Aken left a son, Ransom H. Aken, the father of the plaintiffs in error, who claim the interest which they allege their father would have taken in certain land which Ellen Pendergrass took under the will, had he been in life at and subsequent to the death of Ellen Pendergrass. The other two children both left children, but their interests are not involved in that part of the judgment of the trial court to which the plaintiffs in error have excepted. The portions of the will material to a decision of the question presented are as follows:

"Article 2. I give, grant, and devise to my two grandchildren, Ransom H. Aken and Ellen Geiger, as tenants in common, all the land of which I may die seized and possessed, situated lying and being between Camp creek, Gap creek, and Turkey creek, in the county of Jasper, in said state, as those streams now run, including my present homestead. The interest of said Ellen Geiger in the same to be subject to the limitations and conditions hereinafter expressed and annexed.

"Article 3. My will and desire is (and I so direct) that all the balance of my estate of every kind whatsoever, including all the land I own on the northwest side of Turkey creek, the same being situated part in the county of Morgan and part in said county of Jasper, be sold by my executors and the proceeds thereof be equally divided between all of my children and grandchildren, excepting my said grandson John F. Aken. Each set of my grandchildren to take such share as would be going to his or her or their parents were he or she in life, and no more.

"Article 4. My will and desire is that all the property of every kind which granddaughter Ellen Geiger may receive under this my will, in case should she die leaving no children's children at the time of her death, shall go to the other legatees named in this will, excepting always my said grandson John F. Aken. That is to say, to my children and grandchildren to be divided between them as provided in article 3 above," and "that portion of my said land which may be going to my granddaughter Ellen Geiger [afterwards Ellen Pendergrass] be subject to the same limitations, conditions, and restrictions as attach to all other property given her by said original will."

The petition further alleges that, subsequently to the death of the testator, Ransom H. Aken and Ellen Pendergrass entered into possession of the land bequeathed to them, with the assent of the executors, and later entered into a voluntary partition of said lands, whereby each entered into possession in severalty of the portion of the lands devised to them as tenants in common under article 2 of the original will of James Aken, and that the petitioner as administrator, recognized the voluntary partition of said land; that subsequently to the death of the testator, and subsequently to the partition of the lands devised to Ransom H. Aken and Ellen Pendergrass, Ransom H. Aken by deed conveyed to Ellen Pendergrass all of his rights in remainder in and to the lands awarded to Ellen Pendergrass under and by virtue of said voluntary partition, and that subsequently to said conveyance Ellen Pendergrass conveyed to J. H. Bullard all of her rights under said deed from Ransom H. Aken, and that Bullard is now claiming to be the owner of such interest in said land as Ransom H. Aken would have taken under the will of the testator had he not conveyed the same to Ellen Pendergrass. Ransom H. Aken died subsequently to the execution of the deed to Ellen Pendergrass, and previously to the death of the latter.

The plaintiffs in error, the only living children of Ransom H. Aken, contend that the only interest acquired by Bullard under his deed from Ellen Pendergrass was her life estate; that as beneficiaries under the will of James Aken they succeeded, upon the death of Ellen Pendergrass, to whatever interest their father, Ransom H. Aken, would have taken had he been in life at the time of the death of the life tenant; that the intention of the testator that great-grandchildren as a class should share in the distribution of the estate is manifested by the provision that in the event of the death of Ellen Pendergrass without "children or children's children" the property devised to her should be distributed in accordance with article 3 of the will. The petition of the administrator alleges, further, that it is contended by certain of the grandchildren of the testator that children of grandchildren, or great-grandchildren of the testator do not take any interest in or share in the estate. Ellen Geiger, née Pendergrass, was a woman of mature age at the death of the testator, but subsequently died, never having had a child.

The court rendered a decree, in so far as the name is brought in question by this bill of exceptions, as follows:

"Sam Aken, a son of testator, died previous to the death of testator. Therefore his son, Ransom H. Aken, was entitled to one-third of the property bequeathed to Ellen Geiger; his interest being a contingent interest, which became vested upon the death of the said Ellen Geiger, without children or the representatives of children. As he conveyed a contingent interest in certain property left to the said Ellen Geiger, and as she conveyed this property to J. H. Bullard, as will be seen from the copies of said deed attached to the intervention of the said J. H. Bullard, said conveyance places the title of the land described therein in the said J. H. Bullard—that is, one-third undivided interest as set forth in said intervention—and the said J. H. Bullard would be entitled to one-third interest in the proceeds of the sale of the lands described in said conveyances. Under the law, a contingent interest can be conveyed. Isler v. Griffin, 134 Ga. 192, 67 S. E. 854; Irby v. Smith, 147 Ga. 329, 93 S. E. 877. Ransom H. Aken took under the will, but his children or representatives of children took as his heirs at law. Said heirs at law would be entitled to one-third of the net proceeds of the lands not included in said deeds."

GILBERT, J. [1-3] Under the terms of the will Ellen Geiger, afterwards Ellen Pendergrass, a grandchild of the testator, took fee-simple title to the land in question, defeasible upon her dying without child or children. Curles v. Wade, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 1. In the same item of the will it is further provided that on the occurrence of the event just mentioned the property devised to her "shall go to the other legatees named in this will, * * * that is to say, to my children and my grandchildren, to be divided between them as provided in article 3 above." Article 3 provides that the land be sold and the proceeds thereof equally divided between all of my children and my grandchildren, except one specified grandson, and "each set of my grandchildren to take such share as would be going to his or her or their parent were he or she in life, and no more." Ransom H. Aken, father of the plaintiffs in error, as appears from the statement of facts preceding, executed a deed during his lifetime to Ellen Pendergrass, conveying any remainder interest that he might have, and died previously to the death of Ellen Pendergrass. The question as to whether Ransom Aken, at the time of the execution of his deed, possessed an interest in the land which he was capable of conveying to Ellen Pendergrass, as against the grandchildren of the testator other than the plaintiffs in error, need not be decided; for, as we have pointed out further on in this decision, the plaintiffs in error, who are great-grandchildren of the testator, took no interest under the provisions of the will in favor of grandchildren. Any supposed claim of these plaintiffs in error is necessarily referable to their right of inheritance from Ransom Aken, their father; and if the estate in controversy here fell in to Ransom Aken, either upon the death of the testator or upon the death of Ellen Pendergrass, so that, had he never executed a conveyance to Ellen Pendergrass, the plaintiffs in error would have inherited, when that estate did fall in, the deed which he executed to Ellen Pendergrass immediately became operative to convey the estate to her according to the terms of the conveyance, and by reason of her deed, to the benefit of her grantee, J. H. Bullard; so that in either event, irrespective of when the contingent interest vested, it was conveyed to Bullard by means of the deeds of Ransom Aken and Ellen Pendergrass. Isler v. Griffin, 134 Ga. 192 (4), 67 S. E. 854; Irby v. Smith, 147 Ga. 329, 93 S. E. 877.

[4] Inasmuch as the plaintiffs in error, great-grandchildren of the testator, could not take this property by inheritance from Ransom Aken, his deed having conveyed whatever interest he might have had, the remaining question is whether they could take under the provisions in the will in favor of grandchildren; in other words, does the term "grandchildren" include "great-grandchildren," the plaintiffs in error insisting that under the terms of the will the testator intended to include great-grandchildren, as well as grandchildren, to take the share or interest of their deceased parent. It has been decided by this court that the word "children," unless the will discloses a contrary intention, does not include grandchildren. Walker v. Williamson, 25 Ga. 549; Willis v. Jenkins, 30 Ga. 167; Crawley v. Kendrick, 122 Ga. 183, 50 S. E. 41, 2 Ann. Cas. 643; Lyon v. Baker, 122 Ga. 189, 50 S. E. 44; Fulghum v. Strickland, 123 Ga. 258, 51 S. E. 294; Smith v. Smith, 130 Ga. 532, 61 S. E. 114, 124 Am. St. Rep. 177; Brookings v. Trawick, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 550, and authorities cited. See, also, Pimel v. Betjemann, 183 N. Y. 194, 76 N. E. 157, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 580, 5 Ann. Cas. 239; 1 Words and Phrases, Second Series, 675. The same principle would apply, in considering the intention of the maker of a will who had referred therein to children and grandchildren, as to whether it was his intention to include great-grandchildren. 28 R. C. L. 253; Cummings v. Plummer, 94 Ind. 403, 48 Am. Rep. 167; Thomas v. Thomas, 97 Miss. 697, 53 South. 630 (7); 40 Cyc. 1455.

In view of the authorities just cited we find no basis upon which the words "children and grandchildren," as employed in this will, can be construed to include great-grandchildren. It necessarily follows that since the plaintiffs in error are great-grandchildren, they acquired no interest in the land in question on the death of Ellen Pendergrass. Moreover, if the estate of Ransom Aken, the father of the plaintiffs in error, acquired any interest in the land at the death of Ellen Pendergrass, it would operate to the benefit of the grantee in his deed, relating back to the time of the grant, and would serve to convey that title and interest out of the estate. Ellen Pendergrass having, in her lifetime, conveyed the title to J. H. Bullard, it would necessarily follow that the trial court correctly decided that J. H. Bullard acquired an interest which otherwise would have gone to Ransom H. Aken on the death of Ellen Pendergrass.

Judgment affirmed.

BERNHARDT v. FEDERAL TERRA COTTA CO. (No. 11761.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Damages  $\Rightarrow$  141—No recovery of damages from third person causing breach of contract, in absence of allegations showing damages from breach of such contract, or that third person had notice of such contract.

The plea offered by the defendant, which was in the nature of a recoupment, praying for damages alleged as resulting from breach by the plaintiff of the contract sued on, as a result of which breach the defendant was forced to commit a breach of a contract which he at the time had with third persons, by the terms of which he was to erect for them a building upon certain terms and conditions by a certain date, and, upon his failure to comply with his obligations under this contract and complete the building by the date named, to respond to them in liquidated damages in a certain amount per day for each day the completion of the building was delayed by him, was insufficient to set up a cause of action in his favor against the plaintiff for liquidated damages which the defendant may have sustained by reason of his having been forced by the plaintiff into a breach of his contract with such third persons. Even assuming that the plaintiff had notice of the provisions of the contract between the defendant, and those persons, and that any damages sustained by the defendant as a result of his having been forced by the plaintiff into a breach of his contract with them were in contemplation of the parties when they entered into the contract sued on, the plea was insufficient to sustain an action therefor, since it failed to contain any allegation showing that the defendant had actually sustained such damages, either by having paid damages or by having become liable therefor to such third persons. A mere allegation of the existence of the defendant's contract with third persons, and that it contained such a provision as to liquidated damages to be paid by the defendant as a result of his delay in completing the contract by a specified date, and a forced breach of this provision by him caused by the act of the plaintiff, in the absence of any allegation as to the terms of this contract, and as to facts showing that the defendant had actually sustained such damages, is not sufficient to establish the defendant's claim for such damages against the plaintiff. See, in this connection, Bernhardt v. Federal Terra Cotta Co., 24 Ga. App. 635, 101 S. E. 588.

2. Plea properly disallowed.

The trial judge therefore did not err in disallowing the plea, and, since this action is

1. Railroads  $\Rightarrow$  381(6), 387—Care required when pedestrian uses trestle.

The mere walking along a railroad track or railroad trestle is not in every case negligence per se, and, even if negligence per se, such negligence will not in every case bar a recovery for injuries received from an approaching train. Whether or not one is negligent, or to what degree he may be negligent, in crossing on a railroad trestle must be determined by the nature of the trestle, its length, height, etc., together with the character of its surroundings. Whether or not one negligently crossing upon a railroad trestle would be barred from recovery for injuries received from an approaching train must be determined by whether or not the railroad company exercised towards him the proper degree of diligence required under the circumstances.

2. Railroads  $\Rightarrow$  370—Lookout required at place used by pedestrians.

Whether or not a person on a railroad track, or crossing upon a railroad trestle, is a trespasser or licensee, the railroad company is bound to exercise special care and diligence to avoid injuring him if he is present at a place where people, with the knowledge of the railroad company, are in the habit of crossing in considerable numbers. "At such places the railway company is bound to anticipate the presence of persons on the track, to keep a reasonable lookout for them, to give warning signals, such as will apprise them of the danger of an approaching train, to moderate the speed of its train so as to enable them to escape injury, and a failure of duty in this respect will make the railway company liable to any person thereby injured," provided that his own negligence does not bar a recovery. 2 Thomp. Since a void petition for certiorari cannot, after it has been dismissed, be renewed under section 4381, Civ. 1. Sales ¶124—Vendee, on returning goods, entitled to retain sufficient to cover freight charges.

This being a suit to recover the contract price for a lot of merchandise alleged by the plaintiff to have been sold and shipped to the defendant, and it appearing that the contract entered into between the parties was entire, and not severable, and there being evidence in support of the defendant's plea that part of the goods delivered to him by the plaintiff were materially different from the goods contracted for, and that the defendant had, immediately upon discovering this fact, canceled the contract and returned the entire shipment of goods to the plaintiff, less an amount sufficient to reimburse the defendant for freight charges on the goods expended by him and chargeable to the plaintiff, the verdict for the defendant was authorized. 3. Railroads ¶394(1)—Petition held to charge negligence as to pedestrian on trestle.

A petition which alleges that the plaintiff was crossing on a railroad trestle which was approximately 40 feet long and 10 feet high, and that people in great numbers were in the habit of walking along the trestle, with the knowledge of the railroad company's agents, and that the plaintiff, while thus walking along the trestle, was injured by an approaching train, and which charges negligence on the part of the railroad company as above set out, sets out a cause of action.

It not appearing from the petition that the cause of action originated in the county in which the suit was brought, the general demurrer on this ground should have been sustained. Ocilla Southern R. Co. v. McAllister, 20 Ga. App. 400, 98 S. E. 26; Coney v. Horne, 98 Ga. 723, 20 S. E. 213. This is true even though this ground is argued for the first time in this court, since it may be taken advantage of on general demurrer and was properly presented in the record in the court below.

1. Principal and agent §141, 146(2)—Liability where one executes note or bill as general agent.

Where one executes a promissory note or a bill of exchange in his own name, with a descriptive suffix, such as "general agent," attached to his signature, and where it does not appear on the face of the instrument that he is acting for or in behalf of any one as principal, the instrument is presumably his individual obligation, and before any one can be held liable thereon as principal it must affirmatively appear that at the time of the execution of the instrument it was the intention of the parties to bind a particular person as principal, and that the maker, in executing the instrument, had authority to act as agent for, and to bind such person as, the principal. Burkhalter v. Perry, 127 Ga. 438, 56 S. E. 631, 119 Am. St. Rep. 343.

2. Principal and agent §109(2)—Authority of general agent to draw bill of exchange must appear.

Where a bill of exchange was drawn by "Oswald G. Boyle, general agent," on the "Atlas Assurance Company, Limited, of London, England," and the latter had not accepted it, even though it was the intention of the parties at the time to bind the drawee as principal, the latter cannot be held liable as principal, even though it appear that the maker was at the time of the execution of the instrument the general agent of the drawee, in the absence of proof that he was authorized to draw the instrument, or that he had authority so to do under his powers and duties as general agent.

3. Drawee of bill of exchange held not liable.

This being a suit by the transferee of a bill of exchange against the drawee, and it not appearing from the petition and the copy of the bill of exchange attached thereto that the drawee had accepted the bill of exchange, and there being in the petition nothing that indicates that the plaintiff is seeking to hold the drawee liable upon the theory that the maker, in executing the bill of exchange, acted as the agent of the drawee, the court erred in not sustaining the defendant's motion in the nature of a general demurrer to dismiss the plaintiff's case; and since the verdict rendered for the plaintiff was without evidence to support it, under the rulings in paragraphs 1 and 2 above, the court erred also in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial.

4. Courts §198(6) — Record insufficient to show that motion for new trial in city court was in vacation.

It appearing, from a recital in the bill of exceptions, that the defendant in the court below filed its motion for a new trial "on June 10, 1920, and during the March term of the city court," and it not appearing anywhere from the record that such date was in vacation, this court cannot hold that the trial judge erred in overruling the respondent's motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial upon the ground that it was filed in vacation.

Butts*, 127 Ga. 385, 387, 56 S. E. 406; Butler v. Davis, 68 Ga. 173; Watson v. Swann, 83 Ga. 198, 203, 9 S. E. 612. On Motion for Rehearing.

JENKINS, P. J. On motion for rehearing, and in the light of the argument therein set forth, the entire question determined by the judgment in this case has been given renewed consideration. The three sections of the Civil Code of 1910 which bear upon the question involved are as follows:

Section 1151: "Executions for nonpayment of taxes, against persons who are not required to pay to the treasurer, are issued by the tax collectors of their respective counties as soon as the last day for payment has arrived, and must be directed to all and singular the sheriffs and constables of this state."

Section 1165: "Executions may be levied by either of the officers to whom directed, or other officer who by law may be authorized in their place; but a constable can not levy a tax fi. fa. when the principal amount exceeds one hundred dollars, and if a tax fi. fa. for less than one hundred dollars be levied by a sheriff, his fee for said levy shall be that now allowed constables, and if the levy be made upon personalty, the same shall be advertised and sold as is now provided for justice court fi. fa.'s. If the constable levies on land, it must be returned to and sold by the sheriff of the county."

Section 1166: "The tax collector may place his fi. fa.'s in the hands of any one constable of the county, who shall be authorized to collect or levy the same in any part of the county, and it shall be the duty of the constable or constables, or other levying officer to whom the tax collector may deliver said tax fi. fa.'s for collection, to proceed promptly to enforce by levy and sale the collection of the same, and said levying or collecting officer shall make prompt settlements with the tax collectors, and in no event shall he be allowed longer than ninety days from the time the fi. fa.'s are placed in his hands, within which to make final settlement with the collector and return to him the tax collected and the uncollected fi. fa.'s with proper entries thereon. Any constable or other levying officer who shall fail or refuse to make such final return or settlement within the time above stated shall forfeit all costs that might be due him on said fi. fa.'s, and be subject to be ruled before any court of competent jurisdiction and made to account as required by this section."

The argument of able counsel in their original brief is based upon the theory that, since the law does not do vain and futile things, and since, as they contend, a constable already had territorial jurisdiction under the act of 1852 (Civil Code 1910, § 1151) to levy tax fi. fa.'s anywhere within the limits of his county, the Code provision of 1863 (Civil Code of 1910, § 1156) must therefore necessarily be taken and construed as having for its sole purpose an extension of the constable's jurisdiction as to the amount of a tax fi. fa. which he is authorized to levy in a case where all the fi. fa.'s are turned over to one such officer. In the motion for rehearing attention is called to the fact that the latter portion of the present section 1166, beginning "and it shall be the duty of the constable," etc., prescribing diligence and imposing penalties upon constables as such levying officers, could not have been the purpose of the original 1863 Code section, since these latter provisions were only added to the original provisions of section 1166 by the act of 1899. Ga. L. 1899, pp. 26, 27. In the motion counsel furthermore contend as follows:

That "the court overlooked the fact that sections 1165 and 1166 are not to be construed together, but that section 1166 repeals section 1165 to the extent that the tax collector has authority to designate a particular constable who is amenable to him, and that constable then has full authority to levy all fi. fa.'s, regardless of amount, and that it so repeals said section, for the reason that section 1165 is taken from the act of 1852, and section 1166 was placed in the Code in 1863 for the purpose of changing the act of 1852 to the extent thus indicated."

The authority to levy and collect tax fi. fa.'s seems to have been originally vested in the sheriffs. Under the act approved December 12, 1804, which was re-enacted by subsequent acts and long continued of force, it was provided:

"It shall be the duty of the sheriffs in each county, to receive from the tax collector therein all executions that may be tendered to him for taxes, and to levy and collect the same, and to make due returns to the said collector within thirty days after the receipt of each execution, where personal property is levied on, and where it shall be real estate, sixty days," etc. Cobb's Digest (1851), 29, § 80, p. 1058.

Thus, prior to the act of 1852, the powers of constables to levy, while running coextensively with the jurisdictional amounts of justices of the peace as to other executions, did not extend to tax fi. fa.'s at all, and by the enabling statute of 1852 their jurisdiction to levy tax executions was expressly limited to those not exceeding thirty dollars in amount. This act, approved January 21, 1852 (G. L. 1851-52, p. 294, § 23, II), provided as follows:

"That when the tax collector of any county shall hereafter issue an execution for taxes in arrear, the same shall be directed to all and singular the sheriffs and constables of this state, and shall be levied by either officer when the tax does not exceed thirty dollars; but where the tax exceeds that sum, the execution shall be levied by the sheriff alone." Cobb's Statutes and Forms (1859) § 99, II, p. 662.

This act of 1852, as amended by the Code of 1863 and by the act of 1876, is the basis of section 1151 of the Civil Code of 1910. By the Code of 1863 the jurisdiction of constables was extended in amount to $50, and by the act of 1876 to $100.

It does not follow, however, as the movant seems to assume, that merely because the act of 1852 requires that all tax executions shall be directed "to all and singular the sheriffs and constables of this state," the territorial jurisdiction of constables was thereby in any wise extended or affected. As was said in Butler v. Davis, 68 Ga. 173, 174:

"These executions are directed to all and singular the sheriffs and constables, in order that the proper officer might levy." (Italics ours.)

Almost from the beginning all executions from courts of record were directed "to all and singular the sheriffs of this state." Act Dec. 14, 1811; Cobb's Dig. p. 510. Justice court executions were directed "to all and singular the constables of said county" (Cobb's Statutes and Forms, p. 263), and this was the form even when a constable could not levy a justice court execution outside of his own bailiwick, which was the rule until the year 1869. Lapsley v. Ga. Loan Co., 99 Ga. 459, 27 S. E. 717. Even the sheriff, under the act of 1852, could not have levied a tax execution outside of his own proper territorial jurisdiction, although all of them were addressed "to all and singular the sheriffs and constables of this state." The purpose of the act of 1852 was to empower constables to levy tax fi. fa.'s not exceeding $30, which up to that time they were unauthorized to levy at all. It was only subsequently, and by section 812 of the first Code (1863), that constables were for the first time given the right to levy tax executions beyond the limits of their own bailiwicks. By section 811 of that Code the jurisdiction as to amount was also extended from $30 to $50, in conformity with the increase of justice court jurisdiction to that amount by the act of March 5, 1856. The provisions of the Code of 1863 were as follows:

Section 810: "Executions for nonpayment of taxes, against persons who are not required to pay to the treasurer, are issued by the tax collectors of their respective counties as soon as the last day for payment has arrived, and must be directed to all and singular, the sheriffs and constables of this state."

Section 811: "Executions may be levied by either of the officers to whom directed, or other officer, who, by law may be authorized in their place; when the principal amount does not exceed fifty dollars, the levy and sale must be made by a constable and not otherwise; if the constable levies on land or negroes, they must be returned to and sold by the sheriff of the county."

Section 812. "The tax collector may place his fi. fa.'s in the hands of any one constable of the county, who shall be authorized to collect or levy the same in any part of the county."

Section 812 corresponds with the first portion of section 1166 of the present Code, and section 810 is identical with section 1151. Thus, while it was not until 1869 that constables were given the right to levy executions, other than those for taxes, outside of their own bailiwicks, the provisions of section 812 of the Code of 1863 gave them, as to tax executions, territorial jurisdiction extending over the entire county. By the preceding section (811) their previous jurisdiction as to amount was extended from $30 to $50. This change of jurisdiction as to amount was doubtless effected to make it conform to their jurisdiction as to other fi. fa.'s, which, as stated, had been increased from $30 to $50 by the act of 1856. Cobb's Stats. and Forms, pp. 254, 257. The language of section 811 of the Code of 1863 is not, within itself, altogether clear and free from ambiguity. It might possibly have been urged that, while that section expressly prohibited sheriffs from levying tax executions of less than $50 (Morris v. Tinker, 60 Ga. 466 [1]), it does not within itself plainly and expressly limit the jurisdiction of constables to that amount.

But whatever doubt, if any, might have existed as to that is resolved by the decision of the Supreme Court in Butler v. Davis, 68 Ga. 173, wherein it was held: "In 1873 a constable could not levy a tax fi. fa. for more than $50." This decision construed sections 886 and 888 of the Code of 1873, which as to the provisions in question were identical with the language of the sections quoted from the Code of 1863. Since the only change under the act of 1876 (Ga. L. 1876, p. 30), amending section 811 of the Code of 1863 (Civil Code of 1910, § 1165; Code of 1873, § 888), was to clarify the language in accordance with the ruling of the Supreme Court just quoted, and to change the limitation in amount from $50 to $100, the ruling of the Supreme Court in Butler v. Davis seems absolutely conclusive in the case at bar.

In addition to this, there is language used in the later case of Watson v. Swann, 83 Ga. 198, 203, 9 S. E. 612, 613, decided since the act of 1876, which would also seem to be conclusive. In that case, Chief Justice Blackley said:

"As to tax fi. fa.'s not exceeding one hundred dollars in amount, the constable has as wide range territorially as the sheriff, and, we think, as wide a range as to the kind of property to be seized." (Italics ours.)

The point seems also clearly decided in Winn v. Butts, 127 Ga. 385, 387, 56 S. E. 406, 407, where the Supreme Court said:

"The execution is directed 'to all and singular the sheriffs and constables of this state.' Pol. Code, § 894. It may be levied by either of the officers to whom it is directed, or other officer who by law may be authorized to act in their place. A constable cannot levy an execution for taxes when the principal amount exceeds $100. If it is for less than $100, it may be levied either by the sheriff or a constable."

Thus it appears that the act of 1852 did not give to constables the right to levy tax executions outside of their own districts or bailiwicks, that such authority was the main purpose of section 812 of the Code of 1863 (Civil Code of 1910, § 1166), and that under these three decisions of the Supreme Court the pecuniary jurisdiction of constables remains limited, despite the provisions of section 1166.

Referring specifically to the quoted portion of the motion, wherein counsel contend that section 1166, in so far as it expressly limits in amount the jurisdiction of constables in levying tax executions, is repealed by the later Code section (1166), it might be first said that the limitation imposed by section 1165 is plain and specific, and that a repeal by implication of such a definite statutory provision is not favored. Verdery v. Walton, 137 Ga. 213, 216, 73 S. E. 390; Sampson v. Brandon Grocery Co., 127 Ga. 454, 456, 56 S. E. 488, 9 Ann. Cas. 331; Hammond v. State, 10 Ga. App. 143, 145, 72 S. E. 937. But, in addition to this, the plain and express pecuniary limitation imposed by section 1165 is, in point of fact, of later date than section 1166, on which the movant relies. While section 1166 dates from the Code of 1863 (section 812), section 1165, as now embodied in the Code, is a re-enactment of the act of February 25, 1876 (Ga. L. 1876, p. 30), when the plain and emphatic pecuniary limitation was changed from $50 to $100, at which amount it now stands.

New trial  $\Rightarrow$  18, 81—Sufficiency of petition not raised on motion for new trial.

Questions as to the sufficiency of a petition cannot be raised in a motion for a new trial. Where the defendant has not excepted to the sufficiency of the petition, either by demurrer, or by a motion in the nature of a general demurrer to dismiss the plaintiff's case for want of a cause of action appearing in the petition, he cannot, under the general assignment of error "that the verdict is contrary to law and against the principles of justice and equity," in a motion for a new trial, insist that the petition does not set out a cause of action. Roberts v. Keeler, 111 Ga. 181(6), 36 S. E. 617; Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 872(6), 888, 896, 43 S. E. 280. This is true, even though the verdict and judgment were rendered in a case on appeal to the superior court from the justice court, and where the defendant had no opportunity to file a demurrer to the petition. This ruling is not in conflict with anything contained in headnote 5 or the corresponding division of the opinion in Kelly v. Strouse, supra.

SUPPLY CO. v. McMILLAN et al.
(No. 11965.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Sept. 27, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent §41—Directed verdict proper where evidence demanded finding.

In a suit by the plaintiff to recover the purchase price of goods sold to the defendant in compliance with the terms of a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, wherein, among other things, the plaintiff agreed to give to the defendant the exclusive right to handle the plaintiff's product within certain territory, and where the defendant filed a counterclaim to the plaintiff's suit, alleging a breach by the plaintiff of its covenant in the contract to give to the defendant exclusive territorial rights as above set out, and praying damages for such breach, where the evidence demanded a finding for the plaintiff for the indebtedness sued on, and failed to sustain the defendant's counterclaim, a direction of a verdict for the plaintiff was proper.

2. Principal and agent §41—Special damages alleged from breach of contract not established.

Whether or not the legal measure of damages for the alleged breach of the contract by the plaintiff was the expenses which the defendant necessarily incurred in preparing the territory by advertising and sending out salesmen, etc., for the purpose of facilitating his sales therein as alleged by the defendant in his counterclaim, it nevertheless not appearing that such expenses were necessarily incurred as a result of the plaintiff's breach of the contract, and the defendant praying only for special damages as above set out, the defendant's counterclaim was not sustained.

3. Appeal and error §1056(6)—Exclusion of evidence of breach of contract harmless where no damages shown.

In view of the foregoing rulings, the evidence offered by the defendant, tending to show that the plaintiff had in its pleadings in a former suit admitted a breach of the contract sued upon, as set out by the defendant in his counterclaim, which evidence was excluded by the trial judge, would not, if admitted, have raised any issue of fact for the jury.

4. New trial erroneously awarded.

The verdict directed for the plaintiff, therefore, being demanded as a matter of law, the judge of the superior court erred in sustaining the defendant's certiorari and awarding a new trial.

5. Certiorari overruled and judgment ordered entered.

It appearing, however, that the appellate division of the municipal court, in affirming the judgment of the trial court, entered a final judgment for the plaintiff in excess of that rendered on the trial and authorized under the law, it is therefore ordered that the judgment of the superior court sustaining the certiorari be reversed, and that the certiorari be overruled and a final judgment entered, writing off the excess and awarding judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant for the amount of the verdict and the judgment entered thereon by the trial judge in the municipal court.

OWENS. (No. 11798.)

Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trial §251(8)—Proper to refuse to charge on proposition not relied upon.

A failure of the court to charge a certain proposition of law furnishes no ground for complaint to a party to the suit who does not rely upon such proposition of law to sustain his case. It follows therefore that in a suit against a railroad company for personal injuries, where the plaintiff alleges, as negligence causing the injury, that the defendant failed to blow the whistle of its locomotive when approaching the crossing at which the injury occurred, and where the defendant in its pleadings denies such failure and alleges that it did blow the whistle, and offers evidence to sustain such allegation, it is not error for the trial judge to fail to charge that railroad companies are not required to blow the whistles of their locomotives on approaching crossings or public roads within the corporate limits of cities, towns, and villages of this state. Pen. Code 1910, § 520. In view of the above ruling, it was not error for the court to fail to charge "the law relative to the running of railroad trains within the corporate limits of a city and approaching a crossing therein, as set out in Acts Gen. Assem. Ga. 1918, p. 212 et seq."

2. Trial §260(1)—Request containing substance of given charges properly refused.

The various requests to charge, in so far as the same were pertinent and not argumentative, were covered by the court in the general charge to the jury. Although such requests contain sound propositions of law, announced by the Supreme Court of this state in various adjudications, it does not necessarily follow that such language should be given in charge to the jury. Savannah Electric Railway Co. v. Joseph, 25 Ga. App. 518, 103 S. E. 723.

3. Instructions—Charge held fair and not misleading.

The charge of the court fairly and impartially presented all the issues in the case, and was not subject to the objection that it tended to confuse the minds of the jury, or was erroneous for any reason insisted upon.

4. Personal injuries—Verdict held not excessive.

Considering the nature of the injuries, as testified to by the plaintiff, his pain and suffering and the impairment of his capacity to work, this court cannot conclude that the verdict for the plaintiff for $5,000, which was approved by the trial judge, was excessive.

5. Personal injuries—Verdict authorized by evidence.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and no error of law appears.

Sept. 27, 1921.)

1. Trial ¶255(14)—No error in failing to charge without request as to duty to reduce damages occasioned by conduct of adjoining owner.

In a suit by a landed proprietor to recover damages for an injury to his buildings, caused by the conduct of the defendant (an adjacent proprietor) in causing an unnatural and artificial accumulation of water to be discharged and precipitated upon the land of the plaintiff, and where the charge of the court clearly restricted the plaintiff to a recovery for damage occasioned by the water, the plaintiff being under no duty to do anything to prevent such damage (Athens Mfg. Co. v. Rucker, 80 Ga. 291 [4], 4 S. E. 885), it was not error to fail to charge (without special request) that it was the duty of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to reduce the damage to his property occasioned by the conduct of the defendant.

2. Damages ¶111, 174(3)—Measure of damages for injury to building; evidence as to cost to put back in condition admissible.

While the plaintiff's measure of damage to his building is the cost of replacing it in the condition in which it was when the damage occurred (Harrison v. Kiser, 79 Ga. 588[8], 595, 4 S. E. 320; Empire Mills Co. v. Burrell Engineering, etc., Co., 18 Ga. App. 253[2], 256, 89 S. E. 530), evidence that it would cost a certain sum to "put it back in the condition it was when it was built" was not erroneously admitted, when the witness further stated, in immediate connection therewith, that it would cost the sum to which he testified "to put the building in a safe condition," and that he "made the estimate on the basis of putting the building back in a first-class condition and making it safe, putting it back secure, tearing down the back walls, rebuilding the foundation walls, and putting the drain way in a safe condition, I was just looking for the damage to the building."

The substance of the request to charge set out in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial was fully covered by the charge given.

4. Damages ¶174(3)—Witnesses ¶406—Condition of building years before damage properly rejected.

Evidence of the condition of the building 10 years prior to the time of its damage was properly rejected by the court, since such evidence was immaterial and irrelevant to illustrate the present issue, or to impeach a witness testifying to the condition of the building immediately prior to the time of the damage.

5. Damages ¶188(1)—Amount shown with reasonable certainty.

There being evidence in detail as to the nature of the damage to the building as a result of the discharge and precipitation of water on the plaintiff's land, caused by the defendant, and it being inferable, from the evidence, that the building was in a safe condition before it was damaged, and there being evidence of the cost of restoring it to such condition, the verdict is not subject to the objection that it is unsupported by evidence, in that the evidence fails to show with reasonable certainty the amount of the damage to the building.

6. Judgment ¶253(1)—Verdict within amount prayed for, though in excess of special damages, held not contrary to law.

The verdict rendered for the plaintiff, while being in excess of the aggregate amounts prayed for as special damages, is not in excess of the lawful interests upon such amounts, computed from the time of the injury to the date of the verdict, and, being within the amount prayed for as damages generally in the petition, is not contrary to law, as being in excess of the amount sued for. See, in this connection, Ga. R. Co. v. Crawley, 87 Ga. 191, 192, 13 S. E. 508; McConnell Bros. v. Slappey, 134 Ga. 95(9), 87 S. E. 440.

MAYOR, etc., OF HOGANSVILLE v. PLANTERS' BANK. (No. 12051.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Sept. 27, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations §248(1), 249—Not liable under unauthorized contract; no ratification by use of benefits.

A municipality cannot be held liable upon an implied contract for the value of any benefits received by it under a contract made with one of its officials, where the municipality is expressly forbidden to make such a contract. Such a contract, being void, cannot be ratified by an acceptance or use by the municipality of the benefits furnished thereunder. Hardy v. Mayor and Council of Gainesville, 121 Ga. 327, 48 S. E. 921; Horkan v. City of Moultrie, 136 Ga. 561, 71 S. E. 785; Neal v. Town of Decatur, 142 Ga. 205, 82 S. E. 546; Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 797 et seq.; Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 57 Pac. 777, 45 L. R. A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31; McNay v. Lowell, 41 Ind. App. 627, 84 N. E. 778; Brazil v. McBride, 69 Ind. 244; Macy v. Duluth, 68 Minn. 452, 71 N. W. 687.

2. Municipal corporations §231(3)—Not liable for electric current used under contract with corporation of which officials were stockholders.

In a suit against a municipality to recover for beneficial services, such as electric lights, alleged to have been furnished to the municipality, where one of the defenses interposed by the defendant, and sustained by evidence, was that the mayor and one of the members of the municipal council were, during the period when such services were furnished to the municipality, stockholders, and interested pecuniarily in the corporation which furnished the services, and that therefore such services were furnished under a contract which was void under a provision of the charter of the municipality that "no person holding an office in this municipal corporation shall, during the term for which he was elected or appointed, be capable of contracting with said corporation * * * for the performance of any work which is to be paid out of the treasury of said town," it was error for the court to charge that if the mayor and council of the municipality, knowing that such services were being furnished, accepted the same and made payments to the corporation furnishing such services, the municipality, notwithstanding that certain members of the council in the municipality during such period were stockholders in the corporation furnishing the services, would be liable to the plaintiff for the reasonable value of the services rendered.

3. Municipal corporations §231(4)—Liable for reasonable value of services rendered under unenforceable contract.

The municipality, however, would be liable to the plaintiff for the reasonable value of the services rendered and applied by the municipality to its benefit in the exercise of a lawful corporate function, when accepted by it during the period when a contract with the municipality by the corporation furnishing the services could be legally entered into, and not be invalid, upon the ground that an officer in the municipality was pecuniarily interested therein: Provided, however, that such liability does not constitute such a debt against the municipality as is prohibited by the Constitution.

4. Assignments of error reviewed.

It is unnecessary to pass upon the assignments of error not dealt with in the foregoing rulings.

5. Motion for new trial.

The court therefore erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Principal and agent ⇨136(4)—No recovery from agent of money paid by agent to principal.

Where money is paid to the agent of another, the payor cannot, in a suit against the agent, recover the sum thus paid, where the agent had, before the suit, paid the money over to his principal.

2. Principal and agent ⇨136(4)—No recovery of money paid to agent and appropriated in payment of indebtedness due from principal.

When a principal authorizes his agent, who has in his hands money collected for the principal, to appropriate the money to the cancellation of an indebtedness due by the principal to the agent, this is equivalent to the agent's paying the money to his principal.

3. Verdict—Demand.

This being a suit in the municipal court of Atlanta by the payor against the agent, and a verdict for the defendant being demanded as a matter of law, the judge of the superior court erred in not sustaining the defendant's certiorari, complaining of a judgment rendered for the plaintiff.

1. Bailment ⇨21—Bailee for hire may maintain.

A bailee for hire has such title and right of possession as will authorize it to maintain a suit in trover. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3468, 4482; McWhorter & Armor v. Moore, 7 Ga. App. 439, 67 S. E. 115.

2. Trover and conversion ⇨11—Innocent purchaser's liability stated.

While it is a conversion of personal property for one in possession, without title, to sell the property and receive the proceeds (Branch v. Planters' Loan & Savings Bank, 75 Ga. 342), although the one in possession was an innocent purchaser from one with no authority to sell from the true owner, yet where the true owner lost possession of the property through the negligent and fraudulent acts of its own agents and employees, such owner could not maintain trover for the property against one who innocently came into possession thereof, and who had in good faith disposed of the property without any notice of the claim of the true owner.

3. Verdict proper for defendant.

It appearing in the instant case, which is a suit in trover to recover the possession of certain property, that the plaintiff lost possession of the property through the fraudulent and negligent acts of its own agents and employees, and that the defendant was guilty of no negligence or fault in the premises, and has disposed of the property in good faith and without any notice of the plaintiff's claim, the trial judge did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant.

WADE v. EASON. (No. 11979.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Sept. 28, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Partnership ⇨110—On foreclosure of mortgage by partner to copartner, held error to strike counter affidavit claiming in defense that defendant was being proceeded against individually for a partnership debt.

This is a foreclosure, in one action, of two mortgages made by Wade to Eason, one for $3,000, and a subsequent one for the same $3,000 indebtedness, and for an additional indebtedness of $200. The defendant mortgagor filed a counter affidavit, alleging that at the time of the execution of the subsequent mortgage he and the plaintiff were in partnership, conducting farming operations, and that it was given to secure $200 advanced to him for the benefit of the partnership, and was procured by the plaintiff, and the indebtedness represented by the original mortgage included therein, in accordance with an agreement and understanding between them that it was executed solely for the purpose of being used by the plaintiff to negotiate a loan of money thereon for the benefit of the partnership, and that, since the partnership had not terminated, the defendant could not be proceeded against individually for the partnership debt. Held, that the court erred in striking the defendant's counter affidavit in so far as it set up this defense to the subsequent mortgage. See, in this connection, Miller v. Freeman, 111 Ga. 654, 36 S. E. 961, 51 L. R. A. 504; Paulk v. Creech, 8 Ga. App. 738, 70 S. E. 145.

2. Mortgages — 415(1)—Unenforceable subsequent mortgage held not to bar foreclosure on former.

It appearing that the original mortgage for $3,000 had been executed as a transaction between the parties individually, and before any partnership relation between them was in existence, and there being no valid plea of payment of this mortgage, or any other defense thereto, set up in the defendant's counter affidavit to the foreclosure, the court properly struck the counter affidavit in so far as it applied to the original mortgage.

3. Pleading — 192(3) — Counter affidavit in mortgage foreclosure held to insufficiently allege discharge of indebtedness.

Where the counter affidavit alleged that the indebtedness secured by the original mortgage arose out of a contractual relation between the parties, and set out the terms of such contract, and made a general allegation to the effect that the defendant had complied with his obligations under such contract, without alleging particularly how the obligations had been complied with, it insufficiently alleged a discharge of the indebtedness, and was therefore subject to special demurrer, on the ground that the particulars of the alleged "payment" were not set out.

4. Mortgages — 415(1)—Allegation as to damages in counter affidavit on foreclosure properly stricken.

The counter affidavit was properly stricken in so far as it set up that the defendant was, by the mortgagee's conduct in "fraudulently procuring the execution of the second mortgage," damaged in his farming operations by virtue of his laborers and tenants being interfered with, and crippled in his ability to carry out his contract of purchase for land with a third person. Arnold v. Carter, 125 Ga. 319, 54 S. E. 177.

Vendor and purchaser — 279 — Parties purchasing property in suit from plaintiffs held entitled to excess of purchase money on judicial sale over agreed price.

The rights of no one else being affected thereby, purchasers from the owners by written contract of the subject matter of a suit to enforce a vendor's lien after decree of sale, which the owners refuse to execute, may intervene by petition to be made parties to the suit and to have decreed to them, as equitable owners of the property sold, the excess of purchase money over the price which they had agreed to pay for it.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by the George Washington Life Insurance Company against Cecelia M. Jayne and another, in which E. B. Stephenson and others intervened, and their demurrer to the petition was overruled, and they were ruled to answer and the case certified. Affirmed.

Koontz & Hurlbutt, of Charleston, for interveners E. B. Stephenson and others.

Morton & Mohler and Lively & Stambaugh, all of Charleston, for defendants.

MILLER, J. After the decree to enforce the vendor's lien was pronounced in this cause, but before its execution by the special commissioner appointed for that purpose, E. B. Stephenson, A. B. Koontz and William Jones intervened by petition and were made parties, setting up therein their contract for the purchase of the property from the defendants, Cecelia M. Jayne and David A. Jayne, which the defendants had failed to execute by perfecting their title to the property and the execution of a deed in accordance with the provisions of the contract, alleging furthermore that by the failure of the defendants to comply with their contract the property was sold by the commissioner after an understanding between him and counsel for the parties to the suit, that the plaintiff should buy in the property and convey it to petitioners for the price and upon the same terms as provided in the contract, but that at said sale another party appeared and bid in the property for $1,200 in excess of the price agreed upon between defendants and petitioners, rendering it impossible for the plaintiff to convey it to petitioners, but that as by the contract the equitable title to the property thereby became vested in them, they were entitled to the excess of purchase money, which they prayed might be decreed them out of the proceeds of said sale.

The demurrer of the defendants Jayne to the petition was overruled, and they were ruled to answer, and upon their motion the correctness of the ruling of the court upon said demurrer has been certified to us for decision.

We are of opinion that the ruling of the circuit court upon the demurrer to the petition was clearly right. The validity and terms of the contract are not questioned. Petitioners were ready, able and anxious at all times to execute the contract on their part. No excuse for the failure of the defendants to do so on their part yet appears, and if the facts as alleged in the petition, exhibiting the contract duly signed, sealed and acknowledged by the defendants, are true, the effect of the contract was to invest in the petitioners the equitable title to the property subject to its terms, and the right to the surplus money arising from the sale of course would follow the equitable title.

We see nothing of merit in the contention that it was illegal and improper for counsel for the parties to agree, as they are alleged to have done, that the commissioner should sell, and to indicate the price at which the property should subsequently be sold by the plaintiff as purchaser to petitioners. This was not an agreement to stifle bidding or injure any one, certainly not the defendants, for whatever might be bid at the sale by any one not a party to the agreement over and above the price which petitioners had agreed to pay defendants therefor would belong to the former as equitable owners, no creditor or other person being affected thereby.

Nor is there anything in the contention that petitioners were not entitled to come into the cause after the decree of sale adjudicating the rights of the original parties to the suit. Upon the sale the court had the funds in hand, the proceeds of the sale, and authority and jurisdiction to dispose of them to the rightful claimants. Petitioners might possibly have paid off the vendor's lien and then sued for specific performance, but they did not choose to do so. It was their right to allow the property to be sold, and if sold for more than they agreed to pay for it, to demand the excess of purchase money. This they have done.

The right of the petitioners to so intervene is ruled, we think, by the principles of Cassady v. Cassady, 74 W. Va. 53, 81 S. E. 829, holding that a stranger to a chancery suit, claiming an interest in the subject matter thereof, may, with leave of the court, make himself a party thereto by petition; and of course this includes the right to have his rights decreed to him in the cause. The rights of the petitioners in this cause appear to be fixed by the terms of the written contract; but they are here only on the demurrer to the petition. What may appear on the trial affecting the rights of the other parties, we do not know; but it is clear the petition presents a good cause for relief.

The ruling of the circuit court will, therefore, be affirmed.

VANSENDE v. KERR.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Receivers §95—Special receiver incurring obligation without special authority is personally liable.

If a special receiver, without special contract limiting his liability and without authority specially conferred or implied, enters into a contract with a third person, whereby he incurs money or other obligation, he is personally liable thereon, as in the case of executors, administrators and trustees on like contracts.

2. Receivers §183—Declaration against special receiver individually for money advanced to pay interest on receiver's certificates held demurrable.

A declaration against a special receiver in his individual right for money advanced by plaintiff to pay interest on receiver's certificates, which alleges want of authority in the receiver to borrow money to pay such interest, but does not aver want of authority to issue and negotiate such receiver's certificates bearing interest, is bad on demurrer, the receipt given by the special receiver for such advancement showing that the money so advanced was to be paid out of the first money available for that purpose.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Action by H. W. Vansenden against Raymond E. Kerr. Demurrer to declaration sustained, and case certified. Affirmed.

Glasscock & Glasscock, of Morgantown, for defendant.

MILLER, J. The sufficiency of plaintiff's declaration being challenged by demurrer, the court below sustained the demurrer and certified the question to this court.

The action was upon the following instrument, called a note in the pleading:

"This is to certify that there is due and payable out of the first funds available, to Thomas F. Barrett, or his assigns, Fifteen hundred ($1500.00) dollars for money advanced to the undersigned Receiver to pay interest on the first issue of Receiver's Certificates for period October 1, 1918, to April 1, 1919.

"Morgantown, W. Va., July 10, 1919.

"Raymond E. Kerr, Special Receiver,

"Morgantown & Wheeling Railway Co."

The averments of the declaration so describing and setting out the instrument are that the defendant thereby promised to pay Thomas F. Barrett, or his assigns, the sum of $1,500.00; that he had no lawful authority as special receiver to make and execute the instrument, and thereby became personally liable for the payment of said sum so demanded, with lawful interest thereon; that at the time of the making and delivery of said note or certificate the defendant was not duly authorized as special receiver of said railway company to negotiate any loan of money, and was not duly authorized to make, sign or deliver said note or certificate to said Barrett as such special receiver, and had no authority whatsoever to bind or obligate the funds of the special receiver by accepting said loan or advancement, or by signing or delivering said note or certificate; whereby it is alleged defendant is indebted to plaintiff, and is personally liable, in the full amount of said note or certificate, with interest from July 10, 1919, the date received, until paid; which sum, though often requested, he has not paid, to plaintiff's damages $10,000.00.

In the written opinion of the judge of the circuit court the reason given for sustaining the demurrer is that the certificate may have been given before the receiver received the money, or it may have been advanced to him before the certificate was issued, and if the latter, it is clear, the opinion says, the purpose of the instrument was to give Barrett evidence of the fact that theretofore, for some reason not stated he had seen fit to advance said sum to pay interest on the first issue of receiver's certificates for the period stated, and that the amount advanced was due Barrett and should be paid to him out of the first funds available, and if so the plaintiff had no cause of action against defendant personally.

No brief or oral argument has been presented by counsel for plaintiff, nor is any authority cited in support of the ruling of the court upon the demurrer.

[1] The declaration in form is a nondescript and is very inartistically drawn. But when analyzed, its effect is to aver that defendant, pretending to act as special receiver, but without authority in the premises, borrowed from said Barrett the sum of $1,500.00 to pay interest on special receiver's certificates, and that being without such authority, he became liable to the assignee of the receipt declared on, as for money had and received for the use of Barrett and his assigns, for the sum so advanced. Unless in some way one so dealing with a special receiver acting without authority, and with knowledge of the fact, binds himself to look to the estate or property in the hands of the receiver for payment of the obligation, the contract is primarily the personal obligation of the receiver. In such cases he has no responsible agent, whom he can bind by his contract. The law applicable to executors, administrators and trustees in like cases applies. Peoria Steam Marble Works v. Hickey, 110 Iowa, 276, 81 N. W. 473, 80 Am. St. Rep. 296; Foland v. Dayton, 40 Hun. (N. Y.) 563; Kain v. Smith, 80 N. Y. 458; Brandt v. Siedler, 10 Misc. Rep. 234, 31 N. Y. Supp. 112; Haupt v. Vint, 68 W. Va. 657, 70 S. E. 702, 84 L. R. A. (N. S.) 518; New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 127, 29 Am. Rep. 111; Rogers v. Wendell, 54 Hun. 540, 7 N. Y. Supp. 781, 8 N. Y. Supp. 515. In 1 Clark on the Law of Receivers, § 789(h), pp. 860, 861, summarizing the rule in this country, it is said:

"If the receiver, without the direct or explicit order of court, or without any implied power, yet under color of his office as receiver, enters into a contract with third parties, such contract is the contract of the receiver personally and individually, and he is primarily liable. If such contract is proper and beneficial to the estate, and if there are funds available, the liability may be paid by order of the court out of such available funds. If there are no available funds, the receiver may have to pay such liabilities himself."

No hardship is imposed upon the receiver by this rule, for if the contract has resulted beneficially to the estate in his hands, as the decisions say, he may report the matter and have the money paid out allowed him as a part of the expenses of his administration. Peoria Steam Marble Works v. Hickey, supra; Joost v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 424, 56 Pac. 43; New v. Nicoll, supra, 73 N. Y. 131, 29 Am. Rep. 111.

[2] But it is not alleged that the defendant was not authorized to borrow money and issue interest bearing receiver's certificates therefor. Without such direct averment, must we not on demurrer assume power in the receiver to issue such certificates and to borrow money thereon? If such certificates were authorized, the power, if not expressed, would be implied to make them bear interest, and if so, to pay interest thereon out of the funds in the receiver's hands available therefor. The certificate declared on shows on its face that Barrett had advanced $1,500.00 to pay interest on the first issue of receiver's certificates, and that there was or would be due to him out of the first funds available the sum so advanced to pay interest. If there was power and authority in the receiver to issue and negotiate receiver's certificates, did that not amount to an agreement on the part of Barrett to look to the funds that might be thereafter available for payment of interest, and bring the contract within the exception to the general rule limiting liability of the special receiver, as stated in the authorities cited? We think the receipt must be so construed, and as protecting the special receiver from personal liability, provided, of course, the fact is, as presumed, that the receiver had authority to issue receiver's certificates bearing interest.

Such being our view of the case, we affirm the ruling of the circuit court.

LYNOH, J., absent.

IDLEMAN v. GROVES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading  $\S$ 193(1)—Declaration in trespass on the case for abduction is not demurrable because alleging incident facts and circumstances.

A declaration in an action of trespass on the case for the abduction of a child, about 18 months old, is not demurrable merely because it alleges the facts and circumstances incident to the commission of the wrongful act and the method of its commission, as by an assault by defendant and others co-operating with him pursuant to a conspiracy formed by them for the purpose.

2. Abduction  $\S$ 21—Declaration in trespass on the case for infant's abduction not defective, because not based on loss of service.

Nor is such a declaration necessarily defective by reason of the omission of an averment showing the basis of the action to be loss of the services of an infant child occasioned by its abduction and unlawful detention by defendant.

3. Abduction  $\S$ 21 — Elements of declaration for infant's abduction set out.

A declaration in such an action is sufficient if it shows cause for recovery on account of mental anguish, pain, and suffering on the part of the plaintiff occasioned by the wrongful detention of the child, thereby disqualifying him for the transaction of his ordinary business affairs, and on account of the cost and expenses incurred in litigation prosecuted by plaintiff to regain possession of the child.

4. Abduction  $\S$ 19—Statute held not to bar damages for infant's abduction by party previously adjudicated to have its custody.

Section 7, of chapter 82 of the Code of 1913 (sec. 3953), as amended by chapter 80, Acts 1921, does not appear to bar plaintiff's right to maintain the action, the right to its possession having been adjudicated in his favor in a proceeding instituted for the purpose.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Grant County.

Action in trespass on the case by Milford Jesse Idleman against John Groves, for damages for abduction of a minor child. Demurrer to declaration sustained, and cause certified. Ruling reversed, demurrer overruled, and declaration held sufficient.

W. C. Grimes, of Keyser, for plaintiff.

E. L. Judy, Arch J. Welton, and I. D. Smith, all of Petersburg, and Taylor Morrison, of Keyser, for defendant.

LYNOH, J. The questions certified arise on a demurrer to the declaration in an action of trespass on the case. The plaintiff sued to recover damages for the abduction of his son, a child now about 18 months old, born in lawful wedlock between him and defendant's daughter, plaintiff's wife. The defects relied on as grounds for demurrer are: First, the averment of more than one cause of action in the declaration consisting of but one count; second, the want of authority to maintain the action when the abduction was consummated by an assault upon the plaintiff initiated by defendant pursuant to a conspiracy in which the mother of the child, her father, and others under his control were active participants; and, third, the failure to allege loss of the services of the child during the abduction period.

[1] The declaration does in detail aver the combination among the persons named therein for the purpose of forcibly depriving the plaintiff of the custody and control of the child then and theretofore in his lawful possession, and that, by assaulting and thereby inflicting upon him serious personal injuries, they succeeded in the accomplishment of the unlawful purpose contemplated by them. In other words, the declaration, when properly interpreted, avers but one cause of action—the abduction of the child. Allegations of the manner in which defendant and those who co-operated with him accomplished their purpose are merely explanatory of the incidents leading up to and culminating in the consummation of the wrongful act. Their only office is to show the circumstances in which the unlawful change in the custody of the child was brought about.

That the recovery so sought by plaintiff is confined to a single issue no more clearly appears elsewhere than in the closing part of the pleading itself; for it is there asserted in no uncertain language that, by the means employed, including the unlawful assault and the infliction of injuries, plaintiff wrongfully and unjustly was deprived of the society, possession, and control of the child until it was restored to him about two months later by an order in a judicial proceeding instituted by him for that purpose, wherefore, and because of the costs incurred and money expended by plaintiff to recover possession of the child, he has been greatly injured and damaged, etc.

Obviously, plaintiff does not in this action seek redress for the personal injuries inflicted upon him. The gist of the action is not the assault and battery, but the unlawful interference with the exercise of a lawful right. As we view it, the declaration has for its sole object redress of one grievance—the abduction of the child.

The singleness and certainty of the pleading is apparent, notwithstanding allegations as to the combination to carry into effect the unlawful purpose, and as to the assault made upon the plaintiff to insure the success of that purpose. These are only the incidents, although somewhat directly connected with the commission of the wrongful act. We fail to see in what respect the declaration violates the rules of good pleading. Certainly it does not merely because it details the circumstances under which the wrong complained of was committed. They do not confuse the main issue, but rather tend to clarify and accentuate it. If irrelevant or incongruous, still they do not render the pleading defective. In that event they are to be treated as harmless or superfluous, as they in no wise affect the real merits of the controversy. But these averments, read together, are neither irrelevant nor inconsistent.

What has been said as to the first objection in effect answers and eliminates the second; that is whether plaintiff can maintain the action against defendant as an active participant with plaintiff's wife, she being a coconspirator. Though not necessary, it may not be amiss to cite Rice v. Nickerson, 9 Allen (Mass.) 478, 85 Am. Dec. 777, refuting the argument based upon the second objection; for the substance of the decision is that it is not a legitimate defense to an action for depriving plaintiff of the lawful custody of the child that defendant acted at the request of the child's mother.

[2, 3] The third ground—that is, the failure to aver loss of services—is also not fatal, though it may sometimes be prudent to insert it in declarations of this kind. The declaration does state facts sufficient to show that no substantial benefit could be derived from the services of the child 18 months old. Instead of its being a source of income, the expense incident to its maintenance, support, and training is a burden; a burden more than compensated by the comfort and pleasure of its presence as a member of the household, it is true. Besides, loss of service is a mere fiction—"an outworn fiction," according to Hood v. Sudderth, 111 N. C. 215, 16 S. E. 397; Willeford v. Bailey, 132 N. C. 402, 43 S. E. 928; Kirkpatrick v. Lockhart, 2 Brev. (S. C.) 276.

There may be circumstances in which a pleading should use the phrase omitted. Apparently it was so used in Taylor v. Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., 41 W. Va. 704, 24 S. E. 631. The wages of the son had, prior to his death, contributed to the support of the father's family, and the basis of the action was the loss of this contribution. As the child abducted by the defendant had no earning capacity, an averment of the loss of service would mean nothing, and plaintiff could not by proof show such loss had the declaration so averred. Would the action prove abortive because of such failure? An affirmative answer would be ludicrous.

At an early date the common law afforded the parent a right of action for the abduction of his child only when the child was an heir in whose marriage the plaintiff had valuable rights, and later because he lost the child's services.

"The modern American rule seems, however, to be that the parent may sue without alleging or proving loss of services, which seems to be an honest result." 1 Schouler, Mar., Div., Sep., & Dom. Rel. (8th Ed.) § 750.

In the same section the author further says:

"The modern authorities have advanced, and now the parent can recover damages for the unlawful taking away or concealment of a minor child, and is not limited to cases in which such child is the heir or eldest son—nor are the damages limited to the fiction of 'loss of services.' The real ground of action is compensation for the expense and injury—for the wrong done him in his affections and the destruction of his household."

These grounds of relief by way of damages the declaration sufficiently states. As so set out, plaintiff has suffered great pain and mental agony, and was hindered and prevented from performing and transacting his necessary affairs and business during a greater part of that time (the absence of the child), and because of the abduction—

[4] What relevancy and bearing defendant's reliance upon section 7, c. 80, Acts 1921, has or can have upon the sufficiency of the declaration or upon the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, it is difficult to perceive. The chapter amends and re-enacts sections 1, 3, and 7 of chapter 82 of the Code (secs. 3947, 3949, 3953), relating to guardians and wards. As so amended, section 1 confers authority upon the father or mother to appoint by will a guardian for his or her child, born or to be born, and for such time during infancy as he or she may direct, and section 3 like authority upon the county court to appoint a guardian where the minor has any estate therein, provided the father or mother has not done so; or, if there be no father or mother living, then it (the county court) shall appoint as such guardian his nearest of kin residing in the county wherein such minor resides or has any estate, and competent to act as such guardian, and, if there be no father or mother or next of kin, the court shall appoint some suitable person guardian for such minor. Section 7 purports to give a guardian appointed pursuant to the terms of section 3 the custody of his ward and the possession, care, and management of his estate, real and personal, and out of the proceeds of the same provide for the maintenance and support of the ward; but the father or mother of such ward shall be entitled to the custody of the person of such minor, and to the care of his education, and, if living together, shall be joint guardians of their minor child or children, with equal powers, rights, and duties in respect to their custody, control, and of the services and earnings of such minor child or children, and neither shall have any right paramount to that of the other as to such custody, control, services, and earnings.

The plaintiff and his wife presumably are not living together, and were not when the circuit court restored to plaintiff the care and custody of their child. That right thereby became an adjudicated matter as between the father and mother, according to the declaration, and as to the merits, as the case now appears, the right to the custody of the child is foreclosed.

Our opinion, therefore, is that the circuit court erred in the ruling upon the demurrer, and that, instead of holding the declaration insufficient, it should have held it sufficient, and our order will so certify.

STATE v. MILLER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Intoxicating liquors §134—Word "liquors," in prohibition statutes, is limited to beverages referred to therein.

The word "liquors," used in the prohibition statutes, is limited in its meaning, and includes only such beverages as are referred to in section 1 of that law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Liquor.]

2. Indictment and information §19—Indictment in form prescribed by act is good on demurrer.

An indictment for a violation of the prohibition law in the form prescribed by section 3 of chapter 108 of the Acts of 1919, is good on demurrer.

3. Indictment and information §125(2)—Two or more offenses of same general nature may be joined in indictment.

Joinder of two or more offenses of the same general nature in an indictment is not good ground of demurrer.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Indictment and information §125(14) — Indictment for selling, giving, and storing liquor not duplicitous.

An indictment charging that defendant did "sell, give, offer, expose, keep, and store for sale and gift liquors" held not bad for duplicity, although defendant might be guilty of distinct offenses.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Roane County.

Holl Miller was indicted for violation of the prohibition law. The demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and the case certified. Ruling on demurrer affirmed.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., R. A. Blessing, Asst. Atty. Gen., and John W. Lance, Pros. Atty., of Spencer, for the State.

Thos. P. Ryan, of Spencer, for defendant.

RITZ, P. Defendant was indicted in the circuit court of Roane county upon the charge that he did unlawfully sell, give, offer, expose, keep, and store for sale and gift liquors. A demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and the questions arising thereon certified to this court.

The indictment is in the form prescribed by section 3 of chapter 108 of the Acts of 1919. The ground of the demurrer is that the indictment does not necessarily charge an offense, for the reason that the word "liquors," which the defendant is charged with having dealt in, is too uncertain to make him guilty of any crime under the law; and, second, that the indictment is bad for duplicity, in that several separate offenses are charged therein.

[1, 2] It is quite true that the word "liquors" used in this indictment in its broad sense may include other substances than those referred to in the statute, but this form of indictment is prescribed by the law itself. The word "liquors," used in the prohibition statutes, has a well-defined significance. Section 1 defines the term, and it says just what it means when used in that law. No matter what the word may signify in other connections, its meaning in the prohibition laws is clearly and definitely determined by the language of section 1. The Legislature determined to inhibit the manufacture and sale of a number of different beverages, and for convenience adopted one term which included all or any of them, and this is the use made of the word "liquors" in the law, so that when the word "liquors" is used it is limited in its meaning to the things mentioned in section 1. By the very terms of section 1 it cannot be given any broader or narrower meaning. The defendant cites the cases of State v. Durr, 69 W. Va. 251, 71 S. E. 767, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, and State v. Dennison, 85 W. Va. 261, 101 S. E. 458, as authority for the proposition that one may defend against an indictment of this character by showing that the substance sold by him was not a spirituous or malt liquor and was not intoxicating. This is quite true, but when he shows this he shows that it was not a liquor under the prohibition act. In other words, he is not guilty because he did not deal in liquors as defined by the act.

[3, 4] The suggestion that the indictment is bad for duplicity is without merit. It is true that, if the defendant did sell, give, offer, expose, keep, and store for sale and gift liquors, he may be guilty of separate and distinct offenses; but it is well established in this jurisdiction that the joinder of two or more offenses of the same general nature in an indictment is not ground of demurrer. State v. Calhoun, 67 W. Va. 666, 69 S. E. 1098; State v. Jarrell, 76 W. Va. 263, 85 S. E. 525.

It follows that the demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled, and we answer the question certified accordingly.

VAN RAALTE CO. v. SOLOF BROS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Set-off and counterclaim §35(2)—Defendant cannot set off unliquidated damage claim arising from different transactions.

The general rule, in this state as elsewhere, unless controlled by statute, is that a defendant in an action at law can not set off against plaintiff's demand a claim for unliquidated damages arising out of a different transaction than the one sued on.

2. Set-off and counterclaim §35(2)—Difference between contract price and that paid on seller's breach is not "liquidated demand," and cannot be set off against seller's demand for price of other goods.

A claim of defendant for the difference between the contract price of goods sold but not delivered to him by the plaintiff and the price paid by him in the open market for like goods to take their place is not under the rule of our decisions a liquidated demand provable as a set-off against plaintiff's demand for the price of other goods actually sold and delivered to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Liquidated.]

3. Set-off and counterclaim §35(2)—Plea that plaintiff is a nonresident will not support equitable set-off of liquidated damages against a demand in another transaction.

An averment in a plea that plaintiff is a nonresident of the state and that process in an action against him on an unliquidated demand cannot be served upon him here will not in law support a plea of equitable set-off of such unliquidated damages against plaintiff.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action in assumpsit for goods sold by the Van Raalte Company against the Solof Brothers Company. Plea of set-off stricken, and case certified. Ruling of circuit court affirmed.

Simms & Staker, of Huntington, for plaintiff.

Vinson, Thompson, Meek & Renshaw, of Huntington, for defendant.

MILLER, J. In an action of assumpsit for the value of goods sold, the defendants sought by plea to offset two counterclaims for damages for alleged breaches of plaintiff's contracts to sell and deliver to defendants at prices stipulated in the contracts certain other goods which, because of such breaches, they had been obliged to purchase in the market at higher prices, whereby they were damaged to an amount largely in excess of plaintiff's demand against them. It is not alleged in the plea that these counterclaims arose out of the same transaction on which plaintiff sued, nor that plaintiff is insolvent, but the sole ground for equitable relief is that plaintiff is a non-resident corporation and that, for that reason, service of process can not be had upon it in this state.

The question certified is whether the plea presents a good defense of set-off to plaintiff's demand. The circuit court ruled that it did not, and struck out the plea.

[1] We think the court was clearly right. Defendants' counsel concede it to be well settled in this state and everywhere in general, unless a different rule has been established by statute, that a defendant in an action at law can not have set off against the plaintiff's demand a claim for unliquidated damages arising out of a different transaction than that sued on. Our decisions on this proposition are numerous. Clark's Cove Guano Co. v. Appling, 33 W. Va. 470, 10 S. E. 809; Case Mfg. Co. v. Sweeny, 47 W. Va. 638, 35 S. E. 853; Ashland Coal & Coke Co. v. Hull Coal & Coke Corp., 67 W. Va. 503, 68 S. E. 124; Dodge v. Brown, 74 W. Va. 466, 82

[2] The principal question presented by the plea is whether it amounts to a liquidated demand upon which an action of indebitatus assumpsit would lie, and provable as a set-off, or constitutes an unliquidated claim for uncertain damages for which no exact measure thereof can be applied. As said, the claim does not arise out of the same transaction as that sued on, but if the claim of defendants and the amount thereof is susceptible of accurate ascertainment, it might be interposed as defendants' plea undertakes to do by way of set-off. The plea says defendants were compelled to go into the market and buy goods to take the places of parts of the several lots contracted for, and were obliged to pay prices in excess of the price stipulated in the contract. In the recent case of Richardson Const. Co. v. Whiting Lumber Co., 116 Va. 490, 82 S. E. 87, the Virginia court would seem to have allowed a plea of set-off similar to the one involved here, on the theory that the damages claimed were susceptible of definite ascertainment. We do not think this decision is in accord with our own, nor with the weight of authority, nor with prior decisions of the Virginia court. In Christian v. Miller, 3 Leigh, 78 (30 Va.) 23 Am. Dec. 251, an action on a bond which included the price of corn, a claim of the same character—damages for failure to deliver the corn—the right of set-off was denied. Judge Tucker defined the character of the claim in that case as strictly one for unliquidated damages and not a proper subject of set-off. In Pottery Co. v. Parker, supra, we held that a demand for rent or royalty for the right to manufacture an article, and the rent or royalty was fixed by contract, constituted a liquidated demand which might be set off against defendant's notes, the plea alleging that the quantity manufactured, at the rate specified, was sufficient to have aggregated the sum sued for; but that the plea in that case claiming damages for the difference between the price at which it was averred the defendant agreed to manufacture and sell the goods and the price at which plaintiff sold them to others, being unascertainable by any facts alleged or by any known method of calculation, did not constitute a good plea of set-off. In J. C. Orrick & Son Co. v. Dawson, supra, one of the questions was whether defendant, in an action by plaintiff for a lot of cans sold him, could recoup damages for plaintiff's alleged failure to take and pay for certain canned goods sold it, defendant's claim not arising out of the same transaction as that sued on; and it was held that defendant's claim was not a proper subject for recoupment.

[3] But does the fact alleged, that the plaintiff is a non-resident, and service in this state can not be executed upon it, give ground for relief, as defendants aver? Defendants' counsel contend that this fact constitutes good ground for equitable relief, aside from the ground of insolvency or any other equitable ground. The only authorities offered for this contention are Ewing-Merkle Elect. Co. v. Lewisville Light & Water Co., 92 Ark. 594, 124 S. W. 509, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 21, 19 Ann. Cas. 1041, and a note to L. R. A. 1918B, p. 425. In Arkansas the same form of action applies to both law and equity cases. There the defendant interposed a cross-bill, alleging the non-residence of plaintiff as ground for relief in equity, and the defense was sustained. As the note in that case, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) p. 21, will show, the authorities are in conflict as to whether non-residence of the plaintiff is a good ground for equitable relief. We need not go into this question, for we are in a court of law, and in no case cited or examined have we found that such equitable rights have been enforced in an action at law.

We affirm the ruling of the circuit court.

STATE ex rel. BOWEN v. KIRK et al.
(No. 4413.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

Prohibition §3(1), 5(4)—Will not lie to prevent preliminary examination because of former examination and discharge.

Prohibition does not lie to prevent a justice of the peace from holding a preliminary examination of one accused of crime, upon the ground that such accused party had been previously examined upon such charge and discharged therefrom by another justice. If such previous examination and discharge is a bar to a further examination upon the same charge, it should be taken advantage of upon the second hearing.

Petition by the State, on the relation of L. S. Bowen, for a writ of prohibition against R. C. Kirk, Justice of the Peace, and others. Writ denied.

E. L. Stone, of Charleston, and W. L. Higgins, of Huntington, for relator.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. D. Steed and Chas. Ritchie, Asst. Attys. Gen., for respondents.

RITZ, P. The petition in this case avers that on the 28th day of July, 1921, one E. A. Thornton made a complaint in writing, duly sworn to before C. R. Clay, a justice of the peace of Marsh Fork district, in Raleigh county, charging that petitioner on the said 28th day of July did feloniously take, steal, and carry away $1,800 from the store of McClung & Morgan Stores Co., and that on said day a warrant was issued upon said complaint by said justice; that petitioner was apprehended upon this warrant and brought before said justice on the 29th of July, and that on that day a full hearing of the matters charged in the complaint was had before said justice, the state and the petitioner each introducing a number of witnesses, and that the justice, after hearing all of the evidence offered, and after such full hearing, decided that there was not probable cause to hold petitioner upon said charge, and discharged him from custody; that on the 30th day of July, E. R. Dorsey appeared before R. C. Kirk, another justice of the peace of said county, and made a complaint in writing against the petitioner, charging him with the identical offense upon which complaint warrant was issued by said justice, and the said petitioner apprehended and produced for trial; that said R. C. Kirk did not appear for the trial, and the same was continued, and petitioner required to give bail in the sum of $1,000 for his appearance before said justice on the 9th day of August for a hearing upon said warrant; that the said E. R. Dorsey, who made the complaint upon which the second warrant was issued, was an employé of the McClung & Morgan Stores Co., and testified on the hearing before the Justice of the Peace Clay on the 29th of July, above referred to. The petition further avers that petitioner is not guilty of the charge contained in said warrant; that a full and complete hearing was had thereof before C. R. Clay, a justice of the peace, as aforesaid, and that he was discharged therefrom, and that it is not competent for the respondent R. C. Kirk, justice of the peace, to hold him upon the warrant issued upon the second complaint, and prays that a writ of prohibition issue from this court prohibiting the said justice from further proceeding upon said warrant.

The petitioner insists that, having been discharged by one justice upon a preliminary hearing, he cannot be arraigned before another justice for another preliminary hearing upon the same charge; that, while the action of the justice is not conclusive of his guilt or innocence, still it is effective to prevent him from being subjected to an examination before another justice. Assuming for the sake of argument that the petitioner is correct in this assumption, is prohibition the remedy? The matter relied upon by him is in the nature of a plea of former acquittal. The justice has jurisdiction to issue a warrant upon a complaint charging one with an offense, and he has jurisdiction to conduct a preliminary hearing in a case like this for the purpose of determining whether or not there is probable cause for holding the accused party to answer any indictment that might be returned by a grand jury. The defensive matter relied upon does not go to the jurisdiction of the justice to try for the offense charged, but simply denies the right of the justice to hold him, for the reason that he had been theretofore tried for the same offense. If the warrant had not charged the defendant with doing something which constituted an offense, then of course there would be an entire want of jurisdiction, and prohibition would lie to prevent the justice from trying him. In this case, however, the warrant charges an offense. The justice's jurisdiction to issue the warrant cannot be questioned. The matter relied upon does not impeach that jurisdiction, but simply goes to the authority to try him a second time for the same thing.

The determination of this question—assuming that it would be a good defense—involves the establishment of the identity of the accused, the identity of the offense, and proof of his former acquittal. All of these questions would have to be inquired into and determined in his favor. In the case of Bracey v. Robinson, Judge, 83 W. Va. 9, 97 S. E. 295, we held that a writ of prohibition would not issue to prevent a judge before whom an indictment was pending from proceeding with the case upon the ground that the defendant had theretofore been acquitted of the same offense, that this was matter of defense in that suit, and the court, having the case before it, had jurisdiction to try the issue arising upon a plea setting up such defense. While, of course, in this case it is not insisted that the discharge of the petitioner by one justice is a bar to any proceeding against him, still it is relied upon as barring any other justice from conducting a like examination, and the same principle is involved as that announced in Bracey v. Robinson, Judge, supra. In Ex parte Page, 77 W. Va. 467, 87 S. E. 849, the petitioner sought discharge by habeas corpus from imprisonment under a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace. The facts were that a warrant had been issued charging him with an offense. He appeared before the justice who issued this warrant, and the hearing thereon was continued to a subsequent day. Thereafter, and before the time fixed for such hearing, another justice issued a warrant against him for exactly the same offense, and tried and convicted him thereon. This court held that the pendency of the warrant before the first justice would be a bar to any proceeding before the second justice; but that this defense must be made upon the trial before such second justice.

It is argued here that, should the justice issuing the second warrant in this case refuse to discharge the petitioner upon the showing that he had been theretofore tried before another justice, he would be without remedy by appeal, and would have to give bond for his appearance before the criminal or circuit court, or else be committed to jail; that there is no method provided for reviewing the action of a justice upon such a preliminary hearing. It is quite true that there is no method provided by statute by which the action of a justice committing a party to trial can be reviewed, but still, if a justice should, in flagrant violation of the law, hold one for trial and commit him to jail, there are many cases holding that the writ of habeas corpus is effectual to secure his discharge. Ex parte Samuel, 82 W. Va. 486, 96 S. E. 95. If it is shown beyond question and without controversy that the accused party should not be held, it may be said that a justice of the peace holding him under such circumstances would be exceeding his jurisdiction. Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89; Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 18 L. Ed. 281; In re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 7 Sup. Ct. 556, 30 L. Ed. 658; Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. Ed. 872; In re Nielsen, 113 U. S. 176, 9 Sup. Ct. 672, 33 L. Ed. 118. And in the case of Ex parte Page, 77 W. Va. 467, 87 S. E. 849, we held that, where a justice rendered a judgment which the law did not authorize, the petitioner would be discharged from imprisonment under that judgment upon a writ of habeas corpus.

We are of opinion that, if the matter relied upon by petitioner is a bar to a hearing upon the second warrant, he must present it to the justice before whom he is brought for such hearing. The writ of prohibition prayed for is denied.

HALL v. HARVEY COAL & COKE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error §47(3)—Amount sued for held amount in controversy notwithstanding verdict.

Where a demurrer is overruled and the jury, on the issue, finds a verdict of $100 for plaintiff, but, instead of entering a judgment thereon and disposing of a motion for a new trial, the court certifies its action on the demurrer to this court for review, the amount in controversy is the sum sued for, and this court will take jurisdiction upon the question certified.

2. Mines and minerals §55(6)—Deed to minerals in place with mining privilege, without words waiving subjacent support, not construed to protect vendee against damages from removing coal.

A deed to coal and minerals in place, containing privilege of mining and removing, without words in either the granting clause or mining provision indicating an extinguishment or waiver of the right of subjacent support to the surface in case the coal is mined and removed, will not be construed to protect the vendee against damages to the surface caused by the mining and removal of the coal.

3. Mines and minerals §55(6) — Conveyance of minerals with mining right with covenants of general warranty does not extinguish vendor's right to subjacent support.

A conveyance of coal and all minerals, with the right of mining and removing said coal and all minerals, with covenants of general warranty of the coal and other minerals, does not evince the extinguishment of the right of the vendor to subjacent support to protect the surface of the land in its natural state in the event of the removal of the coal. Distinguished from Griffin v. Coal Co., 59 W. Va. 490, 53 S. E. 24, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1115.

(Additional Syllabus by the Editorial Staff.)

4. Pleading §216(2)—Papers attached to declaration cannot be considered on demurrer unless the parties have so agreed.

Papers attached to or made a part of a declaration or exhibited therewith cannot be considered on demurrer thereto, but where oyer of a deed made a part of the declaration was craved without objection from plaintiff and the parties, and the circuit court have tacitly agreed that the deed may be considered, it will be considered in reviewing the judgment on the demurrer to the declaration.

Case certified from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Action by O. M. Hall against the Harvey Coal & Coke Company. Demurrer to the declaration overruled, and case certified. Affirmed.

C. R. Summerfield, of Fayetteville, for plaintiff.

Dillon & Nuckolls, of Fayetteville, for defendant.

LIVELY, J. A demurrer to the declaration was overruled, and the circuit court has certified its action in so doing to this court, and the sufficiency of the declaration is now under review.

Plaintiff filed its declaration in trespass on the case, alleging ownership of the surface of a tract of land, the coal and all minerals under which, prior to his purchase of the surface, had been sold by a former owner in the year 1898 to Harvey and Thurmond, with the right to mine and remove the same, the deed to which coal and all minerals is filed with the declaration as a part thereof; that the defendant had wantonly and willfully removed all, or practically all, of the coal, without leaving sufficient coal in place, or without leaving in its place other permanent artificial support for preserving the surface or overlying strata in its natural condition, by reason whereof the surface began to sink in places, causing cracks, holes, and crevasses, and rendering the land unfit and useless for farming and grazing purposes, and causing damage to plaintiff of $3,000.

[1, 4] Oyer was craved of the deed filed as a part of the declaration, whereupon it was produced and by order of the court made a part of the declaration, and then defendant demurred to the declaration, which demurrer was overruled, issue joined, and the case went to trial, resulting in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff of $100. Motion by defendant to set aside the verdict followed, and the court, without passing upon the motion, and believing the question of the sufficiency of the declaration of vital importance, on its own motion certified its action in overruling the demurrer to this court for review, and stayed further proceedings.

Two deeds accompany the record, but as only one of them, the deed from Painter to Harvey and Thurmond in 1898, is referred to in the declaration, and that only could have been made a part of the declaration by oyer, it, only, will be considered on demurrer.

It is well settled that papers attached to or made a part of a declaration, or exhibited therewith, cannot be considered upon a demurrer to the declaration. Such documents are evidence in support of the averments of the declaration, and go to the jury. Pingley v. Pingley, 84 W. Va. 433, 100 S. E. 216. But inasmuch as oyer of this deed was craved without objection from plaintiff and the deed made a part of the declaration, defendant is entitled to whatever benefit he may derive therefrom. Chitty on Pleading, vol. 1, p. 431 (11th Ed.). It seems that the parties and the court have tacitly agreed that the deed may be considered upon the demurrer, and in this particular instance, for the purposes of this case, it will be so considered.

We are met at the threshold with a question of our jurisdiction to entertain this case under section 1, c. 135, Code 1918,<sup>1</sup> which provides for certification of questions arising upon the sufficiency of a summons or return of service, or challenge of the sufficiency of a pleading in any case within the jurisdiction of this court. It is urged that this court is not called upon to pass on the sufficiency of a pleading, but to construe a deed and to determine from it the right of defendant to remove the coal as lessee of Harvey and Thurmond, without leaving support sufficient to sustain the surface in its natural state. As above stated, plaintiff filed this deed as a part of his declaration, and it was made and considered so by the court upon oyer without objection on the part of plaintiff, and he should not now complain of what he has done. Besides the declaration sets out that Painter, a former owner of the land, had, before plaintiff obtained title to the surface, conveyed "the coal and other minerals" underlying the same to Harvey and Thurmond. The declaration, while averring the ownership of the coal and minerals in others, in partial conformity with the deed, does not set out the clause or provision in the deed therefor by which the purchasers have the mining rights for "removing said coal and all minerals from said land," a privilege and right which would necessarily follow from the sale and conveyance of the coal and minerals. If there was not an implied right to mine and remove the coal and minerals, the purchase would be of little value. It is the law of necessity. The sale of land lying in the interior of and surrounded by the grantor's land implies a right of way to the grantee over the grantor's land for ingress and egress. The parties may stipulate the kind of way, its location, width, etc., so as to save possible disputes and resorts to the courts. In this deed the parties have incorporated therein a specific agreement for what the law of necessity impliedly grants, to be exercised in a particular, specified manner. The provision in the deed for mining and removing the coal does not materially affect the granting clause of the coal practically set out and averred in the declaration, and the demurrer could well be considered and disposed of without resort to the deed.

It is also urged that, inasmuch as the verdict has been rendered for $100, the amount in controversy is too small for appeal to this court, and no question on a pleading can be certified unless the case is within the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. But what is the amount in controversy? Does the verdict of the jury upon which the court has taken no action fix the amount in controversy? "All courts deny to a verdict the legal effect of a judgment." Hannah v. Bank, 53 W. Va. 86, 44 S. E. 154. The amount in controversy as to plaintiff is the sum for which he sues though judgment be rendered for a less sum or judgment be for the defendant. As to the defendant, it is the amount of the judgment as of its date. This is well settled. The cases cited by plaintiff, including Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309, Faulconer v. Stinson, 44 W. Va. 546, 29 S. E. 1011, and Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87, are cases where judgments or decrees were rendered for less than the jurisdictional amount, and the appellant was defendant below. Here neither party is appealing, but the circuit court, on its own motion and in its discretion, has certified its decision for review. Pending the motion for new trial, nothing is settled. The circuit court may of its own motion set aside the verdict. In the present status of this case the amount in controversy is the ad damnum stated in the writ and declaration.

[2, 3] We come now to the question certified. Does the declaration and deed state a good cause for recovery? Defendant insists that the answer is in the negative under the decision of this court in Griffin v. Coal Co., 59 W. Va. 480, 53 S. E. 24, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1115. That case recognizes the rule well settled in England and the majority of the states that where one person owning the whole fee conveys the mineral therein, reserving to himself the surface, the grantee, in removing the mineral, is bound to furnish subjacent support for the surface in its then natural state, either by leaving sufficient of the ground to remain, or by substituting therefor adequate artificial support, unless there are contractual provisions either in the conveyance or otherwise to the contrary. In construing the deed from Griffin to Camden the court held that the vendor had contracted away the subjacent support to the vendee, because in granting mining privileges he had given the right to the vendee to excavate and remove all of the coal. Much stress is laid upon the word "all" as used in that deed, and the court virtually holds that without the word "all," evincing a waiver of subjacent support by the grantor, he would not have parted with the right of subjacent support. Judge Cox, in his concurring opinion, says:

"The plaintiff granted all the coal, and the ownership of the surface and of the underlying coal was severed, creating a separate estate in each. If the deed said nothing more, the owner of each would be bound by the rule, sic utere, etc. If the deed said nothing more, I would without hesitation hold that the owner of the surface would be entitled to support, and that the owner of the coal could not so use it by removing all of it as to injure the surface. The deed does not stop with the grant of all the coal. It contains the express additional grant, on the part of the plaintiff, to the grantee, of the right to enter upon and under said land and to mine, excavate, and remove all of said coal."

In the case of Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co. (C. C.) 152 Fed. 1013, instituted in the United States Court for the Northern District of West Virginia after the decision in the Griffin Case, but based on a sale of coal made before the decision in the Griffin Case, the Supreme Court of the United States, in 215 U. S. 349, 30 Sup. Ct. 140, 54 L. Ed. 228, decided that the Griffin decision was not a rule of property and therefore not binding on the federal courts in the Kuhn Case; and the Circuit Court of Appeals, 179 Fed. 191, 102 C. C. A. 457, 66 W. Va. 711, Judge Pritchard rendering the decision, said:

"We are not unmindful of the fact that the decisions of the courts of England and many of the courts of this country as respects this question are not in harmony with the decisions of the courts of West Virginia. Nevertheless, we find ourselves impelled to the conclusion that this difference is on account of the peculiar facts involved in this case, and not because of the propositions of law announced by the courts to which we refer."

It is then stated that, inasmuch as the decision in the Griffin Case would be a rule of property as between citizens of West Virginia, and if the Circuit Court of Appeals should not follow the Griffin Case, a different rule of property would be established for persons not resident of West Virginia and who might sue in the federal courts concerning property in West Virginia, thus bringing about confusion and injustice, and—

"on that account we would be inclined to adopt the rule of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals, even if, in view of the peculiar provisions of the conveyance by which the land in controversy was transferred, we do not find ourselves in accord with that tribunal." Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., 66 W. Va. p. 711, 179 Fed. 191, 102 C. C. A. 457 (appendix).

As before stated, the Griffin Case turned upon the use of the word "all" in the mining clause, which gave the vendee the right "to mine, excavate and remove all of said coal." In this case the language is different. The granting clause is: "Do bargain, sell, grant and hereby convey the coal and all minerals in and upon the hereinafter described tract," and the mining clause reads, "do also grant the right of mining, and removing the said coal and all minerals from said land," and the warranty clause is "that they will warrant, with general warranty of title, the said coal, and other minerals, with the rights and privileges aforesaid hereby granted." Here, the word "all" does not modify "coal." The main and controlling subject about which the parties were contracting was the coal, but all minerals of whatever kind were also included, with the right to mine and remove, such as gold, silver, gas, petroleum, and the like. Not only the coal was purchased but all minerals also. We think a proper construction of this deed, viewing the entire language, and not any segregated words or clauses, evinces the intention of the parties to sell and purchase, not only the coal, but all other minerals in the land with the right to mine and remove the same. It is easily distinguished from the Griffin Case.

Godfrey v. Weyanoke Coal and Coke Co., 82 W. Va. 665, 97 S. E. 186, has no application here. In that case there was an express agreement that the vendee should have the right to mine the entire amount and body of the coal, without being in any way liable for any damage or injury which might be done to the land.

From what has been said, we do not find sufficient language in the deed under consideration which would deprive the grantor of his right to subjacent support in the removal of the coal by the grantee. The right of the grantee so to do is not expressed so plainly as to preclude doubt.

The demurrer to the declaration was properly overruled, and we so answer the question certified.

Affirmed.

LEACH v. WEAVER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$ 843(4)—Where case is certified on overruling of general demurrer, it will be affirmed on finding bill sufficient in any particular.

Where a general demurrer has been interposed to a bill and overruled, and the question of the ruling thereon is certified to this court for review, on the lower court's own motion, the appellate court, upon finding the bill sufficient in any one particular, will affirm without inquiry as to the sufficiency of the bill in other particulars.

2. Taxation  $\S$ 734(7) — Misdescription of amount of land sold will not alone invalidate tax sale.

Where there is a return of a delinquent list of lands properly assessed for taxation, giving the correct name of the owner, the true location of his tract, but describing it as containing 19 acres, whereas the true number of acres owned is 13½ acres, and the delinquent list and return thereof is, in other respects, in conformity with the statute, such discrepancy in the acreage alone will not invalidate a tax deed to the interest of the owner in such tract, made in pursuance of a regular tax sale.

Case certified from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Suit by Ora A. Leach against Alva D. Weaver and others. Demurrer to bill overruled, and case certified. Affirmed.

J. Hop Woods, of Philippi, for plaintiff.
George & Wilcox, of Philippi, for defendant.

LIVELY, J. Demurrer to the bill was overruled and the court has certified its decision in so ruling to this court for review.

The bill is to cancel a tax deed and remove it as a cloud on plaintiff's title. Ora Leach, the plaintiff, has a deed to and possession of 23 acres and about 88½ poles of land on Laurel creek of Valley river, in Philippi district of Barbour county, the title to which was deraigned from John W. Male, who, in 1903, owned a tract of 190 acres, out of which the land in controversy was carved. John W. Male conveyed 29 acres, 88½ poles, to Amanda Male on May 4, 1904, who, in the winter of 1909, conveyed 6 acres to three grantees (2 acres to each), leaving remaining 23 acres and 88½ poles. On June 16, 1909, she conveyed out of the remaining acres a 10-acre tract to John H. Male, which left her at that time 13 acres, 88½ poles. On September 25, 1909, she conveyed all of this land back to John W. Male, describing it as the same land which was deeded to her on May 4, 1904, by John W. Male. On March 23, 1910, John W. Male conveyed this land to Aaron Male, describing it as the land deeded to him by Amanda Male. On April 13, 1910, Aaron Male deeded this same tract to Arch Male, describing it as the land deeded to him by John W. Male March 23, 1910. By a joint deed, August 1, 1912, Arch Male, Sr., and John H. Male (their wives joining therein) conveyed two tracts of land to Arch Male, Jr., and Hulda Male (his wife); the first tract described being that deeded by Arch Male, Sr., and wife, and designated as the same land conveyed by John W. Male to Aaron Male on March 23, 1910, containing about 14 acres; and the second tract, which is designated as being conveyed to the grantee by John H. Male and wife is described as the same land conveyed by Amanda to said John H. Male on June 16, 1909, and is described by metes and bounds, and contains 10 acres.

The tax delinquency, which resulted in the tax deed in question, occurred in the year 1912, when Arch Male is shown on an excerpt of the delinquent list for that year as delinquent in the payment of taxes on a tract of 19 acres lying on Laurel creek. Plaintiff derived title to his land through Arch Male, Jr., who on November 7, 1914, conveyed his two tracts, containing 24 acres more or less, to Elias Gall, who afterwards, on November 13, 1916, conveyed the land designated as composed of two tracts, one containing 13 and ²⁄₁₀₀ acres, and the other 10 acres, to the plaintiff.

The tract of land returned delinquent for nonpayment of the taxes of 1912 in the name of Arch Male, and as containing 19 acres on Laurel creek, was sold by the sheriff in 1914, and purchased by T. H. Proudfoot for $4.45, who assigned the benefit of his purchase to Wm. T. George, to whom a tax deed was made by the county clerk on December 22, 1915, and who afterwards conveyed the land to defendant A. D. Weaver on December 13, 1917. The tax deed made to Proudfoot contains the same description, metes, and bounds as the 29 acres and 88½ poles conveyed by John W. Male to Amanda Male, dated the 4th day of May, 1904, and therefore includes the three tracts of 2 acres each conveyed by Amanda Male in the winter of 1909 to three grantees, Stella Male, Amanda Norris, and Lucinda Croston, and also includes the 10-acre tract conveyed by Amanda Male to John H. Male, and afterwards conveyed by him to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff on August 1, 1912. The tax deed evidently takes in too much territory, as shown by the bill and exhibits. It will be seen from an inspection of the deed from Arch Male, Sr., to Arch Male, Jr., dated August 1, 1910, that the grantor only claimed to have about 14 acres by virtue of the deed to him from Aaron Male. Again it will be seen from an inspection of the excerpt from the land book of 1912, Exhibit No. 1, with the bill, that John H. Male had his 10 acres on Laurel creek, deeded to him by Amanda Male, assessed to him, and on which the taxes for that year were evidently paid. The excerpt from the delinquent list, Exhibit No. 2, shows that he was not delinquent for that year. There is a presumption that a person has paid his taxes until it is otherwise shown. Cunningham v. Brown, 39 W. Va. 588, 20 S. E. 615. The same may be said of the owners of the three 2-acre tracts included in the boundaries of the tax deed. But these owners are not parties, and are not complaining of the cloud, if any, upon their titles. From the allegations of the bill, and from the exhibits, it is shown that the tax deed, which includes in its metes and bounds the John H. Male 10-acre tract now owned by the plaintiff, is a cloud upon that title. Is this sufficient to sustain the bill? It does not appear on what grounds the circuit court overruled the demurrer.

[1] A proceeding of this kind is to test the sufficiency of a pleading. And where the appellate court finds one part of the bill sufficient where there had been a general demurrer which was overruled, it will affirm the decision without inquiry as to the sufficiency of the other parts. Wheeling v. Telephone Co., 82 W. Va. 208, 95 S. E. 653.

[2] But the specific questions certified by the court for answer are:

"(1) Does the fact that the delinquent, Arch Male, had but 13½ acres of land, whereas he was returned delinquent for 19 acres of land in the year 1912, invalidate the deed to W. T. George, executed by the clerk of the county court of Barbour county?

"(2) Does section 25, c. 31. (section 1084), Code, cure such defect in the assessment as propounded in question No. 1?"

The other points raised by counsel for defendant on the demurrer seem not to have been of sufficient importance or difficulty to influence the discretion of the trial judge and to cause him to certify them for review. The certification is on the court's own motion, and not on the joint application of the parties.

We are cited to Cunningham v. Brown, 39 W. Va. 589, 20 S. E. 615, to sustain the proposition that the misdescription of the quantity of land owned by Arch Male (19 acres instead of 13 acres, 88½ poles) is fatally defective, and avoids the tax deed. That case was where the 34 acres owned by Elizabeth Cunningham were omitted from the assessment for the year 1883, in her name, but, without her knowledge or notice, included as an undistinguished part of a larger tract of 65 acres, and assessed in the name of John Cunningham, a former owner, returned delinquent in his name as a 65-acre tract, and sold as his. The following year her 34-acre tract was placed on the land book in her name, and was back-taxed for the year 1883. The land having been assessed and returned delinquent in the name of another with an acreage nearly twice as large as that owned by her, she could have had no notice, and the tax deed was not made valid by the curative section (now section 25, c. 31, Code). Moreover, the court held that her 34-acre tract not having been returned delinquent in her name for the year 1883, there was nothing to rebut the presumption that she had paid her taxes for that year.

We are also cited to Metz v. Starcher, 60 W. Va. 657, 56 S. E. 196, 116 Am. St. Rep. 925, which holds that there must be a delinquent list returned in order that irregularities, errors, and mistakes therein can be cured by the curative section. The heading of the paper purporting to be a delinquent list was obscured by a pasteboard securely fastened to the paper by metallic rivets, concealing the entire heading required by the statute, except a few words, and it was decided that such paper in such condition was not a delinquent list. That case has no application here.

In the case at bar there is an assessment in the proper name of the owner, Arch Male, and a delinquent list showing delinquency in Arch Male for the year 1912. It is true that the bill alleges that the delinquent list is defective because "no certificate such as is required by law is made by the sheriff of said county to said delinquent list," as appeared from an excerpt from the delinquent list filed as an exhibit. Just what is meant by "no certificate" we are unable to say. Possibly it means the oath required to be appended under section 21, c. 30 (section 1093), Code. But it will be observed that the excerpt only is before us, and not the complete delinquent list. It is not averred that no such affidavit appears on the delinquent list as returned. The only question here is whether the fact that Arch Male was returned delinquent for 19 acres instead of for 13½ acres would invalidate the tax deed. It refers solely to the discrepancy in the amount of acreage charged from what should have been charged (his true acreage), as shown by the delinquent list. Section 25, c. 31, Code, provides:

"And no irregularity, error or mistake in the delinquent list, or the return thereof; or in the affidavit thereto * * * shall, after the deed is made, invalidate or affect the sale or deed."

It also provides:

"If more than one tract of land be charged as one, or the quantity thereof * * * be misstated, all such right, title, interest and estate as is hereinbefore mentioned, shall nevertheless pass to and be vested in the grantee in such deed."

But if there was no statute curing misstatement of the quantity, could Arch Male have been misled by the fact that his land was described as containing 19 acres? The assessment and delinquent lists, respectively, show that he was assessed and returned delinquent in his own proper name for a tract of land on Laurel creek where he owned his 13½ acres, and we think the discrepancy in the acreage charged is not such an irregularity as to materially prejudice or mislead even if the curative statute did not so state. He had notice of the assessment of his land, and the excess acreage charged to him on the assessment, and its appearing on the delinquent list was sufficient to arrest his attention and impel an investigation. We have held in numerous cases that a departure from or inaccuracy in the name of the person assessed and delinquent is not sufficient to render void the tax deed. See Jarrett v. Kimbrough, 105 S. E. 918, where the name on the delinquent list and proceedings was "Norena Lambert" instead of Norma E. Lambert; Friedman v. Craig, 77 W. Va. 223, 87 S. E. 361, where the owner's name on the delinquent list appeared as "Joseph Fredman" instead of Joseph Friedman. However, there are other cases involving assessments where there have been such glaring errors in the names of the persons assessed, that they have been held to be fatal. Male v. Moore, 70 W. Va. 448, 74 S. E. 685, where the assessment was made to "Hoonbrook" when the owner's name was Hornbrook; Collins v. Reger, 62 W. Va. 195, 57 S. E. 743, where the assessment was in the name of "Martha Hedrick" instead of Martha Helmick.

These cases serve to illustrate that, if the departure or inaccuracy is only such as would put the owner on inquiry, or that a reasonable person would not be misled or deceived, then there is no fatality to the tax deed. These holdings are illuminating on the question here involved (inaccuracy in the acreage charged and returned delinquent), even if the curative statute did not expressly cure inaccuracies in the quantity of a tract. But the curative section expressly says that, if the quantity of land charged be misstated, nevertheless the title of the owner shall pass by the tax deed. That clause controls this case. The acreage need not be truly stated. It would be impossible and impracticable to do so in all cases. See Coal Co. v. Burgess, 86 W. Va. 16, 102 S. E. 690.

In Cain v. Fisher, 57 W. Va. 492, 50 S. E. 752, 1015, we held that, where the record of the sale and recital in the deed were not in accord, the purchaser at the tax sale took the entire interest of the delinquent in the lot of land, all of the lot, although it was charged on the land book and sold by the sheriff as a part of the lot (section 25, c. 31, Code), operating to cure inaccuracy in the description. And where the assessment and sale of a town lot, designated by number, was made, and the tax deed included a part of the lot designated and part of an adjoining lot owned by the delinquent, the deed was upheld under the curative section. Robey v. Wilson, 84 W. Va. 738, 101 S. E. 151.

We are of the opinion that the incorrect acreage set out in the delinquent list of 1912, being 19 acres instead of 13½ acres (the true amount), in the name of Arch Male, and alleged to have been owned by him at that time, does not alone invalidate the tax deed executed by the county clerk to defendant George, and so answer the specific question certified.

In re SERMONS' LAND. (No. 183.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 12, 1921.)

1. Mortgages  $\Leftarrow$  367—Bidder at foreclosure sale acquires no title before confirmation and may secure release for fire loss.

In view of C. S. § 2591, relating to foreclosure of mortgages or deeds of trust and sale of the land, a bidder at a mortgage foreclosure sale before confirmation acquired no interest in the property itself; and, where in the 10 days allowed for additional bids before becoming final there is a loss to the property by fire, the bidder is entitled to release.

2. Mortgages  $\Leftarrow$  340—Assignment of mortgagee's interest and power of sale held to confer power of sale on foreclosure to the assignee.

Where an assignment on the back of a land mortgage and under seal transfers both mortgagee's interest and the power of sale, such assignment and deed confer on the assignee the right of foreclosure.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Devin, Judge.

In the matter of the sale of Sermons' Land under mortgage by the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Kinston, N. C. On motion to relieve bidder from obligation to buy land which motion the clerk denied and entered an order confirming the sale. On bidder's appeal the judge reversed the clerk's action and directed a resale by the bank, and the assignor of the mortgage excepts and appeals. Cause dismissed.

Motion to relieve a bidder from obligation to buy land. Heard on appeal from clerk of the superior court before his honor, Devin, Judge, holding the courts of the Fifth judicial district on May 24, 1921.

From the facts properly presented it was made to appear that R. L. Sermons and wife having executed a mortgage with power of sale to H. L. Sermons, of date September 12, 1919, to secure three promissory notes aggregating $3,200, the mortgagee, for valuable consideration, duly assigned said notes and mortgage and the land conveyed to Merchants' Bank of Kinston, N. C., by assignment under seal, written on back of said mortgage, as follows:

"For value received, I hereby transfer and assign all my right, title, interest and estate in and to the within mortgage and the property conveyed therein to the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Kinston, N. C., including the power of sale therein contained. This December 12, 1919."

Default having been made in the payment of said note and requirements of the mortgage, the said bank sold same by proper advertisement in said county on the 18th day of April, 1921, at which Clarence Oettinger became the last and highest bidder in the sum of $4,500, and said sale was immediately reported to the clerk of superior court of the county.

It appears further that within the 10 days, where it is provided by statutes that such a sale "should not be deemed closed" (C. S. § 2591), the dwelling house on the lot, amounting to a third or more of its value, was accidentally destroyed by fire, whereupon the bidder, Clarence Oettinger, filed his petition before the clerk alleging the facts and asking that sale be rescinded and the applicant be relieved from his bid. The clerk being of opinion against the applicant entered his judgment as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard and being heard upon the petition and affidavit of Clarence Oettinger, and the court finding that the building described in the petition was a material part of the value of the premises and was destroyed by fire as set out in the affidavit, but the court being of the opinion that the destruction of said house by fire does not affect or release the petitioner's liability on his said bid and that it has no jurisdiction and is not vested with power to set aside the sale and to direct a resale, denies the petition, confirms the sale, and directs the assignee of the mortgage to collect the purchase money and execute deed to the purchaser."

On appeal by the bidder from the order, his honor, Judge Devin, reversed the action of the clerk and entered judgment as follows:

"This cause came on to be heard before W. A. Devin, Judge, upon the appeal of Clarence Oettinger, petitioner, from an order of the clerk of the superior court of Craven confirming a sale and denying petitioner's plea to withdraw his bid therein.

"This was a proceeding before the clerk in relation to sale of land under mortgage made by the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, assignee of mortgage. After due advertisement, sale was made under power contained in the mortgage and reported to the clerk. At the sale the petitioner became the last and highest bidder for the land at the price of $4,500. A material inducement to the sale and one relied on by the petitioner was the statement at the sale that a valuable dwelling house was situated on said land. After said sale and within ten days thereof and before confirmation, the dwelling house on said land was, without fault on part of petitioner, accidentally destroyed by fire. Thereupon petitioner filed his plea asking that he be allowed to rescind his bid and that the sale be not confirmed.

"The facts set forth in the petition are found by the clerk to be true, and his findings are approved by the judge.

"It therefore appearing by the admitted facts that a substantial part of the property, to wit, a third or more in value, was destroyed after sale and before confirmation, and that such fact was a material inducement for petitioner's bid and a substantial part of the consideration thereof, and that the property has been physically changed before confirmation, that the court is of the opinion that before confirmation no title had passed to petitioner and that his rights were only those of a preferred bidder, and that the loss sustained by the destruction of a portion of the property ought not to fall upon the petitioner when he had neither possession to enable him to protect it, nor title to permit him to insure it, and had only the uncertain right of a preferred proposer and the assignee of the mortgage unable to make title to the petitioner for all the property advertised and bid off by him, the court should not now confirm the sale and order him to pay the full purchase price. For these reasons the order of the clerk herein is overruled and a resale of the property according to law directed to be made."

To this judgment the assignor of the mortgage excepts and appeals to the Supreme Court. Notice waived, etc. Appeal bond given.

It is further stated in the record that upon the foregoing appeal being prayed there was no request for a stay bond by the applicant and none was fixed by the judge. Thereafter the land was advertised and sold again on the 1st day of August, 1921, when and where the former bidder, Clarence Oettinger, again became the last and highest bidder in the sum of $2,500, which bid was reported to the clerk, and after a delay of 10 days from the filing of the report, order was made that a deed be executed. No increased bid had been made.

R. A. Nunn, of Newbern, for H. L. Sermons.

Cowper, Whitaker & Allen, of Kinston, and Guion & Guion, of Newbern, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Chapter 54, § 2591, Consolidated Statutes, is as follows:

"In the foreclosure of mortgages or deeds of trust on real estate, or in the case of the public sale of real estate by an executor, administrator, or administrator with the will annexed, or by any person by virtue of the power contained in a will, the sale shall not be deemed to be closed under 10 days. If in 10 days from the date of the sale, the sale price is increased ten per cent. where the price does not exceed five hundred dollars, and five per cent. where the price exceeds five hundred dollars, and the same is paid to the clerk of the superior court, the mortgagee, trustee, executor, or person offering the real estate for sale shall reopen the sale of said property and advertise the same in the same manner as in the first instance. The clerk may, in his discretion, require the person making such advance bid to execute a good and sufficient bond in a sufficient amount to guarantee compliance with the terms of sale should the person offering the advance bid be declared the purchaser at the resale. Where the bid or offer is raised as prescribed herein, and the amount paid to the clerk, he shall issue an order to the mortgagee or other person and require him to advertise and resell said real estate. It shall only be required to give fifteen days' notice of a resale. Resales may be had as often as the bid may be raised in compliance with this section. Upon the final sale of the real estate, the clerk shall issue his order to the mortgagee or other person, and require him to make title to the purchaser. The clerk shall make all such orders as may be just and necessary to safeguard the interest of all parties, and he shall keep a record which will show in detail the amount of each bid, the purchase price, and the final settlement between parties. This section shall not apply to the foreclosure of mortgages or deeds of trust executed prior to April first, nineteen hundred and fifteen."

The section enters and must be allowed controlling effect upon every deed of trust or mortgage with power of sale executed since the date specified (see White v. Kincaid, 149 N. C. 415, 63 S. E. 109, 23 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1177, 128 Am. St. Rep. 663), and provides and intends to provide that during the 10 days as stated in the first clause the bidder acquires no interest in the property itself, but he acquires a position similar to a bidder at a judicial sale and before confirmation. This, in our opinion, follows not only as the natural meaning of the words used that the sale shall not be deemed closed under 10 days, but the position is fully confirmed by the further provision of the law that during said 10 days the matter is kept open for receipt of increased bids, and in case the stipulated increase is made, the property shall be readvertised and a second sale had; this being clearly the meaning of the law and the position of the purchaser. It is the accepted law in this state that a bidder at a judicial sale before confirmation acquires no interest in the property itself, but his bid is considered only a proposal to buy which the court may accept or reject in its discretion. In Upchurch v. Upchurch, 173 N. C. pp. 88-90, 91 S. E. 702, the court said:

"His offer is considered only as a proposition to buy at the price named, the court reserving the right to accept or reject the bid."

And in Harrell v. Blythe, 140 N. C. 415, 53 S. E. 282, quoted with approval in the Upchurch Case, the position is stated as follows:

"Where land is sold under a decree of court, the purchaser acquires no independent right. He is regarded as a mere preferred proposer until confirmation, which is the judicial sanction or the acceptance of the court, and until it is obtained, the bargain is not complete."

Under the facts presented, therefore, the bidder during the 10 days, covered by the statute, acquired no interest in the property, and in such case it is very generally held that where, pending a contract for sale of improved real estate, the buildings thereon are damaged by fire, the loss, as a rule, must fall upon the owner, and if the destruction wrought is such as make a material change in the property or substantially impair its value, specific performance will not be enforced at the instance of the vendor and the bidder will be relieved of his obligation. By the weight of authority on the subject, when there exists a binding and enforceable contract to convey, the vendor being in the present position to make title, the purchaser is regarded as the owner, and the loss must fall on him. But where the vendor has not yet obtained a title, or where the bargaining between the parties has not been such as to give the proposed purchaser any interest in the property, or the contract is otherwise incomplete, the loss, as stated, falls on the vendor, and, under the circumstances indicated, he may not insist on performance. Sutton v. Davis, 143 N. C. 474, 55 S. E. 844; Phinizy v. Guernsey, 111 Ga. 346, 36 S. E. 796, 50 L. R. A. 680, 78 Am. St. Rep. 207; Huguenin v. Courtenay, 21 S. C. 403, 53 Am. Rep. 688; Eppstein v. Kuhn, 225 Ill. 115, 80 N. E. 80, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117; Lombard v. Chicago Sinai Congregation, 64 Ill. 477; Christian v. Cabell, 22 Grat. (63 Va.) 82; Blew v. McClelland, 29 Mo. 304; Pomeroy on Contracts, §§ 434, 435; 29 American & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) pp. 712, 713. In the citation to 29 A. & E., supra, it is said:

"To the general rule that the purchaser must bear all losses there is one well-recognized exception, that if the loss occurs at a time when for any reason the contract lacks completion the vendor being in such case the owner in equity must be responsible for the loss. Thus where the loss occurs before the vendor is in a position to convey a good title, it will fall on the vendor. So also where the vendee has an option to withdraw from the contract. But to make the vendor bear the loss, he must be in some fault other than mere delay in making the deed where he has never been requested to make it."

And the principle as stated has been directly applied to the case of a bidder at a judicial sale and before confirmation. 4 Edwards' Chancery (N. Y.) p. 702; Ex parte Minor, 11 Ves. Jr. 559; 32 Eng. Repts. p. 1205; 24 Cyc. p. 34, and cases cited in note 54. As has been heretofore stated, during the 10 days where the statutes provide that the sale shall be considered unclosed and open for further bids, the applicant in the instant case is in a position exactly similar, and the building having been destroyed during that period, making a diminution in value of $2,000 in a $4,500 sale. We think his honor correctly ruled that the proposed purchaser should be relieved and a resale had under the powers contained in the deed. As well said by the presiding judge in entering his judgment to that effect:

"It therefore appearing by the admitted facts that a substantial part of the property, to wit, a third or more in value, was destroyed after sale, and that such fact was a material inducement for petitioner's bid and a substantial part of the consideration thereof, and that the property has been physically changed before confirmation, the court is of the opinion that before confirmation no title had passed to petitioner, and that his rights were only those of a preferred bidder, and that the loss sustained by the destruction of a portion of the property ought not to fall upon the petitioner when he had neither possession to enable him to protect it, nor title to permit him to insure it, and had only the uncertain right of a preferred proposer."

[2] While we hold that the same should be set aside at the instance of the bidder, we are of the opinion that on the record neither the clerk nor the judge on appeal from him had jurisdiction or power on the bidder's mere application to make any orders affecting the rights of the parties in the premises. The power of foreclosure by advertisement and sale of the mortgagee or trustee fills a useful and important place in our business life and should not be interfered with except to the extent expressly provided by law. The statutes, section 2591, as we have seen, in express terms provides that any and all sales of this character shall remain "unclosed for ten days," but it confers no power on the clerk to make any orders in the matter except in case of an increase of bid, nor is any report required to be made in any other instance. That and that alone is the basis for his interference in sales of this kind. It might be well in the case presented the law should give the clerk jurisdiction to make the order that justice and right would require. But thus far the statutes have not done so, and we are not at liberty to go beyond the statutory provision. We consider it not improper to say, however, that as the parties have gone on and had another sale in which the same purchaser became the last and highest bidder, with or without orders of the clerk, this was the proper course to pursue, and if the facts are as now admitted, no court would make other disposition of the matter.

And inasmuch as the assignment written on the back of the mortgage and under seal transfers both the interest of the mortgagee and the power of sale as well as the property contained in the mortgage, such assignment and deed clearly confers the right of foreclosure on the bank, the assignee. Well & Bros. v. Davis, 168 N. C. 298, 84 S. E. 395. The case is thus distinguished from Williams v. Teachey, 85 N. C. 402, and that class of cases, in which it was held that as the assignment did not purport to pass the property itself, the power of sale and right of foreclosure remained in the mortgagee. Being of the opinion that on the record and a proper interpretation of the statutes the clerk and the judge on appeal from him are without jurisdiction to make orders and decrees in the matter, we must hold that the appeal and other proceedings be dismissed. But we have deemed it not improper to express an opinion on the facts contained in the record, a course pursued by the court in exceptional instances where the importance and general interest in the question presented make it desirable. Gilbert v. Shingle Co., 167 N. C. 287-290, 83 S. E. 337; Milling Co. v. Finlay, 110 N. C. 411, 15 S. E. 4; State v. Wylde, 110 N. C. 500, 15 S. E. 5.

This will be certified that the cause be dismissed.

Dismissed.

UNION TRUST CO. v. WILSON.
(No. 256.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 12, 1921.)

1. Pleading  $\S$  214(1)—Demurrer admits material facts pleaded.

A demurrer admits material facts alleged in pleading demurred to.

2. Pleading  $\S$  192(6)—Demurrer containing extraneous facts in its support bad.

A demurrer setting up extraneous facts in support thereof, not appearing on the face of the complaint demurred to, should be overruled, since it is the office of the demurrer merely to raise questions of law as to the sufficiency of the pleading, to be determined under the facts alleged in the pleading.

3. Pleading  $\S$  214(3)—Allegation that plaintiff was an innocent holder of note admitted by demurrer.

Where complaint in action on notes alleged plaintiff to be an innocent holder, demurrer thereto on the ground that plaintiff is not an innocent holder held properly overruled, since the allegation of complaint as to plaintiff being an innocent holder was admitted by the demurrer.

4. Parties  $\S$  7(2)—Transferee of notes as trustee for others could sue thereon.

Under C. S.  $\S$  449, authorizing a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another to sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the contract is made, one to whom notes were transferred as trustee for others could sue thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Connor, Judge.

Action by the Union Trust Company against J. F. Willson. From judgment overruling demurrer to complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover the amount of two negotiable promissory notes executed by the defendant, each of them in the sum of $5,000 (dated March 30, 1920), and payable to the order of the maker 12 months after their date, and indorsed by the defendant, the maker thereof, in blank and before maturity and delivered to the Harnett County Trust Company. It is alleged in the complaint:

"That thereafter before maturity, for valuable consideration and without notice of any defect or infirmity in or respecting said notes, the Harnett County Trust Company, of Lillington, N. C., purchased and became the holder in due course of said notes."

It is further alleged that thereafter, for value and before maturity of the notes, plaintiff became the bona fide holder, in due course, of the same by transfer from the said Harnett County Trust Company, and was at the commencement of this action the bona fide holder thereof in due course, for full value and without notice. That the said notes are past due and unpaid, and that defendant is indebted to the plaintiff thereon in the sum of $10,000, with interest from March 30, 1920, for which sum plaintiff demands judgment.

The agreement referred to in the complaint states that the Harnett County Trust Company agreed with plaintiff and the holders of certain certificates of deposit in the Harnett County Trust Company to the amount of $68,000; that the latter would assign and deliver to the plaintiff the said certificates to be held in trust by it for the benefit and use of the parties named in the agreement, and when they are delivered to the trustee, the Harnett County Trust Company should transfer and deliver to the said trustee certain notes, particularly described in the agreement which were acquired and held as aforesaid, in due course, for value, and without notice, by it to a corresponding amount; that the trustee should collect the notes so delivered to him, with power to sue for the same, if necessary, and employ counsel at a reasonable rate of compensation for that purpose and when all the notes are collected, or compromised and settled by the trustee with the consent of the certificate holders, and after deducting necessary expenses incurred by him in the execution of his trust, including his fees and allowances as may be approved by the clerk of the superior court of Wake county the trustee shall distribute the balance of the funds so collected by him to and among the certificate holders aforesaid; that the two notes, the subject of this action, were included in those acquired by the trustee in the manner above stated, the Harnett County Trust Company being the holder in due course thereof when they were transferred before their maturity to the trustee, and having no notice of any defect or infirmity therein, or any equity in favor of defendant existing in respect thereto.

The defendant demurred as follows:

"(1) Because it appears from the complaint and exhibits that the notes sued on in this action are the property of the Harnett County Trust Company that issued its time deposit certificate for said notes.

"(2) That defendant has started his suit against said Harnett County Trust Company in the county of Franklin, said suit having been started on February 5, 1921, and said action is now pending in said county of Franklin for the purpose of vacating and setting aside said notes for fraud, and for the fact that said Harnett County Trust Company was not an innocent purchaser for value without notice, and a holder in due course.

"(3) That said complaint and exhibits show a combination between said Harnett County Trust Company and the holders of its certificates of deposit, when not one cent has ever been paid by said Trust Company, nor have they surrendered their title to property in said notes, if they have any; but it appears that plaintiff is only a collecting agent and attorney for said trust company.

"(4) That the holders of said certificates of deposit are parties to this action by and through their agent and attorney, the plaintiff herein, when they have no cause of action whatever against this defendant.

"(5) It appears that plaintiff company is not a holder in due course or an innocent purchaser for value without notice, but merely an agent to collect the Harnett County Trust Company claims, if it indeed has any."

The court overruled the demurrer, and defendant appealed.

W. M. Person, of Loulsburg, for appellant.
J. M. Broughton, of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is an established principle, not now open to question, that a demurrer by a defendant admits as true every material fact alleged in the complaint which is properly pleaded (Crane Co. v. L. & T. Co., 177 N. C. 346, 99 S. E. 8; Merrimon v. Paving Co., 142 N. C. 539, 55 S. E. 366, 8 L. R. A. [N. S.] 574), and this is equally true of a demurrer to an answer, or other pleading. The demurrer, in this instance, calls to its aid facts stated therein which do not appear on the face of the complaint and is generally denominated a "speaking demurrer." In Von Glahn v. De Rossett, 76 N. C. 292, 294, Chief Justice Pearson so characterizes it in this passage taken from his opinion:

"The second ground of demurrer is subject to another objection. It is a 'speaking demurrer,' as styled by the books. That is, in order to sustain itself, the aid of a fact not appearing upon the complaint is invoked. Whether there be any fund left on hand at the expiration of the charter of the bank is a question of fact that cannot be inquired into upon demurrer, which raises only an issue of law in regard to the cause of action set out in the complaint."

And to like effect is 6 Enc. of Pl. & Practice, p. 297, where it is said by the author, citing the authorities:

"It is not the office of the demurrer to set out facts; it involves only such facts as are alleged in the pleading demurred to, and raises only questions of law as to the sufficiency of the pleading, which arise upon the face thereof. It is a fundamental rule of pleading that a demurrer will only lie for defects which appear upon the face of the pleading to which it is opposed, and must be decided without evidence aliunde, unless (as said in some cases) by consent of the parties. A speaking demurrer—that is, a demurrer which is founded on matter collateral to the pleading against which it is directed—is bad, and as such will be overruled. It is also a well-settled principle that, when a pleading is demurred to, resort cannot be had to other pleadings for the purpose of supporting or resisting the demurrer, but the demurrer must prevail or fall by the face of the pleading to which it is directed."

81 Cyc. 322, holds that—

"Only facts appearing on the face of the pleading demurrer to will be considered on demurrer. New facts cannot be set up by the demurrant as a ground for demurrer. Such a demurrer is called a 'speaking demurrer,' and should be overruled. So the scope of the demurrer cannot be extended to cover facts not appearing on the face of the pleading demurred to."

Illustrations of a speaking demurrer will be found in the following cases: Express Co. v. Briggs, 1 Ga. App. 294, 57 S. E. 1066; Peale v. Ware, 131 Ga. 826, 63 S. E. 581; L. & N. R. Co. v. Holland, 132 Ga. 173, 63 S. E. 898. Some of the other cases in this state are Davison v. Gregory, 132 N. C. 389, 43 S. E. 916; Wood v. Kincaid, 144 N. C. 393, 57 S. E. 4; Kendall v. Highway Com'rs, 165 N. C. 600, 81 S. E. 995; Bessellew v. Brown, 177 N. C. 65, 97 S. E. 743, 2 A. L. R. 862. We held in Wood v. Kincaid, supra:

"A demurrer is an objection that the pleading against which it is directed is insufficient in law to support the action or defense, and that the demurrant should not therefore be required to further plead. It is not its office to set out facts, but it must stand or fall by the facts as alleged in the opposing pleading, and it can raise only questions of law as to their sufficiency. It is a fundamental rule of law that a demurrer will only lie for defects which appear upon the face of the alleged defective pleading, and extraneous or collateral facts stated in the demurrer cannot be considered in deciding upon its validity. A demurrer averring any fact not stated in the pleading which is attacked, commonly called a 'speaking demurrer,' is never allowable"—citing 6 Pl. and Pr. 296 et seq.; Von Glahn v. De Rossett, 76 N. C. 292.

We also held in Bessellew v. Brown, supra (opinion by Justice Hoke), that—

"Where the complaint in an action by the receiver of an insolvent corporation against its directors alleges a good cause of action for damages arising from their negligence in managing the corporate affairs, a demurrer may not be aided by allegations of facts not therein appearing, for such would be a speaking demurrer, condemned both under the common-law and Code systems of pleadings."

A good statement of the law on this question will be found in So. Express Co. v. Briggs, supra, where it was said that a speaking demurrer is one that introduces some new fact or averment necessary to support the demurrer, and which does not distinctly appear on the face of the pleading against which it is directed. Peale v. Ware, supra, held that a demurrer negating a fact material to the cause of action is faulty, and should be overruled.

[2, 3] If the demurrer in this case is examined in the light of the foregoing authorities, it will appear that it clearly comes within the condemnation of the rule we have stated, and which has long been a settled one. The first ground of demurrer is untenable, as it does not appear from the complaint and exhibits, "that the Harnett County Trust Company is the owner of the notes sued on in this action," but the contrary appears, the Harnett County Trust Company having parted with its interest, as alleged in the complaint, and for a valuable consideration, to the plaintiff as trustee for the certificate holders. The second ground of demurrer, in direct violation of the rule, sets up extraneous facts in support of itself, such as are not alleged in the complaint, but are aliunde. It does not appear from the complaint, nor otherwise except by allegations of the demurrer, that defendant has brought an action in Franklin county to set aside the notes mentioned in this suit. We have already disposed of the remaining ground of objection, viz. that plaintiff is not an innocent holder. It is alleged in the complaint that he is, and the demurrer in law admits it.

The third ground of demurrer is equally untenable, because it states facts not alleged in the complaint, and cannot therefore be considered under the rule of the law as to speaking demurrers.

[4] The fourth ground of demurrer contains an erroneous statement of fact, as the holders of the certificates are not parties to this action, the plaintiff suing alone, as the trustee of an express trust, and within the meaning of the statute (Consol. Statutes, § 449), the designation "includes a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another." Wynne v. Heck, 92 N. C. 414; Willey v. Gatling, 70 N. C. 410; Martin v. Mask, 158 N. C. at page 443, 74 S. E. 343, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 641.

The last ground assigned in the demurrer must be held as invalid, because the demurrer admits, as a fact, the allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff is the holder of the notes, in due course, for value, and without notice of any equity or infirmity attaching to them in favor of the defendant, who is the promisor in both notes, and it appears from the complaint, according to the allegations thereof, which are to be taken as admitted by the demurrer (Bank v. Mfg. Co., 176 N. C. 318, 97 S. E. 1; Ollis v. Drexel Furniture Co., 173 N. C. 542, 92 S. E. 371) that the plaintiff is not suing as agent, but as a trustee of an express trust, which includes within its meaning, as we have already stated, a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another.

This disposes of all the grounds of demurrer adversely to the defendant, and accordingly there was no error in the judge overruling the same.

Affirmed.

TAYLOR v. POSTAL LIFE INS. CO. et al.
(No. 174.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 12, 1921.)

1. Pleading  $\S$  218(3)—In case of misjoinder of parties and causes, demurrer will be sustained; separation not being permissible.

Where there is a misjoinder of both parties and causes of action, a demurrer to the pleading will be sustained, and a separation or division in such a case is not permissible, under C. S. § 516.

2. Set-off and counterclaim  $\S$  29(2)—In action on a life insurance policy, counterclaim held not on independent matter.

In an action against a life insurance company and others to recover on policy on the life of plaintiff's deceased brother assigned to plaintiff, a counterclaim by the widow of insured, asking for an accounting with plaintiff as to land alleged to have been purchased by the brothers in common and taken in plaintiff's name under agreement that it would be conveyed to the deceased in consideration of the assignment of the policy, was not on unrelated or independent subject-matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Horton, Judge.

Action by W. A. Taylor against the Postal Life Insurance Company and others to recover on an insurance policy on the life of plaintiff's brother, J. C. Taylor, in which the deceased's widow asked for accounting and adjustment of matters between the deceased and plaintiff. Demurrer to counterclaim for misjoinder of parties and causes overruled, and the defendants paid the amount of the policy into court, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The widow of deceased denies the right of plaintiff to receive the proceeds of said policy of insurance and has set up by way of cross-action and counterclaim that the plaintiff and his brother purchased certain lands in common and that in their partnership dealings the policy in question was assigned upon condition that the said W. A. Taylor would convey to J. C. Taylor two tracts of land held by him in trust for their mutual benefit. Defendant further alleges that plaintiff neglected to make such conveyance during the lifetime of her husband and that he now refuses to carry out his part of the contract. Wherefore she asks for an accounting and an adjustment of these matters before plaintiff is allowed to collect said insurance.

Plaintiff demurred to the counterclaim upon the ground of a misjoinder of parties and causes of action. His honor overruled the demurrer, and by consent permitted the insurance company to relieve itself from further liability by paying the amount of its policy into court, and it was ordered that said funds be held by the clerk to await the final determination of the issues raised by the pleadings.

Skinner & Whedbee, of Greenville, for appellant.

Julius Brown, of Greenville, for appellees.

STACY, J. [1] It has been held with us in a uniform line of decisions that, where there is a misjoinder of both parties and causes of action in the same pleading, a demurrer for this reason will be sustained, and that a separation or division in such a case is not permissible under O. S. § 518. Rose v. Warehouse Co., 108 S. E. 389, at present term; Roberts v. Mfg. Co., 181 N. C. 204, 106 S. E. 664, and cases there cited.

[2] But, as said in Quarry Co. v. Construction Co., 151 N. C. 345, 66 S. E. 217:

"If the grounds of the bill be not entirely distinct and wholly unconnected, if they arise out of one and the same transaction or series of transactions, forming one course of dealing and tending to one end, if one connected story can be told of the whole, then the objection cannot apply. Bedsole v. Monroe, 40 N. C. 313.

"The plaintiff may unite in the same complaint several causes of action when they arise out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action, the purpose being to extend the right of the plaintiff to join actions, not merely by including equitable as well as legal causes of action, but to make the ground broad enough to cover all causes of action which the plaintiff may have against the defendant arising out of the same subject of action, so that the court may not be forced 'to take two bites at a cherry,' but may dispose of the whole subject of controversy and its incidents and corollaries in one action. Hamlin v. Tucker, 72 N. C. 502."

Applying these principles, we do not think the causes of action set out in the defendant's answer and counterclaim are so unrelated and independent of each other as to make the pleading defective for multifariousness. All the matters sought to be adjudicated arise out of the same transaction, or series of transactions which make one composite whole. The final adjustment of the insurance money is linked with the settlement of these items and with the estate. Under O. S. § 507, such causes may be united in the same complaint. Oyster v. Mining Co., 140 N. C. 135, 52 S. E. 198; Fisher v. Ins. Co., 138 N. C. 224, 50 S. E. 659.

Therefore, upon authority, we think the action of his honor in overruling the demurrer and refusing to strike out the defendant's further defense and counterclaim must be sustained.

Affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. COMMISSIONERS OF FRANKLIN COUNTY. (No. 250.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 12, 1921.)

Taxation ~~§~~476—County commissioners, having made horizontal reduction in assessed valuation, precluded from proceeding under other methods of revising valuation under statute providing for use of other method in lieu of method first used.

Where county commissioners made a horizontal reduction in assessed value of real estate at its meeting held on Tuesday following the first Monday in April, under Pub. Laws 1921, c. 38, § 28(a), and certified its recommendation to and obtained the approval of the state tax commissioner, and did not, prior to July 15th, report to state tax commission any increases or reductions in the valuation of specific property, under section 28(b), they could not thereafter revise the valuation of specific parcels of property under section 28(c), authorizing the commissioners, "in lieu of the remedies provided" under subsections (a) and (b), to appoint board of review to revise assessed valuation, and to make a complete abstract of revised assessment to state tax commission not later than July 15th, in view of section 28(d).

Appeal from Supreme Court, Franklin County; Bond, Judge.

Action by J. R. Williams and others, taxpayers of Franklin County, to restrain the Board of County Commissioners of Franklin County from revaluation and raising the levy of taxes after the date prescribed by law. The restraining order was granted. The motion to dissolve was refused, and the restraining order was continued to the final hearing. Appeal by defendants. Affirmed.

W. H. Yarborough and Ben T. Holden, both of Louisburg, for appellants.

W. M. Person, of Louisburg, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant board of commissioners of Franklin county, in accordance with the provisions of Laws 1921, c. 38, met on Tuesday after the first Monday in April, 1921, and after inquiry and investigation as to the value of the real estate in said county, recommended the value be reduced by a horizontal reduction of 40 per cent, applicable to the whole county. Their recommendation was certified to the state tax commission under section 28(a) and approved by the state tax commissioner June 15, 1921; was the same day certified to the defendant board of county commissioners. Thereafter on the second Monday in July, 1921, the defendant county commissioners met as a board of equalization for the purpose of hearing complaints and equalizing values in the various localities. There being a number of complaints, the commissioners, in order to ascertain more fully the values in the different localities, passed a resolution to inspect such parcels of real estate in company with the various tax listers or other freeholders residing in their respective townships, and after making such investigations the commissioners on July 26 issued 904 notices to taxpayers in 2 townships in which they had made an increase of approximately a million and a half dollars in valuation to another township in which they had made an increase of $10,000, and to taxpayers in the 3 towns of Youngsville, Franklin, and Loupsburg in which there had also been increases in taxation, to show cause against the increase on August 2, but no notices were sent out to any taxpayers in any other townships. There are 10 townships in Franklin county. Why this discrimination does not appear.

The ground upon which Judge Devin granted the restraining order and Judge Bond refused to dissolve the same and continued the restraining order to the final hearing and upon which this court is asked to affirm rests chiefly, if not entirely, upon the proposition that the county commissioners acted without authority in attempting to revalue the property in the parts of the county above designated at a time when they were functus officio.

Laws 1921, c. 38, § 28(a), authorizes the board of county commissioners on Tuesday after the first Monday in April, 1921, acting as a board of review, to make a horizontal reduction throughout the county, if, in their judgment, they find that the assessed value is in excess of the actual value. At such meeting the board of commissioners made a horizontal cut of 40 per cent. as above stated, which was certified to the state tax commission "not later than April 20, 1921"; and the state tax commission approved said horizontal reduction, and certified their approval to the county commissioners "not later than June 15," as the statute provides. This section further provides that this horizontal reduction "shall be the values at which the property shall be assessed for taxation unless and until the same have been changed and revised by the state tax commission, and certified to the board of county commissioners of such county, which shall be done not later than July 1, 1921." This was certified as above stated on June 15.

Section 28(b) of said chapter 38 further provides that the county commissioners shall have authority to hear specific complaints of overvaluation or undervaluation of any particular tracts of land if the complaint is made and the reassessment and reappraisal by the board was made during the month of May. This was not done during May as to any of the property affected by the revaluation as to which this injunction is served.

Said section 28 (b) further provides that the county commissioners may appoint the county auditor or any resident freeholder of the county to investigate and report upon all such specific complaints, and provides:

"The county board of commissioners shall thereupon approve or revise such recommendations, and shall, not later than the fifteenth day of July, 1921, make report to the state tax commission of the increases and reductions in the valuation of specific properties made under authority of this section."

Said chapter 38, § 28 (c), provides that—

If the board of commissioners at their regular meeting on first Monday in April, 1921, "shall be of the opinion that the valuation of real estate in such counties is so unequal as between the owners of real property in such county as to require a more general revision of assessments than is practicable to be made under the provision of subsections (a) and (b) of this section"—that is, by horizontal reduction as was made, and by specific complaint which should have been filed in May—"or the value of real property as heretofore appraised in such county as a whole is in excess of the present actual value of such property, it may by resolution so find and order that such revision be made. In the event such order is made, it shall be in lieu of the remedies provided in subsections (a) and (b) of this section, and the board of county commissioners shall appoint a board of review, composed of three resident freeholders, who have general knowledge of the value of real estate in such county, and such board of review may appoint such number of assistants as in their judgment is necessary to complete such revision, not later than the first day of July, 1921."

Then follows the manner in which they should execute their duties, which as above provided should be completed "not later than the first day of July, 1921." This section further provides:

"A complete abstract of such revised assessment, by townships, giving average value per acre, and value of town lots, and the value as a whole, shall be made to the board of county commissioners of such county and to the state tax commission, not later than the fifteenth day of July, 1921, and shall be subject to the authority of the state tax commission as the state board of equalization, so as to preserve a proper equalized value of real property in the several counties."

Section 28 (d) provides that—

"The report of the board of county commissioners, made pursuant to section 28(b), and the abstracts as reported by the board of review, under section 28(c) shall be the basis for the assessment of taxes, unless and until the same are changed by the tax commission on or before the first day of September, 1921, and the said state tax commission, shall, on or before the first day of September, 1921, certify down to the board of county commissioners of the several counties its findings and conclusions upon said report and abstracts."

It will be seen by perusal of the above provisions of the statute that section 28 (a) authorized the county commissioners on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in April to make a horizontal reduction of the valuation throughout the county and report the same to the state tax commission not later than April 20, 1921, and that said commission shall act upon said report, and that said values shall be the values assessed for taxation unless changed by the state tax commission, who shall certify down their action not later than July 1, 1921. The action of the county commissioners in making a 40 per cent. reduction was approved and certified to defendants June 15.

Then section 28 (b) provides that during May specific complaints may be made as to the valuation of any particular tract of real estate, after the general equalization order provided for in the preceding section shall have been made, and the board during the month of May may act upon such complaints and shall report any modifications thereby made in the general order and shall report such modifications "not later than July 15" to the tax commission.

That not having been done, the attempt of the board on the 2d of August, 1921, to make increases of over one and a half million dollars in the valuation for taxation of the property of 904 taxpayers in 3 townships and 3 towns was without authority of law, and the restraining order was properly granted by Judge Devin, and the refusal to dissolve the same by Judge Bond must be affirmed.

The defendants, however, contend that they acted under section 28(c), which authorized the county commissioners when they "shall be of the opinion that the valuation of real estate in such county is so unequal as between the owners of real property in such county as to require a more general revision of assessments than is practicable to be made under the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of this section"—that is, by a general horizontal reduction and by specific complaints—they "may by resolution so find and order that such revision be made. In the event such order is made, it shall be in lieu of the remedies provided in subsections (a) and (b) of this section." It is therefore an alternative remedy which the commissioners might have elected to adopt at their meeting on Tuesday after the first Monday in April. But having adopted the other system of "horizontal reduction and specific complaints," they could not in July proceed to act under subsection (c). Even if they could do so, it would be necessary for them to set aside their horizontal reduction of 40 per cent. as to the entire county, though it had been approved by the state tax commission, and then proceed under subsection (c) in lieu thereof.

There is this further insuperable objection that if subsection (c) had chosen as the alternative to the "horizontal reduction and specific complaints" the Legislature provided that proceedings thereunder should be completed "not later than July 1, 1921," and that the county commissioners should make their report of such revision under subsection (c) to the tax commission "not later than July 15, 1921," and that body should certify down their action on or before September 1, 1921.

On Tuesday after the first Monday in April, the board of commissioners had their election to proceed by a general horizontal reduction and specific complaints, which they did, and which has been approved by the state tax commission.

Or, they might have chosen then to have proceeded under subsection (c) under which the work could be completed "not later than July 1," and reported "not later than July 15" to the tax commission, which was practicable.

They chose the first method. When, becoming dissatisfied with that, they attempted in August to proceed under subsection (c), they had no authority to set aside the horizontal reduction which had received the approval of the state tax commission, for they were functus officio, and it was too late because the statute was specific that the revision should be complete "not later than July 1" and reported to the state tax commission "not later than July 15."

There are some circumstances under which a requirement that a certain act shall be done on a date named may be treated as directory, but that is not possible when the statute conferring a power provides that it shall be performed "not later than" the time specified.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

DRAINAGE COM'RS OF MATTAMUSKEET DIST., IN HYDE COUNTY, v. DAVIS, Sheriff. (No. 25.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 5, 1921.)

1. Drains  $\S$  88—Sheriff entitled to only 2 per cent. commission for collection of drainage assessments; "taxes;" "taxes, licenses, or privileges."

A drainage district not being a political subdivision of the state, as is a county or township, nor a special tax district, as are school districts, and drainage assessments, under Pub. Laws 1911, c. 67, § 12, being subordinate to the lien of taxes, such assessments are not "taxes, licenses, or privileges," within C. S. § 8042, granting sheriffs 5 per cent. of all taxes, licenses, and privileges collected by them for state, county, township, school district, "or other purposes whatsoever," but local assessments, imposed, not as public burdens for general revenue, but with reference to special benefits to the property assessed, so that, while a sheriff, by the general policy of the state to pay for services rendered, is entitled to commissions on the collection of drainage assessments, even though Pub. Laws 1909, c. 442, § 36, providing that officers performing services for which compensation is not specially provided shall receive pay therefor as in other like cases, was repealed by Pub. Laws 1917, c. 152, § 2, his compensation for collecting drainage assessments, whether for maintenance or construction purposes, in view of C. S. § 5349, authorizing the board of drainage commissioners to levy maintenance assessments on lands benefited in the same manner and proportion as the original construction assessments were made, and Pub. Laws 1911, c. 67, §§ 8-12, directing the collection of construction assessments by the same officer and in the same manner as state and county taxes, is limited to 2 per cent. of the amount of the "drainage tax" collected, as authorized by C. S. § 5369; the expression "or other purposes whatsoever," in section 8042, referring to "taxes" like those previously enumerated, not for special benefits to land, but for defraying the cost of government, and section 5369, allowing 2 per cent. "for collecting drainage assessments as hereinbefore described," being a legislative construction of section 5369, as including the maintenance assessments provided for in section 5349 preceding.

Though the court is not bound by a legislative construction of a statute, it can be called in aid and considered with the other facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hyde County; Bond, Judge.

Controversy submitted without action between the Drainage Commissioners of Mattamuskeet District, in Hyde County, and Thos. D. Davis, Sheriff. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

This is a controversy between the board of drainage commissioners of Mattamuskeet district, in Hyde county, and Thos. D. Davis, sheriff of said county, submitted without action upon agreed facts. It is admitted that plaintiff is a duly constituted drainage corporation, and that defendant was sheriff of Hyde county during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919, and charged with the duty of collecting assessments for construction and maintenance of the drainage system levied in said drainage district. No controversy exists as to compensation for collecting assessments levied for payment of bonds issued for construction work, but it arises only with respect to commissions on the assessments levied annually for maintenance.

By chapter 509, Laws 1909, the State Board of Education, by virtue of its ownership of Mattamuskeet Lake and other lands near it, was authorized to join in the petition to establish the drainage district, the corporate name of which was "Board of Drainage Commissioners of Mattamuskeet Lake." Section 3. The Board of Education did join in the petition (Carter v. Com'rs, 156 N. C. 183, 72 S. E. 380), and subsequently sold to the Southern Land Reclamation Company (Carter v. Com'rs, supra; Caravan v. Com'rs, 161 N. C. 100, 76 S. E. 681; Gibbs v. Com'rs, 175 N. C. 5, 94 S. E. 695; Mann v. Mann, 176 N. C. 353, 97 S. E. 175).

The drainage district has issued bonds and levied assessments to maintain the district. No question is presented as to the legality of the bond issues or the maintenance assessments. The defendant, being the sheriff and tax collector of Hyde county, whose compensation is not fixed by salary, collected all these assessments for the years 1917, 1918, and 1919, gave bond for their collection, has paid the same to the treasurer of the county; his accounts have been audited, and for his services and responsibility he retained—and his act in this respect was approved by the court below—the commissions fixed by law, as he contends. It is admitted in paragraph 3 of the facts agreed that the defendant, as sheriff, collected the maintenance assessments and accounted for the same less his commissions. It is to recover these retained commissions that this action is brought. The contention of the plaintiff is that "no provision is specifically made for any compensation or commission to the sheriff for the collection of maintenance assessments, and that defendant is not entitled to any commission on this maintenance fund." The power to make the assessments is not denied; the obligation resting upon the sheriff to collect is not denied; nor is it denied that the sheriff's failure to collect would subject him to liability. The specific and only question involved here, and for the court's consideration, is: Was the sheriff of Hyde county entitled to receive commissions on collections of assessments levied exclusively for maintenance purposes by the commissioners of said drainage district for the years 1917, 1918, and 1919, and, if any, then what commissions? The sheriff has collected and paid to the treasurer of the county these maintenance assessments, less his commission. The plaintiffs insist that the sheriff is obliged to make these collections without compensation, and is suing to recover the commissions unlawfully retained by the sheriff.

The plaintiff, board of commissioners, contends that he was not entitled to such commissions. The defendant, sheriff, contends that he was entitled to 5 per cent. commissions. The court below held with defendant, and gave judgment accordingly. Plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Spencer & Spencer, of Swan Quarter, and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellants.

Mann & Mann, of Swan Quarter, and Manning, Bickett & Ferguson, of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The Mattamuskeet drainage district was created and organized under chapter 442, Laws 1909. The provisions of chapter 509, Laws 1909, are not material here. After the completion of the improvement, it came under control of the board of drainage commissioners upon whom was expressly imposed the duty to keep it in good repair, for which purpose the Commissioners were authorized to "levy an assessment on the lands benefited * * * in the same manner and in the same proportion as the original assessments were made." Laws 1909, c. 442, § 29; C. S. § 5349.

It will be noted that in the General Drainage Act of 1909, c. 442, the first section which authorizes an assessment to provide funds for any work in the district, is section 29, giving the power to levy assessments for maintenance, "in the same manner and in the same proportion as the original assessments were made. It is clear that the expression "original assessments" refers to those made for construction work, or to pay bonds issued for construction work, as provided for in sections 31, 32, 34 of chapter 442, Acts 1909. These sections provide for collection of assessments for construction work "by the same officers as the state and county taxes are collected." Laws 1909, c. 442, § 34. The Legislative Act of 1909 is silent on the subject of compensation to the sheriff or tax collector charged with the duty of collecting these assessments.

That the Legislature could impose the duty to collect this fund upon the sheriffs and tax collectors without permitting them to charge a commission thereon seems to have been settled. Commissioners v. Stedman, 141 N. C. 448, 54 S. E. 269; Fortune v. Commissioners, 140 N. C. 322, 52 S. E. 950. It is evident that in the legislative mind was the purpose and intent that this beneficent law designed to reclaim vast areas of naturally fertile lands for the uses of mankind, and to promote the health of the people, should be economically administered, and that the amount to be raised by assessments should be available for the public benefit, planned, and contemplated, without diminution by incidental expenses in payment of commissions to existing or future office holders, for whom already was provided compensation sufficient to allure. The law being written as recited, sheriffs and tax collectors were without express authority to have deducted any commissions from these assessments, but in the act can be found clearly implied authority to this effect. The Legislature of 1911 amended the General Drainage Act of 1909. Laws 1911, c. 67. The act of 1911 does not change section 29 of chapter 442, Acts 1909; but does strike out sections 31, 32, 33, and 34 of the act of 1909, and insert new sections in lieu thereof. Acts 1911, c. 67, §§ 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12. These new sections provide for the collection of assessments for construction, or the payment of principal and interest on construction bonds issued, and direct that these assessments shall be collected by the same officers and in the same manner as state and county taxes are collected. Acts 1911, c. 67, §§ 8, 12.

Next in order comes section 13 of the act of 1911, for the first time making express provision for any commission or fee, as follows:

"Sec. 13. That the fee allowed the sheriff or other county tax collector for collecting the drainage tax as prescribed in section thirty-four of chapter four hundred and forty-two of the Public Laws of one thousand nine hundred and nine shall be two per cent. of the amount collected, and the fee allowed the county treasurer for disbursing the revenue obtained from the sale of the drainage bonds shall be one per cent. of the amount disbursed: Provided, no fee shall be allowed the sheriff or other county tax collector or county treasurer for collecting or receiving the revenue obtained from the sale of the bonds provided for in section thirty-four of chapter four hundred and forty-two of the Public Laws of one thousand nine hundred and nine, nor for disbursing the revenue raised for paying off the said bonds: Provided, further, that in those counties where the sheriff or tax collector and treasurer are on a salary basis, no fees whatever shall be allowed for collecting or disbursing the funds of the drainage district."

tion that it was the legislative intent that no longer, if before it had been relied on, should there be any warrant for the contention that the provisions of section 5245 of the Revisal of 1905 (now section 8042 of Consolidated Statutes) applied to drainage assessments, entitling sheriffs or tax collectors to 5 per cent. commissions on assessments collected, but that the compensation to be paid for collection and disbursement should be limited to that prescribed in the act of 1911, to wit: That, for collecting the larger assessments required for construction work, the sheriff should receive 2 per cent. of the amount collected, and that for disbursing the proceeds of a bond sale the treasurer should receive a commission of 1 per cent. But we consider the inference as clear that it was the legislative intent that, for collecting the small annual assessments for maintenance, there should be commissions allowed, though not as much as 5 per cent. But more of this hereafter.

The judgment rendered decrees that defendant, Davis, as tax collector for Hyde county, is entitled "out of the funds collected by him (from assessments) for maintenance of the said drainage district, the same compensation provided by law for collection of 'state, township, school districts or other purposes whatsoever,'" making express reference to section 5245, Revisal of 1905. Upon what theory can this judgment be wholly sustained?

Section 5245 of the Revisal (now section 8042 of Consol. Statutes) was a part of the chapter of the Revisal of 1905 dealing with taxes. This provision is brought forward in Consol. Statutes of North Carolina under the chapter entitled "Taxation." The language of section 5245 of the Revisal of 1905 referred to in the judgment is that "the sheriffs and tax collectors shall receive 5 per cent. on all taxes, licenses and privileges collected by them for state, county, township school district, or other purposes whatsoever," as already stated. Prior to 1905 the commissions allowed to sheriffs for collecting county taxes were fixed at the same per cent. as for the collection of public taxes payable to the treasurer of the state. Code 1883, § 723. The commissions deductible in settlement of state taxes were 5 per cent. on the amount collected. Acts 1903, c. 251, § 92. In 1904 a controversy arose in Iredell county as to whether the sheriff was entitled to commissions on the school tax collected. Board of Education v. Board of Com'rs, 137 N. C. 63, 49 S. E. 47.

The Legislature of 1905 thereafter wrote into the law the language:

"That the sheriffs and tax collectors shall receive 5 per cent. on all taxes, licenses and privileges collected by them for state, county, township school district, or other purpose whatsoever." Acts 1905, c. 590, § 91; Acts 1907, c. 258, § 91; Revisal of 1905, § 5245; C. S. c. 131, § 8042.

But drainage districts such as this one are not political subdivisions of the state, as is a county or township; neither are they special tax districts, as are the school districts. These assessments are not "taxes, licenses, or privileges," even though they be so styled by the Legislature itself. They are local assessments, "and made with reference to special benefits derived from the property assessed for the expenditures, while taxes are public burdens, imposed as burdens for the purpose of general revenue." Shuford v. Com'rs, 86 N. C. 552; Sanderlin v. Luken, 152 N. C. 738, 68 S. E. 225; Com'rs v. Webb, 160 N. C. 594, 76 S. E. 552. By the very language and provisions of the act under which these assessments may be levied, they are subordinate, as liens, to the lien of taxes. Acts 1911, c. 67, § 12. Can it be seriously contended that by that act the Legislature of 1905 had in contemplation the collection of these assessments for maintenance of drainage canals, which were unknown in their present form in North Carolina until 1909? Only upon that theory can the inference be drawn that this general act of 1905 extends so far.

It is the rational view that we must look to the Acts of 1909 and 1911, which relate to these drainage districts, and which expressly or impliedly specify the compensation of sheriffs and treasurers, to ascertain the legislative intent. We think that they, when taken together, and so construed, provide that commissions shall be deducted for collection of maintenance assessments, at the rate of 2 per cent.—not 5.

In this respect the case at bar differs from the case of Board v. Commissioners, supra, in that in the latter case nowhere was any express provision for any compensation to the sheriff for collecting the school tax.

The defendant contends, and we think this is his main reliance, that the general statute allowing the sheriff commissions for collecting taxes provides in Revisal 1905, § 5245:

"The sheriffs and tax collectors shall receive five per cent. on all taxes, licenses and privileges collected by them for state, county, township, school district, or other purpose whatsoever, up to * * * fifty thousand dollars, and upon all such sums so collected by him in excess thereof he shall receive two and one-half per cent. commission."

This provision is repeated in section 101, c. 234, Laws 1917, and in section 101, c. 92, Laws 1919 (section 8042, C. S.). The primary purpose of these sections was to fix the sheriff's commissions for collecting taxes, in the strict and technical sense of that word. Com'rs v. Stedman, 141 N. C. 448, 54 S. E. 269. Defendant contends that there is no provision of the drainage acts which forbids the application of this general provision. It will be noted that the phraseology is somewhat comprehensive, "all taxes collected for state, county, * * * school district, or other purposes whatsoever." (Italics ours.)

But this view drawn therefrom does not commend itself to our favorable consideration. As we have shown, these collections were not of taxes, but of assessments proper. The distinction between the two is plainly marked by the law. While in the two acts of 1909 and 1911 the words "assessments" and "taxes" are indifferently used, they both were manifestly intended to describe the same thing, namely, the sums imposed upon the lands receiving benefits from the drainage for the purpose of paying the costs and expenses thereof, and, in no proper sense, are they "taxes," that word having a well-defined and perfectly well-understood meaning, being levies made, not for special benefits accruing to the particular owner of land, or to the land itself, but for defraying the costs and expenses of government, being, strictly speaking, public burdens.

The statute to which defendant refers, and which allows 5 per cent. on taxes collected, is to be found only under the general title of "Taxes and the Collection of Them," or under "Revenue." The argument based upon these considerations is therefore entirely inadmissible, and we must look to the drainage acts for light upon the subject, and be governed by their provisions. Section 36 of the act of 1909, if it had been retained, would have settled the question easily and most satisfactorily, but it was repealed by the Acts 1917, c. 152, § 2, though we do not think it was intended to be repealed so far as the compensation of officers and employees of the drainage commission were concerned, but only in other respects, and that a repeal of the provisions of that section, that officers and others performing service where compensation is not specially provided for, shall receive pay therefor for their work as in other like cases, was inadvertently included in the repealing section of the later law. But we will treat it as wholly repealed by the act of 1917, and even in that view there is plenty left to show an intent of the Legislature to make an allowance to the sheriff for the collection of assessments for maintenance, and that the same should be the percentage allowed in case of assessments for construction, under section 34 of the act of 1909, as that is the closest analogy, the two services being surely of a like kind, and not only that, but of the same kind, or, in other words, identical. As we have said, these assessments for maintenance, it is true, are sometimes called "drainage taxes," but this is a misnomer merely, for drainage assessments were clearly in the mind and contemplation of the Legislature, and sometimes they are so properly designated in the two Acts. We cannot adopt defendant's construction of Revisal of 1905, § 5245, which provides that sheriffs and tax collectors shall receive 5 per cent. on all taxes, licenses, and privileges collected by them for state, county, township, school districts, or other purposes whatsoever. (Italics ours.) The expression "or other purposes whatsoever" refers to taxes of a like kind, or public taxes proper, and not to these assessments. That section of the Revisal (section 5245) is to be found in chapter 110, entitled "Revenue," which refers to the revenue received from taxation for public purposes.

We are led to conclude that the sheriff is entitled to some commissions on the collection of drainage assessments by the consideration of the established policy of this state prevailing for many years, which is that officers and other persons rendering services to the state in any official, or even unofficial, capacity have been uniformly paid for such services, either by salary, fees, or in some other form, and the state has not required that such services be rendered gratuitously, but has acted upon the just principle that, not only is the laborer worthy of his hire, but that he should be paid a just compensation for his work. The sheriff is required to give bond for the collection and safe custody of funds derived from these assessments, and to make prompt settlement for the same. He performs the same work as he did in the collection of organization or construction assessments, and the statute provides (Acts 1909) that those overdue shall be collected and disbursed in the same manner, and by the same officers, as the state and county taxes. Section 29 of that act continues the control of the drainage commissioners for maintenance and repairs, and authorizes the levy of an assessment for such purposes in the same manner and in the same proportion as the original assessments were made. It may be that in certain very exceptional cases the statutes do not provide specifically for compensation to an officer for particular services rendered, and, too, because, as contended by plaintiff, his salary, if one is received, or his fees, or the pay for his other work, may have been regarded as quite sufficient compensation for the performance of all his official duties; but such cases, if they exist, are rare, and do not embody the general and uniform rule, but, as exceptions, they tend to prove it. Then again, section 13 of chapter 67, Laws 1911, is brought forward as section 5369 of Consol. Statutes, which provides that 2 per cent. shall be allowed the sheriffs "for collecting the drainage assessments as hereinbefore described," and it refers not only to the assessments for construction but to those for maintenance, and is a legislative construction of the drainage statutes as to the compensation of the sheriff. We are not bound by a legislative construction, as interpretation of a statute is a judicial function, and for the court alone, but it can be called in aid by us and considered with the other facts. Gill v. Com'rs, 160 N. C. 176,

This brings us to consider an important and exceedingly relevant passage in the plaintiff's brief, which appears to be in harmony with our view, though not a full concession of it, and which is stated alternatively therein to his first contention, and it is that the sheriff may be entitled to compensation at the rate of 2 per cent., though rejecting, as we do, the defendant's view, that these assessments are "taxes," which they are not in any proper sense, and entitle him to 5 per cent. on the amount collected.

In his brief, the plaintiff says substantially, and this is the passage to which we have referred, that in no event could the defendant have been entitled to a commission of more than 2 per cent., but if the court should be of opinion that it was not intended by the Legislature to impose the duty of collecting these assessments for maintenance without providing compensation to the sheriffs and tax collectors, then the only reasonable theory is that the provisions of chapter 67, § 13, of Laws 1911, contemplated that but 2 per cent. should be charged upon any drainage district fund collected, as well the maintenance assessments as the construction or bond assessments. This for the reason that the acts of 1909 and 1911 provide that maintenance assessments shall be levied in the same manner and in the same proportion as original assessments were made, and, while not so expressly provided, the inference is essential that they were to be collected by the same officers, and every provision for the collection of these original assessments requires that it be done by the sheriffs and tax collectors. This view that the 2 per cent. only can be collected is supported by the fact that the act of 1909 and the act of 1911 nowhere make any distinction between the maintenance assessments and original assessments; and the theory finds further support in the fact that in bringing forward this section 13 of chapter 67, Laws 1911, the Legislature of 1919, in Consol. Statutes, § 5369, construes these fees of 2 per cent. to sheriffs and tax collectors to be "for collecting the drainage assessments as hereinbefore prescribed," which includes the maintenance assessment for which provision is made in Consol. Statutes, § 5349, preceding. We concur in this view of the plaintiff, as the alternative to plaintiff's contention in the first part of its brief, and in its argument here, which first contention we must reject.

We believe that this is the correct solution of the question as to the sheriff's commissions raised in the case, as that question is stated by both of the parties (though its correctness is not admitted), and we accordingly adopt it. This view has the merit of being a fair and just one, and best accords with the intent of the Legislature in all the enactments upon the subject, when they are considered together, as they should be, being in pari materia.

This case was argued with Drainage Commissioners v. Credle, 109 S. E. 88, and Same v. Brinn, 109 S. E. 90, but as the latter involve different questions, they will be discussed and decided in separate opinions, being essentially different cases.

The judgment will be modified by inserting 2 per cent. in the judgment for 5 per cent., as provided therein, and as thus modified it is affirmed.

Plaintiff will pay two-fifths and the defendant three-fifths of the costs in this court. Modified and affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Bond, Judge.

Action by J. F. Faison and J. J. Matthis against S. T. Marshburn. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff Matthis appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action to recover broker's commissions upon an alleged sale of real estate. The complaint is as follows:

"The plaintiffs, complaining of the defendant, come and allege:

"(1) That heretofore, prior to October 29, 1919, the plaintiffs caused a certain tract of land, belonging to the plaintiff, J. F. Faison, and lying in Warsaw township, Duplin county, N. C., to be surveyed and platted into various lots and parcels of land; and thereafter, on October 29, 1919, after due advertisement, said lands were offered for sale, on the premises, to the highest bidder, upon the terms of one-fourth cash, and the balance to be paid in one, two, and three years from date, said deferred payments to be represented by purchase-money notes, and secured by mortgage deed upon the lands so purchased.

"That a plat of said lands is hereto attached, marked Exhibit A and made a part of this article.

"(2) That on the date aforesaid, to wit, October 29, 1919, said lands were duly sold upon the premises, at which time and place the defendant, S. T. Marshburn, purchased lot No. 1, and lot No. 2, according to said plat, containing 41.33 and 41.73 acres, respectively, at an agreed price of $142.50 per acre.

"(3) That at the time of said sale, it was publicly announced by the auctioneer that the terms of sale were as heretofore alleged, and that said sale was made according to the plat hereto attached, and above referred to.

"(4) That at the time of said purchase the defendant executed a written contract, in words and figures as follows:

"This is to certify that I have this day bought through the Fort Realty Company of Raleigh, N. C., lot No. 1 and No. 2, 83.06A, as shown by the map of J. F. Faison, at $142.50, for which I promise to pay for on the terms announced at sale.

"Witness my hand and seal, this October 29, 1919.

"[Signed] S. T. Marshburn. [Seal.]

"(5) That the plaintiffs have offered to execute and deliver to the defendant a good and sufficient deed for said lots, and have demanded of him the payment of one-fourth part of the purchase price, and requested him to execute and deliver to them his promissory notes, secured by a mortgage deed, in accordance with his said contract; and the defendant has failed and refused, and still fails and refuses, to pay to the plaintiffs any part of said money, except the sum of $50, which was paid on the day of sale.

"(6) That the total purchase price of said lands, as agreed upon, amounted to $11,836.05, of which sum $50 has been paid.

"(7) That under the terms of agreement between the plaintiff, J. F. Faison, and the plaintiff, J. J. Matthis, the said J. F. Faison was to receive $125 per acre from said sale, and the balance was to belong to the plaintiff, J. J. Matthis; that, after deducting the $50 hereinbefore referred to, the balance due and owing to the plaintiff, J. J. Matthis, on account of said contract, is $1,403.05, which amount is now justly due and owing to him by the defendant.

"Wherefore the plaintiff, J. J. Matthis, demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,403.05, together with the costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk."

J. F. Faison, the owner of the land, testified as follows:

"I have never signed a deed, because I never got the cash payment; I have never tendered the defendant Marshburn a deed to the lands in controversy. I am not bringing any suit against the defendant, Marshburn, nor asking for any relief against the defendant, and the option that I gave Matthis is now out. I think Matthis made a profit on the other land sold that day."

At the close of plaintiff's evidence and upon motion of counsel for defendant, his honor entered judgment as of nonsuit. Plaintiff, J. J. Matthis, excepted and appealed.

Faison & Robinson, Grady & Graham, and Fowler & Crumpler, all of Clinton, and Stevens, Beasley & Stevens, of Warsaw, for appellant.

H. D. Williams, of Kenansville, and D. L. Carlton and R. D. Johnson, both of Warsaw, for appellee.

STACY, J. We fully concur with his honor below that, upon the evidence, J. J. Matthis is not entitled to recover of the defendant, Marshburn, and further, that the complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to constitute a valid cause of action.

It will be observed that J. F. Faison, the owner of the land, is not insisting or demanding that the defendant comply with his bid. No deed has been tendered, and he expressly states that he is not asking for any relief in this action. The broker is seeking to recover his commissions out of the prospective purchaser without any sale having been consummated. His agreement was with Faison, the owner of the land, not with the defendant. The case in many respects is not unlike Aycock v. Bogue, 108 S. E. 434, at the present term, except there the broker sued the owner, and here he has brought suit against the bidder who never became a purchaser.

Upon the record, and as now presented, we are of opinion that the judgment of nonsuit must be sustained.

Affirmed.

BATTS v. SULLIVAN. (No. 222.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 12, 1921.)

1. Insurance  $\S$  115(4) — Statutory provision that title to crops are vested in landlord until rents are paid does not divest tenant of insurable interest.

Although under C. S. § 2355, the possession and title to all crops raised by tenant or cropper in the absence of a contrary agreement are deemed to be vested in the landlord until the rent and advancements have been paid, this does not divest the tenant of an insurable interest in the crops before division.

2. Insurance  $\S$  580(1) — Tenant has right against landlord to money paid on his insurance policy on crops.

Where a tenant insures his interest in the undivided crop without the landlord's knowledge, and the property is destroyed, the tenant has the right to all of the insurance money as against the landlord.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Hattie E. Batts, as guardian, against Bryant Sullivan. Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

Civil action brought by plaintiff, the landlord, against defendant, tenant upon her farm, to recover for certain advancements made during the year 1919.

The single point presented on this appeal grows out of a dispute as to what disposition or division, if any, should be made between the landlord and tenant of the proceeds of a fire insurance policy taken out by the tenant to protect his interest in the tobacco crop while stored in the plaintiff's packhouse. The tobacco in question had been raised by the defendant as tenant on the lands of the plaintiff. It had been harvested, cured, and stored in her barn, but there had been no division of the crop. The landlord was entitled to one-third of said tobacco, and the tenant the remaining two-thirds.

The defendant, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, and at his own expense, purchased a policy of fire insurance to protect his interest in said tobacco. While this policy was in force, the plaintiff's packhouse and its contents, including the undivided tobacco, was destroyed by fire. The defendant collected the insurance. The check was made payable to both parties, and plaintiff alleges that by agreement the money was to be divided according to their respective interests in the property, but the jury have found otherwise, and the alleged agreement is not a material or controlling point in the case.

The plaintiff contends that she is entitled to one-third of the insurance money because she owned an undivided one-third interest in the property destroyed. His honor held that, as the insurance contract was purchased to protect the interest of the tenant, he alone was entitled to the proceeds derived therefrom, and so charged the jury. Plaintiff excepted and assigns this as error.

From a verdict and judgment in favor of defendant, the plaintiff appealed.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellant.
Shaw & Jones, of Kinston, for appellee.

STACY, J. It will be observed at the outset that the controversy here presented is between the landlord and the tenant; and the validity of the insurance policy is in no wise involved. This has been paid, and the insurance company is not a party to the proceeding. The case arises out of a contest over the question as to whether the landlord, by virtue of her legal title and interest in the tobacco, is entitled to any portion of the insurance money.

[1] It is true that under our statute (C. S. § 2355) the possession and title to all crops raised by a tenant or cropper, in the absence of a contrary agreement, are deemed to be vested in the landlord until the rent and advancements have been paid. State v. Austin, 123 N. C. 749, 81 S. E. 731; Boone v. Darden, 109 N. C. 74, 13 S. E. 728; Smith

v. Tindall, 107 N. C. 83, 12 S. E. 121. But this perforce does not divest the tenant of an insurable interest in the crops before division.

"It is well settled that any person has an insurable interest in property by the existence of which he will gain an advantage, or by the destruction of which he will suffer a loss, whether he has or has not any title in, or lien upon, or possession of, the property itself." Harrison v. Fortlage, 161 U. S. 57, 16 Sup. Ct. 488, 40 L. Ed. 616; Eastern R. Co. v. Relief F. Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 423.

"It may be stated as a general proposition, sustained by all the authorities, that whenever a person will suffer a loss by a destruction of the property he has an insurable interest therein." Gilman v. Dwelling House Ins. Co., 81 Me. 488, 17 Atl. 544; Getchell v. Mercantile, etc., Ins. Co., 109 Me. 274, 83 Atl. 801, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 135, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 738.

And to the same effect are our own decisions; Gerringer v. N. O. Home Ins. Co., 133 N. C. 407, 45 S. E. 773; Grabbs v. Mut. Fire Ins. Ass'n, 125 N. C. 389, 34 S. E. 503, and cases there cited.

[2] It is also a well-recognized principle, and uniformly upheld by the decisions, that the different interests in the same property, such as that held by a mortgagor or lienor, on the one hand, and that of a mortgagee or lienee, on the other, and such kindred relations, are each separately insurable.

"Wherever property, either by force of law or by the contract of the parties, is so charged, pledged, or hypothecated that it stands as a security for the payment of a debt, or the performance of a legal duty, each of the parties, the owner of the lien and the person against whose property it exists, has an insurable interest in the property—the one, that the security shall remain sufficient; the other, that it may be kept unimpaired and the property restored to his use or enjoyment in whole or in part, after the incumbrance is relieved. And each may insure his separate interest at one and the same time without incurring the imputation of double insurance, provided the applications and policies are the individual and separate acts of each." Commercial Fire Ins. Co. v. Capital City Ins. Co., 81 Atl. 320, 8 South. 222, 60 Am. Rep. 162; May on Insurance, §§ 80 to 87, inclusive; Flanders on Fire Insurance, 342 et seq.; Insurance Co. v. Stinson, 103 U. S. 25, 26 L. Ed. 473; Cone v. Niagara Ins. Co., 60 N. Y. 619; Cumberland Bone Co. v. Andes Ins. Co., 64 Me. 466; Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. Coates, 14 Md. 285; and Carter v. Humboldt Fire Ins. Co., 12 Iowa, 287.

In the last case it was said:

"Any interest is insurable if the peril against which insurance is made would bring upon the insured, by its immediate and direct effect, a pecuniary loss."

In Insurance Co. v. Reid, 171 N. C. 513, 88 S. E. 779, a case involving the rights of mortgagor and mortgagee, this doctrine is clearly stated as follows:

"It is well recognized that a mortgagee and mortgagor may each insure the mortgaged property for his own benefit, and where a mortgagee has taken out such insurance at his own expense, without stipulations in favor of the mortgagor or conditions of any kind imposing an obligation or duty on the mortgagee to protect the property for the mortgagor's benefit, such mortgagee, in case of loss of the property by fire or damage thereto, is not accountable to the mortgagor for the amount collected from the insurance company, either on the debt or otherwise." Leyden v. Lawrence, 79 N. J. Eq. 113, 81 Atl. 121; Ins. Co. v. Woodbury, 45 Me. 447; Fire Ins. Co. v. Bohn, 48 Neb. 743, 67 N. W. 774; Gillespie v. Ins. Co. 61 W. Va. 169, 56 S. E. 213, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 143; Ins. Co. v. Ins. Co., 55 N. Y. 343, 14 Am. Rep. 271; 1 Jones on Mortgages (4th Ed.) § 420.

In Ins. Co. v. Woodbury the principles referred to are stated as follows:

"(a) If a mortgagee insures his own interest without any agreement between him and the mortgagor, and a loss accrues, the mortgagor is not entitled to any part of the sum paid on such a loss to be applied to the discharge or reduction of his mortgage debt."

"(b) When the mortgagee effects insurance at the request and cost and for the benefit of the mortgagor as well as his own, the mortgagor has the right in case of loss to have the money applied in discharge of his indebtedness."

Applying these principles, we think his honor's charge to the jury with respect to the insurance money was correct in the light of the facts appearing on the record.

Of course, if the insurance policy had been procured for the mutual or joint benefit of the landlord and the tenant, a different question would be presented; but this is not our case. King v. State Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 7 Oush. (Mass.) 1, 54 Am. Dec. 683, and note.

After a careful examination of the defendant's exceptions, we have been unable to find any error committed on the trial; and this will be certified to the superior court.

No error.

HOWARD v. STATE. (No. 2145.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law § 13—Part of statute relating to speed of automobiles held indefinite and void.

The language employed in section 10 of the act of Nov. 30, 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 107), relating to the regulation of motor vehicles and motorcycles and their rate of speed upon the highways of this state, and providing that a motor vehicle shall not be operated upon any public street or highway "at a speed greater than is reasonable and safe," is so indefinite as to render that part of the statute void. Moreover, since the decision of this case by the Court of Appeals, the portion of the statute above referred to has by this court been held to be unconstitutional and void.

2. Unnecessary to consider definiteness of unconstitutional statute.

Inasmuch as this court has held the third paragraph of section 10 of the act of 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 112) above referred to, unconstitutional, upon the ground that legislation upon this subject was not included in the Governor's call for the special session, it is unnecessary to decide whether it is also void upon the ground of indefiniteness and vagueness.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Criminal law § 1172(1)—Charge referring to unconstitutional statute held to confuse jury.

In a prosecution for manslaughter, an instruction of the court embodying parts of Acts Nov. 30, 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 112), § 10, relating to regulation of motor vehicles and their rate of speed, which had been held to be invalid, was prejudicially erroneous as tending to confuse the jury.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

David Howard was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and the judgment was affirmed in the Court of Appeals (103 S. E. 683), and he brings certiorari. Reversed.

Branch & Howard, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Geo. M. Napier, Sol. Gen., and Alonzo Field, both of Atlanta, for the State.

BECK, P. J. David Howard was indicted for the offense of murder, it being alleged in the indictment that he did, on the 20th day of May, 1919, unlawfully, and with malice aforethought, kill one Hubert Cochran, by driving an automobile against and over the said Cochran. He was tried under this indictment, and convicted of the offense of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act; and thereupon he made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the case was carried by writ of error to the Court of Appeals. That court affirmed the judgment of the trial court, and a writ of certiorari to that judgment was sued out, bringing the case here for review.

[1, 3] 1. One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial in this case assigns error upon the following part of the court's charge:

"The law provides that no person shall operate a motor vehicle or motorcycle upon any public street or highway at a speed greater than is reasonable and safe, not to exceed a speed of 30 miles per hour, having due regard for the width, grade, character, and common use of such street or highway, or so as to endanger life, limb, or property in any respect."

In the case of Empire Life Ins. Co. v. Allen, 141 Ga. 413, 81 S. E. 120, this court had before it for consideration and determination the validity of section 5 of the act of 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 90), which contains certain provisions regarding the operation of automobiles, making it unlawful for any person to "operate a machine on any of the highways of this state * * * at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of such highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property," and the violation of this provision was made punishable as a misdemeanor. The court there held that the part of section 5 of the act of 1910 quoted above was too indefinite to form the basis of a criminal action, whether it might stand as a rule of civil conduct or not. That ruling is applicable to the charge under consideration here; for the provision in the statute enacted at the extraordinary session of the Legislature on November 30, 1915, upon the subject of the speed limit and control on the highways, is as follows:

"No person shall operate a motor vehicle or motorcycle upon any public street or highway at a speed greater than is reasonable and safe, not to exceed a speed of 30 miles per hour, having due regard for the width, grade, character, traffic, and common use of such street or highway; or so as to endanger life, limb, or property in any respect whatever."

Instead of employing the expression, "at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper," used in the act of 1910, the Legislature, at the extraordinary session of 1915, used the language, "at a speed greater than is reasonable and safe," substituting the word "safe" for the word "proper." See Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 107, § 10. The language of the two acts is substantially the same; and under the ruling construing section 5 of the act of 1910, referred to above, and holding it invalid because of its indefiniteness, the provision in the statute of 1915 now under consideration, and containing the quotation above quoted, must also be held to be invalid because of indefiniteness. The instruction of the trial court embodying the part of the statute here held to be invalid was therefore error. Nor can we hold that it was not hurtful error, as one of the material issues under the evidence in the trial of this defendant was whether he was doing an unlawful act at the time the automobile driven by him struck and killed the decedent. If the language of the statute is so indefinite as to make it void, then the instructions could only confuse the jury, and tend to prevent a clear understanding of what particular act would or would not be criminal. The part of the statute held to be invalid should not be given in charge to the jury in the trial of a criminal case involving issues like the present one, as it cannot help the jury to determine the criminality of the acts charged, and can only tend to confuse them. In the case of Hayes v. State, 11 Ga. App. 371, 75 S. E. 523, the court said, speaking through Judge Pottle:

"What rate of speed is reasonable and proper? Who should determine this question? What is this test as to the rate of speed which can be employed, and how is the driver of an automobile to know when he is driving at a rate of speed prohibited by the act? Manifestly this question cannot be determined by the consequences which ensue from driving a machine. The law must so definitely and certainly define the offense that a person of reasonable understanding can know at the time of the commission of the act that the law is being violated. One jury might say that a certain rate of speed was reasonable and proper. Another jury might reach exactly the opposite conclusion from exactly the same state of facts and the same circumstances. One court might hold, upon a review of the facts, that the rate of speed used was in violation of the act, and another court might rule otherwise. We appreciate thoroughly the difficulty in prescribing the maximum rate of speed which can be employed in all cases, but this furnishes no reason why, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Legislature should be permitted to set a dragnet and leave the courts to determine who shall be detained in the net and who should be set at liberty."

Of course we are not holding that the inhibition in the statute of 1910 against exceeding a speed of 30 miles per hour was void for indefiniteness, but what is said above relates to the other language of the void statute embodied in the charge. Moreover, since the decision of this case by the Court of Appeals, so much of the statute of 1915 under consideration as relates to the regulation of the speed, etc., of motor vehicles and motorcycles has been declared to be void upon the ground of its unconstitutionality. Jones v. State, 151 Ga. —, 107 S. E. 765.

[2] 2. Error was also assigned upon the following charge of the court:

"A further provision of the law as to signaling is, 'Upon approaching or passing any person walking in the roadway, traveling any public street or highway, or any horse or other draft animal being led, ridden, or driven thereon, or upon any bridge or crossing at an intersection of public streets or highways' (but the court instructs you that there is no question of a public crossing, highway, or bridge in this case), 'the operator of a motor vehicle or motorcycle shall at all times have the same under immediate control.'"

Inasmuch as the judgment of the trial court is reversed because of the court's giving the first charge above set out, it is unnecessary to consider whether or not this last excerpt from the charge is erroneous because the statutory provision therein quoted is void because of indefiniteness, since the charge is based upon the third paragraph of section 10 of the act of 1915, which in the case of Jones v. State, supra, is also held to be unconstitutional and void.

It is unnecessary to deal with the other grounds of alleged error.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur.

SMITH v. PARLIER. (No. 2348.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1921.)

1. Easements  $\S$ 21—Right of private way given by parol by grantor does not pass to purchaser from grantor without notice.

Where a grantor of land enters into a collateral parol agreement with a grantee, to the effect that the latter shall have a private right of way over other lands of the former, the burden of such collateral agreement does not pass to an assignee of such other lands, where such assignee is a purchaser of the land for value and without notice, actual or constructive, of the collateral agreement. Hancock v. Gumm, 151 Ga. —, 107 S. E. 872.

2. Easements  $\S$ 6 — Private way gained by prescription.

"To acquire a prescriptive right to a private way over land, it is necessary to show the uninterrupted use of a permanent way, not over 15 feet wide, kept open and in repair for seven years. It is not sufficient to show that those claiming the prescription have been accustomed for more than seven years to pass over the land, changing the way as they saw fit, to avoid obstructions or for convenience." Short v. Walton, 61 Ga. 28; Nashville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Coats, 133 Ga. 820, 66 S. E. 1085; Johnson v. Sams, 136 Ga. 448, 71 S. E. 891; Rodgers v. Stroud, 141 Ga. 559(2), 81 S. E. 873.

3. Easements  $\S$ 61(6)—Interlocutory injunction amounting to direction to remove fence erroneously granted.

"Where in an equitable petition the sole prayer for injunction was that the defendant should be enjoined from maintaining an obstruction across a private right of way, which obstruction consisted in a fence completed before the filing of the petition, it was erroneous to grant an interlocutory injunction mandatory in its character, and amounting to a direction to the defendant to remove the fence." Simmons v. Lindsay, 144 Ga. 845, 88 S. E. 199.

4. Private way not established.

At the hearing of the petition for interlocutory injunction, the sole prayer of which was to enjoin the obstruction of an alleged private way, the judge applying the principles ruled in the first and second notes was authorized, under the pleadings and evidence, to find that the plaintiff did not have any private right of way over the defendant's land. Even if the plaintiff had such right of way, injunction was not an available remedy after the fence had been constructed.

5. Injunction properly refused.

The judge did not err in refusing an interlocutory injunction.

PURCELL et al. v. PILGRIM. (No. 2179.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Injunction  $\S$ 152 — Permanent injunction improperly granted at interlocutory hearing.

In a suit for specific performance and injunction, a judgment was rendered at an interlocutory hearing, granting a permanent injunction. Error was assigned upon the judgment. The case being for decision by the entire bench of six Justices, all of the Justices agree that the judge was not authorized at such hearing to grant a permanent injunction; but the court is equally divided upon the question whether the judge was authorized, under the pleadings and evidence, to enjoin the defendants until the final trial, FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON and HILL, JJ., being of the opinion that such an injunction was authorized, and BECK, P. J., and GILBERT and GEORGE, JJ., being of the opinion that such an injunction was not authorized. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the trial court stand affirmed by operation of law, with direction that the judgment be so modified as to make the injunction temporary.

2. Specific performance  $\S$ 108—Operation of space in building for pool tables temporarily restrained pending suit.

The exception is to a judgment granting an injunction at an interlocutory hearing in the case of J. M. Pilgrim against S. E. Purcell and J. A. Sudderth, being a suit for specific performance of a contract, and for injunction. Under the pleadings as amended and the evidence (some of the evidence being conflicting) the judge was authorized to find the following: M. S. Sulunius obtained a lease on a certain lot at Chamblee, Ga., and constructed a building thereon. Sulunius executed to the de-defendant S. E. Purcell a lease to the building for a term of 12 months, with power to sublet. Purcell occupied the rented property and used it as a store for sale of tobacco, cigars, soft drinks, lunches, fruit, candy, and military supplies. During such occupancy Purcell executed a written lease for a term of 11 months (being the balance of his own term) unto D. G. Jacobs, for described floor space in the front part of the building, for the purpose of maintaining therein a billiard and pool room. The operation of such room would attract customers for Purcell's business, and the lease required the operation of at least three tables, to be installed within a stated time. The lease was signed by Purcell and Jacobs, and it gave the latter power to sublet or assign without written consent of the former. Jacobs paid in advance the stipulated rent for one month, as required by the contract. At the time the lease was executed, a billiard and pool room was being operated in an adjoining building by J. M. Pilgrim, the plaintiff. Two days after execution of the lease, Jacobs executed a written transfer thereof for a valuable consideration unto Pilgrim. On the day of the transfer and repeatedly thereafter Pilgrim offered to install billiard and pool tables in the space according to the contract expressed in the lease, but Purcell refused to furnish him with a key or to admit him in the rented space for the purpose of installing tables in pursuance of the contract. A few days after the transfer, and after the time specified in which the tables should be installed, Purcell installed pool tables in the rented space, and continued thereafter to operate them himself and in connection with J. A. Sudderth. The introduction of Sudderth was the result of an undertaking between Purcell and Sudderth to get rid of Pilgrim, who had already instituted suit against Purcell to enjoin him from operating the tables in the rented space. With the above object in view, Purcell and Sudderth went through the form of a sale of Purcell's entire business to Sudderth; and these two, after informing Sulunius of the injunction suit, induced him to go through the form of accepting a surrender of the lease to Purcell and executing another on similar terms to Sudderth. After the above described transactions both Purcell and Sudderth continued in the physical operation of the business. Pilgrim's object in purchasing the transfer from Jacobs was to conduct a billiard and pool room in the rented space for the profits to be derived therefrom, and also to save his existing business in the adjoining building from the damage that it would suffer from competition with Jacobs operating a similar business in the space leased from Purcell. Under the circumstances, the injury to Pilgrim's existing business on account of the competition carried on by Purcell and Sudderth in the rented space, and the loss of profits that Pilgrim would have made from the business he intended to carry on in such space, was substantial, but incapable of ascertainment. In granting the injunction it was "ordered and adjudged that the defendants, S. E. Purcell and J. A. Sudderth, their agents and employees, be and they and each of them are hereby enjoined and restrained from using any part of the premises described in the original petition as amended * * * for the purpose of carrying on and maintaining or operating a pool and billiard saloon," etc.

R. B. Blackburn, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] The case being for decision by the entire bench of six Justices, all of the Justices agree that the judge was not authorized at such hearing to grant a permanent injunction; but the court is equally divided upon the question whether the judge was authorized, under the pleadings and evidence, to enjoin the defendants until the final trial, FISH, O. J., and ATKINSON and HILL, JJ., being of the opinion that such an injunction was authorized, and BECK, P. J., and GILBERT and GEORGE, JJ., being of the opinion that such an injunction was not authorized. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the trial court stand affirmed by operation of law, with direction that the judgment be so modified as to make the injunction temporary. The views of the Justices are stated below.

ATKINSON, J. Each instrument of the chain of leases extending from Sulunius to Pilgrim conferred express power to sublet, and there was no objection to any subtenant until after the chain had been completed and Pilgrim's interest as a sublessee had attached. After such interest had attached, Sulunius, having notice thereof, could not, by accepting surrender of Purcell's lease and executing a new lease to Sudderth as a part of an enterprise between Sudderth and Purcell to circumvent Pilgrim, divest the interest of Pilgrim, or defeat his right to conduct the contemplated business specified in his lease. Under such circumstances, Sudderth, being in league with Purcell, would stand in no better position than Purcell; and Pilgrim, being transferee of Jacobs, would stand in the same position as Jacobs, the immediate lessee of Purcell. Pilgrim's right under his lease was to conduct a billiard and pool room in definite space in the store of Purcell. This was necessarily a right to exclusive use of such space, because the nature of the business would not permit a similar business by the lessor or any one else in the identical space, and the grant of such use by Purcell implied a covenant of quiet enjoyment as against himself and all persons claiming under him. Notwithstanding such implied covenant, Purcell committed a breach of it and proceeded with Sudderth, in manner hereinbefore indicated, to occupy the rented space and conduct therein a billiard and pool room. The question arises, Was the judgment of the trial court authorized to the extent of temporarily enjoining Purcell and Sudderth from conducting a billiard and pool room in the space leased to Pilgrim? Civil Code, § 5490, recognizes and declares the principle that equity by writ of injunction will restrain any act by a private individual which is illegal or contrary to equity and good conscience, and for which no adequate remedy is provided by law. In Kenny v. Oollier, 79 Ga. 743 (2), 8 S. E. 58, it was held:

"Where there is a contract at a specific sum for the rent of premises for one year, from and after a future day, in an action thereon by the tenant against the landlord for not admitting him into possession, the measure of damages is the excess in the value of the term over the amount agreed to be paid as rent. If no excess, nominal damages only are recoverable. Anticipated profits from a business intended to be carried on by the tenant upon the premises are not recoverable."

For the breach of the covenant by refusing admittance to Pilgrim and continuously operating a billiard and pool room in the leased space, Pilgrim had a remedy at law against Purcell and Sudderth for damages; but was that remedy adequate? It is said in 14 R. C. L. 344, § 46:

"A remedy at law, to exclude appropriate relief in equity, must be complete and the substantial equivalent of the equitable relief. It is not enough that there is a remedy at law. It must be plain and adequate, or, in other words, as practical and as efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity."

The principle thus stated was recognized and applied in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Rogers, 42 N. J. Eq. 311, 11 Atl. 13. The syllabus in that court was:

"R., owning or controlling a hotel at Long Branch, made a written contract, giving the complainants the exclusive right to have and operate a telegraph office therein during the season of 1884, with the same right for each succeeding season, unless a specified written notice to the contrary should be given. No such notice has been given. Held, that this court would enjoin R. from allowing a rival telegraph company to operate a competing office in the same hotel during the season of 1885."

It was contended that injunction should not issue, because the plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law, and further because the damages were not irreparable. The opinion dealt with both of these contentions, saying:

"The principal defense by way of answers and argument is that for this manifest and confessed breach of the agreement with the complainant the complainant has an adequate remedy at law. In other words, it is insisted that the transaction exhibits nothing more than the ordinary violation of a contract, the damages for which are easily ascertainable, and are therefore a proper subject to be submitted to a jury. This insistence then amounts to this: That it is the duty of this court to allow parties to violate their agreements at will, and those who participate in such violation to enjoy the fruits thereof, and oblige the injured party to carry on a litigation at law for redress of his wrongs. I do not think this court is so helpless in such case. I think it proper for this court in such case to aid the party who has the first and unquestioned right, and to oblige the interfering party to carry the litigation at law for damages for breach of contract.

"Again, it is urged that the complainant cannot be heard in this court, because the court never exercises jurisdiction unless it appears that the damages threatened are irreparable. This, it is true, is one well-settled rule; but another is equally well settled, viz. that the party will not be driven to his legal remedy where it may appear that that remedy will prove inadequate. In this case there can be no doubt but that the complainant could at law recover; but recover what? Most likely not more than six cents, or some other merely nominal sum. Now, I think, no thoughtful person will insist that such result would be adequate. There is enough in the case to show that the complainant has many offices, of which this is one, and that this one is part of a system of telegraphing for commercial and other business interests; and that while this one is a part, it is but a small part—a very small part, indeed. Yet, however small, it has rights therein; but because so small in itself, it would be impossible for any jury, the most fair-minded and enlightened, to ascertain the damages. It is not like the breach of an agreement to deliver grain or any other article of sale, the value of which is easily determined. Suppose the injunction be not allowed, how then can the complainant fix his damages at law beyond that which is merely nominal? He cannot take last year's transactions as a guide, for none can determine from those, since it is plain that the number of telegrams sent from, or received at, a given point depends, not only upon the number of persons desiring to be accommodated and the activity of business generally, but also upon the extent and variety of connections. Nor can the damages be fixed by the amount of business done by the defendant, the Baltimore & Ohio Telegraph Company. It could be said, on the one hand, that it has greater facilities for business, and on the other, less.

"But I think these observations are enough to show the application of the rule of law as now given. Kerr on Inj. 200, says: 'By the term "irreparable injury" it is not meant that there must be no physical possibility of repairing the injury; all that is meant is that the injury would be a grievous one, or at least a material one, and not adequately reparable by damages at law; and by the term "the inadequacy of the remedy by damages," is meant that the damages obtainable at law are not such a compensation as will, in effect, though not in specie, place the parties in the position in which they formerly stood. * * * The fact that the amount of damage cannot be accurately ascertained may constitute irreparable damage. * * * It is no objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction by injunction that a man may have a legal remedy. The question in all cases is whether the remedy at law is, under the circumstances of the case, full and complete.' Again, 1 Joyce on Inj. 75: 'When the construction of a contract is clear and the breach clear, it is not a question of damage, but the mere circumstance of the breach of contract affords sufficient ground for the court to interfere by injunction.' See, also, Id. 503, 554. See, also, 2 Joyce on Inj. 852; Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Manchester Ry. Co., 5 De G. & Sm. 138; 2 Joyce on Inj. 1035."

The case of Justices v. P. R. Co., 11 Ga. 246, was a suit for injunction to prevent destruction of certain tollgates maintained on a plank road by the complainants. The trial judge in effect granted a temporary injunction, and the judgment was affirmed. In the course of the opinion Nisbet, J., said:

"It is well understood that equity will not interfere in a case of a mere trespass. As a general rule, it leaves the party to his legal remedy. But if there is anything special in the case, anything which renders the remedy at law impossible or incomplete—impossible, for example, when the trespasser is insolvent, or incomplete, when, from its nature, it is impossible to prove the damage which grows out of the trespass—chancery will put forth its restraining hand, and by a decree, compel the wrongdoer to desist. The injury done to this company is not alone the destruction of their tollgate. If that was all, the value of the gate would be the criterion of damages; and, that being susceptible of proof, a court of law could give redress. If that were the case, we would dismiss this bill. The tollgates are the authorized means by which the company collects its revenue—the means by which the stockholders are to receive the profits on their money—the means by which the grant in their charter is made available. It does not matter that there are other means by which they would be enabled to collect tolls. It is sufficient that they believe that gates are the best means for them, and that their charter authorizes their use. What then is the injury? It consists in preventing them from collecting tolls—in realizing the profits which their road may make upon the stock—in short, it defeats the privileges and immunities of their charter, and nullifies the legislative grant. How is such injury to be proven? Who will prove what will be the income of this road for a day, or a week, or a year? How could the value of the grant be sworn to by any witness? Or how would it be possible to prove what would be the actual diminution of the tolls, occasioned by a demolition of the tollgates, for any specified time? It could not be done. The remedy at law would be, for that reason, to say the least of it, exceedingly uncertain and incomplete."

It will be perceived that the action at law for damages was held to be inadequate on account of the impossibility of estimating the amount of tolls that might be collected and the consequent loss of profits. In Gray Lumber Co. v. Gaskin, 122 Ga. 342, 349, 50 S. E. 164, 167, it was said:

"Inability to correctly estimate the damage after all evidence obtainable has been produced makes a case of irreparable damages, but difficulty in collecting evidence as to damage would not. 'A trespass is irreparable when, from its nature, it is impossible for a court of law to make full and complete reparation in damages.' Justices v. P. R. Co., 11 Ga. 250."

In the case under consideration the measure of damages in an action at law would be so restricted as to exclude Pilgrim from the right to recover profits from his contemplated business, on account of the legal impossibility of estimating the amount of his earnings; and for similar reasons he could not recover at law for the damage to his existing business in the adjoining building, produced by the competing billiard and pool room conducted by Purcell and Sudderth in the leased space in Purcell's store. Under the circumstances, the remedy at law, in an action for damages would not be the substantial equivalent of the remedy afforded by equity in a suit for specific performance and injunction, and consequently would not be adequate within the meaning of the principle upon which injunctions are granted.

FISH, C. J., and HILL, J., concur in the foregoing views.

BECK, P. J., and GILBERT and GEORGE, JJ., are of the opinion that an interlocutory injunction was unauthorized under the pleadings and evidence. Briefly stated, the facts in the case are as follows: Purcell, who was himself a lessee, executed a lease for the remainder of his term, to D. G. Jacobs, to certain floor space in the premises for the purpose of conducting therein a billiard parlor. The lease from Purcell to Jacobs provided that the latter might sublet the space or assign the lease without the written consent of Purcell. Thereafter Jacobs transferred his lease for a valuable consideration to Pilgrim. At the time of the execution of the lease Pilgrim was operating a billiard parlor in an adjoining building. Purcell refused to admit Pilgrim into possession, and Pilgrim filed a petition in equity to enjoin Purcell (and another alleged to have been in collusion with him) from using the floor space for the purpose of conducting a billiard parlor. The judge of the superior court enjoined the defendants as prayed, and three of the Justices of the Supreme Court favor an affirmance of that judgment upon the ground that—

"The measure of damages in an action at law would be so restricted as to exclude Pilgrim from the right to recover profits from his contemplated business, on account of the legal impossibility of estimating the amount of his earnings; and for similar reasons he could not recover at law for the damage to his existing business in an adjoining building, produced by the billiard and pool room conducted by Purcell [and the defendant alleged to be in collusion with him] in the leased space in Purcell's store."

Where the lessor himself refuses to allow the lessee to take possession at the commencement of the term, the lessee may, it is agreed, recover damages from the lessor. Ordinarily the measure of damages for the lessee's exclusion from the premises is the amount by which the rental value of the premises exceeds the rent to be paid. The lessee is entitled to recover the value of the leasehold estate, less the rent reserved. The lessee may also recover special damages which can be regarded as directly resulting from the lessor's breach of agreement, express or implied, to give possession. It is generally held, however, that conjectural profits which the lessee might have made from the occupation of the premises are not recoverable. 1 Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, 547, § 85. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 371. In this state it has been directly decided, in such a case, that—

"The measure of damages is the excess in the value of the term over the amount agreed to be paid as rent. If no excess, nominal damages only are recoverable. Anticipated profits from a business intended to be carried on by the tenant upon the premises are not recoverable." Kenny v. Collier, 79 Ga. 743(2), 8 S. E. 58.

In the case cited, this court, speaking through Chief Justice Bleckley, said:

"If anything is speculative, remote, and contingent, it is the net income from a business never begun, upon premises never occupied, during a period of time but partially elapsed. * * * The measure of damages for not admitting a lessee or tenant into possession at the beginning of the term is the excess in the value of the term over the amount stipulated as rent. This is the general rule. * * * The general rule does not deny profits, but confines the recovery to profits arising from the contract itself, the measure of which is the difference between cost and value. If there be no difference, or if the cost be in excess of value, nominal damages only will be recoverable. That anticipated profits from a business intended to be carried on by the plaintiff upon the premises cannot be allowed is as well settled as anything can be in an age of legal skepticism."

Kenny v. Collier, supra, was decided by a full bench of three Justices, and is binding as authority. The decision in that case can be reversed only upon review and by the concurrence of at least five Justices. It is therefore as well settled as anything can be in an age of legal uncertainty that generally anticipated profits from a business "never begun, in premises never occupied, during a period of time but partially elapsed," are speculative, contingent, and remote. The rule is based upon the soundest principles. A rule of damages which would embrace all the consequences, however remote, contingent, or speculative, which might be shown to have resulted from a failure to perform a stipulated duty, would seriously hinder the operation of business and make ordinary commercial intercourse impossible. What damages will be considered the natural and proximate consequence of the injury, or of the breach of duty, and what damages will be considered remote, contingent, and speculative, is one difficult of decision; but Keuny v. Collier, supra, disposes of the difficulty in the instant case. Equity follows the law. Remote, contingent, and speculative damages resulting from the breach of contract, which cannot be recovered at law because remote, contingent, and speculative, can furnish no ground for the intervention of a court of equity upon the theory that such damages, if recoverable, would be incapable of exact computation. Compare Silver v. Sparta, 107 Ga. 275, opinion, at bottom of page 280, 33 S. E. 31. In the instant case Purcell is not alleged to be insolvent. There is no proof of his insolvency. Having elected to breach his contract, he must suffer the legal consequences. He is solvent and able to respond. No injunction can be allowed upon the ground that the plaintiff lessee could not estimate the amount of his earnings. If he could estimate them, he could not have them.

Was the injunction authorized upon the theory that Purcell could not "recover at law for the damage to his existing business in the adjoining building produced by the competing billiard and pool room conducted by Purcell (and the other defendant) in the leased premises in Purcell's store"? Did Purcell engage to protect the business of Pilgrim? He expressly stipulated in his lease that the floor space should be used for the purpose of conducting a billiard and pool room. He did not make the lease directly to Pilgrim. At the date of the execution of the lease Pilgrim was conducting a billiard and pool room in an adjoining building. It turned out that Purcell's lessee assigned the lease to Pilgrim. Can it be said that Purcell contemplated the protection of Pilgrim's business, when, by the terms of his lease, he required the operation of a business in direct competition with Pilgrim's business? Contracts in the nature of contracts in restraint of trade are not favored; and no implied covenant binding Purcell not to engage in any particular business for the protection of one who chanced to become the owner of the lease executed by him can be read into the lease. Particularly is this true when the lease, as stated above, called for the establishment of a business to be carried on in direct competition with Pilgrim's existing business. In no view of the case, as we think, was the interlocutory injunction authorized.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1921.)

1. Dower ⚡10—"Dower" defined.

"Dower is the right of a wife to an estate for life in one-third of the lands, according to valuation, including the dwelling house (which is not to be valued unless in a town or city), of which the husband was seized and possessed at the time of his death, or to which the husband obtained title in right of his wife." Civ. Code 1910, § 5247.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dower.]

2. Wills ⚡88(2)—Intention test as to character of instrument; "deed;" "will."

"In all cases to determine the character of an instrument, whether it is testamentary or not, the test is the intention of the maker, from the whole instrument, read in the light of the surrounding circumstances. If such intention be to convey a present estate, though the possession be postponed until after his death, the instrument is a deed; if the intention be to convey an interest accruing and having effect only after his death, it is a will." Civ. Code 1910, § 3828.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deed; Will.]

3. Dower ⚡44—Husband may convey land for purpose of defeating dower.

"There being in this state no statute inhibiting the sale of land by the husband to defeat his wife's right of dower, save as to lands to which the title came through her, an actual sale and conveyance, though made for the purpose of defeating dower, will be upheld in favor of the purchaser against the widow's claim after her husband's death." Flowers v. Flowers, 89 Ga. 632, 15 S. E. 834, 18 L. R. A. 75.

(a) In this respect a voluntary conveyance stands upon the same footing and has the same effect as a conveyance based on an actual sale. Pruett v. Cowsart, 136 Ga. 758, 72 S. E. 30. In the case last cited, it was held, in part, that a voluntary conveyance by a husband, of land in which he had an undivided interest as an heir of a former wife, would defeat the claim of dower asserted by a second wife after his death, notwithstanding that such conveyance recited that a part of its consideration was that the grantor was to remain in possession of the land and receive the benefits therefrom as long as he lived.

4. Dower ⚡44—Conveyance of land to children held to defeat wife's right of dower.

On August 24, 1916, G. W. D. Harber, a widower 65 years of age, married May Harber, a widow 44 years old. At the time of the marriage Harber had a large estate, consisting of both realty and personalty, and 9 children by a former wife, who died about one year previously to the second marriage. Under such circumstances Harber made a will in January, 1917. Being subsequently informed by his attorney at law that his will could not defeat the right to dower in the real estate of which he might die seized and possessed, Harber proceeded, for the avowed purpose of preventing his widow (should his wife survive him) from taking dower in his lands, to convey all of it separately to his children. There were 10 deeds executed and delivered at different dates between March 21 and April 12, 1919. The deeds were in the form of warranty deeds, some of which purported to convey the fee to the first taker; some provided a life estate in the first taker, with remainder over; some were to trustees for the use of persons not sui juris; all but one contained substantially the clause: "The grantor is to have the full control of the above-described lands, and is to receive the rents and profits from the same for and during his natural life, and at his death the grantees above named are to do as they see fit with said land or the rents and profits from the same; while the fee-simple title to the above tracts of land is passed by this deed, the enjoyment of the same is postponed until after the death of the grantor." Each deed recited as the consideration "$5 and love and affection." After all of the deeds were executed and delivered, Harber executed another will dated May 14, 1919. Item 2 of this will provided: "I give and bequeath unto my wife, May Harber (she being my second wife), during her lifetime or widowhood only, the income or interest from twelve thousand dollars, and at her death or marriage the corpus or principal to revert back to my children mentioned in item 12 of this my will. This twelve thousand dollars is to be invested by my executors hereinafter named in good stocks, bonds, or real estate, and I desire my executors to confer with her about what property she would prefer it to be invested in; however my executors are not bound to invest said sum in such property that she may prefer; this to be in full of all claims of every kind that she may have against my estate in way of dower or child's part, and she is not to account for any money or property I have already given her." Item 10 provided: "In view of the fact that I have heretofore deeded certain real estate to certain of my children, as will appear from the deeds, in order to do equity between all the grantees in said deeds, I desire and direct the value of $40 per acre be placed on all the lands so deeded, except the Barber and Eberhart places, and that the values of the Barber place shall be $100 per acre and the Eberhart place shall be $65 per acre, and that the grantees under said deeds shall contribute to each other on the above basis, so that they shall all receive equal values under said deeds." Harber died on February 11, 1920, and his widow claimed a right to dower in all the land described in the several deeds, on the basis that the deeds were fraudulent and void as against her; and being so, Harber died seized and possessed of the lands within the meaning of the law of this state relating to dower, so that she acquired a dower interest in the land. Held, applying the foregoing principles of law to the evidence submitted on the hearing before the judge, there being no evidence tending to show that the voluntary conveyances were parts of a mere colorable transaction, and not intended to convey in presenti the title and ownership of the grantor to the grantees, with the right of possession postponed until after the death of the grantor, the judge erred in granting an interlocutory injunction restraining the grantees in the conveyances from selling or encumbering the lands.

5. Admissibility of evidence immaterial.

The foregoing rulings are controlling without regard to the admissibility of certain evidence which the court admitted.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County;
J. B. Jones, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of G. W. D. Harber, deceased. Suit by May Harber against W. J. Harber, and owners, for injunction, and to establish right to dower in certain lands. From a judgment for plaintiff, W. Y. Harber and others bring error. Reversed.

W. W. Stark and E. C. Stark, both of Commerce, and A. C. Wheeler, of Gainesville, for plaintiffs in error.

H. H. Perry and W. A. Charters, both of Gainesville, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment reversed.
All the Justices concur.

GEORGIA SOUTHWESTERN & G. R. CO. v. GEORGIA-ALABAMA POWER CO. et al.
(No. 2354.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Exceptions, bill of ¶12—Bill of exceptions not dismissed because brief of evidence was not brought to Supreme Court.

In a suit for damages and to enjoin a continuing nuisance, where the defendant's answer raised several issues of fact on which evidence was introduced at an interlocutory hearing, a bill of exceptions assigning error on the judgment refusing to enjoin temporarily the alleged nuisance, in which it is stated that the judgment was based on the sole ground that "the injunction prayed for would be mandatory in its nature, and no injunction can be granted plaintiff which is not mandatory," and that as to all other matters he held with the plaintiff, and the bill of exception states that "no evidence was introduced by either side as to what acts defendants would have to perform if the injunction were granted," and that "none of the evidence introduced before said judge is material to elucidate the error complained of in this bill of exceptions," the bill of exceptions will not be dismissed, on motion of the defendant in error, on the ground that the brief of the evidence submitted at the interlocutory hearing was not brought to the Supreme Court. Civ. Code 1910, § 6140; Lamar v. Gardner, 113 Ga. 781, 39 S. E. 498. In such case the allegations in the petition and admissions in the answer may be considered as a basis for the judge's decision, and the question as to the correctness of the judge's ruling that the injunction prayed for would be mandatory will be decided on the basis of the pleadings.

2. Injunction ¶5—Injunction prayed for held not mandatory in its nature.

Where a power company maintains a dam equipped with floodgates across a stream, which causes water to overflow and pond under a bridge of a railroad company further up the stream, continuance of which will injure the supporting piers of the bridge and render it unsafe, and the depth of the water is such as to render impossible the making of repairs or the renewal of the piers, an order restraining the power company from continuously maintaining the overflow under the railroad bridge so high as to prevent the railroad company from making reasonable and necessary repairs to the piers would not amount to a mandatory injunction, although in order to obey such restraining order it might be necessary for the power company to open the floodgates in the dam at intervals for the purpose of enabling the railroad company to make reasonable and necessary repairs to the bridge. Goodrich v. Georgia R. Co., 115 Ga. 340, 41 S. E. 659; Macon, Dublin & Savannah R. Co. v. Graham, 117 Ga. 555, 43 S. E. 1000; Mackenzie v. Minis, 132 Ga. 323, 63 S. E. 900, 23 L. R. A. 1003, 16 Ann. Cas. 723; Oostanaula Mining Co. v. Miller, 145 Ga. 90, 88 S. E. 562; Sweetman v. Owens, 147 Ga. 436, 94 S. E. 542.

3. Error—refusing injunction.

Under the admissions of the pleadings, the judgment would have been authorized to grant an injunction of the nature stated in this note; and it was erroneous to hold as a matter of law that an injunction that was not mandatory could not be granted, and on such basis alone to refuse any injunction.

Gilbert and George, JJ., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Dougherty County; John R. Wilson, Judge.

Action by the Georgia Southwestern & Gulf Railroad Company and others against the Georgia-Alabama Power Company and others. From judgment for defendants, the named plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. H. Beckham, of Albany, R. J. Bacon, of Baconton, and R. H. Ferrell and Pope & Bennet, all of Albany, for plaintiff in error.

Milner & Farkas, of Albany, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., absent, and—

GILBERT and GEORGE, JJ. (dissenting.) This was a suit for injunction. The answer of the defendant did not admit facts which would have authorized the grant of an interlocutory injunction. The interlocutory injunction was denied, and the judge in his order based his refusal of the injunction upon the ground that the injunction sought was mandatory. The exception is to the refusal to grant the interlocutory injunction. The error assigned depends upon a consideration of the evidence introduced upon the hearing; and since no attempt has been made to bring the evidence to this court, it results that the judgment should be affirmed. If the evidence had been brought to this court, and if upon a consideration of the evidence it appeared that the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction either as a matter of law or in the discretion of the court, it would follow, under the decision in Head v. Bridges, 72 Ga. 30, and other like cases, that the judgment refusing the injunction should be reversed. In the absence of any brief of evidence, this court is unable to say that an injunction would have been authorized in any event; and therefore the question as to whether the relief prayed was mandatory in character is necessarily an abstract question, which may never arise in the case; and neither party should be concluded upon that question in the present state of the record.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Remainders ⚡17(4)—Venue ⚡22(3)—Defendants held properly joined and sued in proper county.

Under the allegations in the petition it appears that both of the defendants had such an interest in the litigation as to render them proper and necessary parties to the proceeding for equitable relief; and, as substantial relief was prayed against one of the defendants residing in the county where the suit was brought, the court of that county had jurisdiction also of the codefendant.

2. Wills ⚡88(3)—Instrument held a deed.

The court below properly construed the instrument, which is the basis of the defendant's claim of right and interest in the property in controversy, to be a deed.

3. Estoppel ⚡29(1)—Life tenants of corporate stock estopped to deny instrument to be deed.

Under the facts of the case the life tenants were estopped from denying that the instrument referred to was effective to convey the interest sought to be set up and established.

4. Demurrer; ruling.

The other grounds of the demurrer were properly overruled.

5. Life estates ⚡15(2)—Substituted corporate stock became part of corpus.

"The natural increase of the property belongs to the tenant for life. Any extraordinary accumulation of the corpus—such as issue of new stock upon the share of an incorporated or joint-stock company—attaches to the corpus and goes with it to the remainderman." Civ. Code 1910, § 3867. In applying this statute to the evidence in the case it is held that what is known as the Massachusetts rule upon this subject prevails in this state; and while the trial judge, to whom the entire case was referred upon the trial without the intervention of a jury, sought to apply this rule, he erred in the material ruling of holding that a decree in a case in the Supreme Court of New York, to which the present plaintiffs were not parties, was a final determination of the character of numerous items in the statement of the property constituting the estate in which the plaintiffs here claim a remainder interest. The character of the items referred to should have been determined by the trial judge under the law and the evidence in the case, and the court erred in holding that the decision of the Supreme Court of New York was a conclusive adjudication as to the items making up the account, as the plaintiffs in the instant case were not parties to that case; and, moreover, it does not appear from this record that the decree or judgment referred to as conclusive was introduced in evidence, and therefore properly before the court for consideration.

6. Disposition on appeal.

As the case, under the foregoing ruling, is remanded for a new trial, in case the evidence upon the next trial fails to show that Mrs. W. S. McHenry was appointed administratrix of W. S. McHenry, then she cannot be proceeded against as the administratrix of her deceased husband, and the suit can only proceed against her upon the other allegations of her being the widow and the sole heir of W. S. McHenry, together with the allegations of her having taken charge of the property.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Action by Z. H. McHenry and another against Mrs. W. S. McHenry and others. From an adverse judgment, the named defendant brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiffs, Zoe Harriotte McHenry and Marion Louise Hickey (formerly McHenry), who are the only children of John G. McHenry, the defendants in error in this court, brought a petition against John G. McHenry, of Morgan county, and Mrs. W. S. McHenry, of Floyd county, this state. By amendment John G. McHenry was made a party defendant both in his individual capacity and as the surviving administrator of the estate of Mrs. Marion McHenry Bozeman, and Mrs. W. S. McHenry was made a party defendant both in her individual capacity and as the personal representative of the estate of W. S. McHenry. Petitioners sought to have their rights as remaindermen in certain stock ascertained and declared. The character of this stock and the source and origin of plaintiffs' claim of title are also set forth in the petition. Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief to restrain the defendants from selling, transferring, or disposing in any manner of the stock described in the petition, or altering its status. In an amendment the plaintiffs further prayed that the rights of petitioners be ascertained and declared in the assets received by W. S. McHenry and J. G. McHenry from the estate of Marion McHenry Bozeman and from the committee of her property, the New York Trust Company, and in certain other property involved in the transaction. There was a prayer for injunction and receiver, and also a prayer for general relief.

It is alleged in the petition that John G. McHenry is the surviving administrator of the estate of Mrs. Marion Bozeman, deceased; that he and W. S. McHenry, the husband of Mrs. W. S. McHenry, were appointed and qualified as such administrators in 1918; that W. S. McHenry died intestate thereafter, in April, 1919, without descendants, leaving the defendant Mrs. W. S. McHenry his sole heir at law; that Mrs. McHenry as such widow and sole heir at law had taken possession of all the estate of W. S. McHenry without administration; that Mrs. Marion Bozeman, who before her marriage was Marion McHenry, the sister of John G. and W. S. McHenry, in the year 1886 obtained, from the grandmother of the three, certain shares of stock in a corporation of the state of Alabama, then known as Elyton Land Company, the same owning the lands on which the city of Birmingham was afterwards largely built; that "dissatisfaction existing in the family thereabout, the same was adjusted and settled by an agreement respecting the stock, which was embodied in a certain deed of conveyance of said stock, whereby the rights therein both of their grandmother, Mrs. Eliza Stokes, and said Marion McHenry, John G. and W. S. McHenry, and their children were fixed and declared." This deed reads as follows:

"Georgia, Morgan County. Know all men by these presents, that I, Marion McHenry, of said county and state, for and in consideration of the natural love and affection I have for my brothers, William S. McHenry and John G. McHenry, Jr., both of the county and state aforesaid, do hereby give, grant, and convey to them in severalty, and not as joint tenants, twelve and a half shares of the stock of Elyton Land Company of the state of Alabama, now standing in my name on the stock of said company, the same having been given and transferred to me by my grandmother, Eliza Stokes, of said county of Morgan and state of Georgia, with the understanding that one-third part of all the dividends declared on said stock should be paid to the said Eliza Stokes as long as she may live, and no longer. And I hereby declare that in making this conveyance, the right of said Eliza Stokes to receive the one-third of said dividends during her life is secured and to be respected; and should I die before my said grandmother, her right to one-third of the dividends on said stock shall not be impaired. I convey hereby to each of my said brothers, William S. and John G., Jr., six and one-fourth shares of the stock of said company provided I die without leaving a child or children living at my death to receive one-third part of the said six and one-fourth shares so given, as to reduce each brother's part to four and a fraction shares, and the other equal part to the amount last mentioned to become the property of whomsoever by law would be entitled as my heir or heirs in fee. But should I die leaving no such child or children living, who would be entitled to inherit the said one-third part of said twelve and a half shares of said stock, then the whole of said stock or shares is hereby conveyed in equal part to my said brothers separately for life, and to such child or children as he may leave living at his death to take his share in remainder in fee simple. Should either of my said brothers die leaving no child or children at his death to take his part of said shares in remainder, then the survivor of my said brothers to take the parts of both whatever these amount to, with remainder over to such child or children as the survivor may have living at his death in fee. But in making this conveyance it is agreed by the said Marion McHenry and her said two brothers that she hereby reserves to herself the full and absolute right to receive, use, and appropriate all dividends that may be declared during her life upon the twelve and a half shares of said stock, in the same manner as she has heretofore done, that is, allowing one-third of said dividends to be paid to the said Eliza Stokes and the said Marion receiving two-thirds so long as her said grandmother may live, and afterwards the entire dividends to the exclusion of all persons.

"In witness whereof after making the erasures in line one on the second page, and in the interlineation on said page in line eight and thirteen, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 11 day of December, 1886." "Marion McHenry (Seal)" Executed in the presence of F. C. Foster, Joshua Hill, Thos. B. Baldwin, Ordinary Morgan Co., Ga. Recorded Dec. 11, 1886, C. W. C. W. Baldwin, Clerk."

The original deed, it is alleged, went into the hands of W. S. McHenry; and plaintiffs pray that the said McHenry be required to produce the same in court at the trial of the case. Plaintiffs contend that by the terms of this deed, after the death of Mrs. Eliza Stokes, which occurred in the year 1888, Mrs. Marion Bozeman was to have the dividends from the stock during her life and in the event she died without children, as she did on the 27th day of September, 1917, the stock was to pass to John G. and W. S. McHenry for their lives, and should either die leaving no child or children, then the survivor was to take the whole for life, with remainder over to such child or children in fee as such survivor might have living at his death; and they further contend that, John G. McHenry having survived his brother W. S. McHenry, the latter having died without leaving child or children, they, the petitioners as the children of the said John G., are the presumptive remaindermen of said stock. The petitioners further show, by the allegations of the petition as amended, that in March, 1888, the Elyton Land Company divided among its stockholders, including said Mrs. Bozeman, certain stock which it owned and held, and by virtue of said division transferred to Mrs. Bozeman  $14\frac{1}{2}$  shares of stock of the Birmingham Trust & Savings Company, a corporation of Alabama, hereinafter referred to as the Birmingham Trust Company. This stock remained in the control and possession of Mrs. Bozeman till her death, and she received the dividends thereof. She became insane about the year 1895, and the New York Trust Company became her guardian or committee of her property, and later sold the one-half share for her benefit. The remaining 14 shares are still on hand, and have been issued in the names of John G. and W. S. McHenry. The Elyton Land Company, prior to March, 1888, owned \$200,000 of the capital stock of the Birmingham Trust Company, having acquired the same as an original subscriber to the stock; and in March, 1888, the Elyton Land Company, wishing to make a distribution of its assets among its stockholders, distributed to each of them one share of the capital stock in the Birmingham Trust Company for each share of stock held by the subscriber in the Elyton Land Company, and Mrs. Bozeman received as her portion of the distribution of the assets of the Elyton Land Company the  $14\frac{1}{2}$  shares of the capital stock of the Birmingham Trust Company; and it is alleged that said distribution by the Elyton Land Company was a division of the corpus of the estate of said company among the shareholders. It is further alleged that by successive reorganizations substitution for the original stock in the Elyton Land Company has been made by stock in what is now called the Birmingham Realty Company, 137 shares having been issued to Mrs. Bozeman therein as representing her interest in the company reorganized. Said 137 shares have been likewise in her possession or that of her guardian for her till her death, and she received the dividends therefrom. Since her death the stock has been transferred into the names of John G. and W. S. McHenry.

The Elyton Land Company made a distribution of its assets in the year 1887 or 1888, by issuing to its stockholders 6 per cent. bonds, said company owning as a part of its assets a large amount of purchase-money notes representing the sale of real estate owned by said company, and said bonds were secured by bonds issued against the purchase-money notes referred to. When said bonds became due the company defaulted in the payment of the same about the year 1895, and in order to meet said payment "the Elyton Land Company was reorganized into the Elyton Company, said Elyton Company receiving all the assets of the Elyton [Land] Company," and said Elyton Company issued 10 shares of its own stock for every one share of the Elyton Land Company to each stockholder in the last-named company, and substituted its own bonds at 5 per cent. in place of and to retire the bonds of the Elyton Land Company. The Elyton Company defaulted in the payment of its bonds that were issued in substitution of the Elyton Land Company, and said Elyton Company reorganized into the Birmingham Realty Company, a corporation, said Birmingham Realty Company taking over the assets of the Elyton Company and issuing to the stockholders of the Elyton Company its own stock and bonds in substitution of the stock and bonds held by the stockholders in the Elyton Company. Mrs. Bozeman received, in substitution for the stocks and bonds held in the Elyton Company, 137 shares of common stock of the par value of $100, 78 shares of preferred stock of the par value of $100, and $7,000 of 5 per cent. bonds of the Birmingham Realty Company. This last reorganization occurred on February 8, 1900.

It is also contended that the 14 shares of stock in the Birmingham Trust Company and 137 shares of stock in the Birmingham Realty Company represent the corpus of the stock of the Elyton Land Company mentioned in said deed of 1888, set forth above, and are in equity impressed with the same limitations and uses, and are the property of petitioners in remainder as provided in said deed; that the estate of Mrs. Marion Bozeman is indebted for and liable for petitioners' interest in the half share of the former stock which was sold as aforesaid, said half share being of the present value of $125; that on October 17, 1908, the New York Trust Company, the duly authorized and acting committee of the property of Marion McHenry Bozeman, sold the 78 shares of preferred stock in the Birmingham Realty Company hereinbefore referred to, and received therefor the sum of $7,800, and likewise, on August 15, 1904, sold the bonds of said Birmingham Realty Company above mentioned for the sum of $7,000; that said New York Trust Company reinvested the money derived from the stocks and bonds in first mortgages, loan certificates, and other valuable securities, holding and treating the same as the principal of the estate of said Mrs. Bozeman and turning over to the committee of the property for the support of said Mrs. Bozeman the income therefrom; that after her death these securities, or the money derived therefrom, were turned over to the duly appointed administrators of the estate of Mrs. Bozeman, to wit, W. S. and John G. McHenry; that the funds so received by them were in law and in fact not the estate of Mrs. Bozeman, but were controlled by and subject to the limitations of the deed referred to and set forth above; that W. S. and J. G. McHenry, in absolute disregard of the limitations imposed upon said securities, undertook to divide the same among themselves, and after the death of W. S. McHenry his widow, Mrs. W. S. McHenry, also disregarded petitioners' rights in said property, and J. G. McHenry and Mrs. W. S. McHenry have now possession and control of said property and are undertaking to hold the same in utter disregard of petitioners' remainder interest thereunder as created by the deed referred to.

Petitioners show that it is the duty of J. G. and Mrs. McHenry to account to them for said sums as remaindermen, and they are liable therefor both in their individual capacities and as administrator and administratrix, respectively, of the estates of Mrs. Marion McHenry Bozeman and W. S. McHenry; that the Elyton Land Company was the sole owner of the entire capital stock of the Birmingham Water Company, and the Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad, of Birmingham, Ala.; that on or about the year 1887 or 1888, and subsequently to 1886, said Elyton Land Company again made a distribution of some of its assets, by turning over to its stockholders all its capital stock in said companies; that Marion McHenry Bozeman received as her distributive share 36 and a fraction shares of the capital stock of the Birmingham Water Company and 76 and a fraction shares of the capital stock in the railroad company referred to. Said shares of stock were held by the New York Trust Company, as committee of the property of Mrs. Bozeman, until "the ——— day of October, 189—," at which time the same was sold, the water company's stock bringing something over $3,000, and the railroad stock bringing between $300 and $400. Said stock was treated by said committee as corpus of the estate of Mrs. Bozeman, the income thereof being used for her support and maintenance; the proceeds from the sale thereof were invested by said committee of the property of said New York Trust Company in other securities, such as stock, bonds, or loan certificates, the same being held in the place of the original stock, and after the death of Mrs. Bozeman they were turned over to J. G. and W. S. McHenry as administrators of the estate of Mrs. Bozeman. Said substituted securities or their equivalent in cash, are now in the possession, custody, and control of the defendants, they having divided the same among themselves, and claiming title thereto in disregard of petitioners' rights and in disregard of the limitations placed thereon in the deed set forth above. Petitioners attach to their petition a copy of the securities at the time of the death of Mrs. Bozeman turned over to the said administrators. It is also alleged that the Birmingham Realty Company, the successor of the Elyton Land Company and the Elyton Company, distributed, between November 3, 1908, and May 20, 1918, certain "liquidation dividends" amounting to a total of $3,562, which the petitioners allege was a part of the corpus and which went into the hands of the committee of the property of Mrs. Bozeman, who treated said funds as a corpus of her estate and not as income, and turned it over, upon the death of Mrs. Bozeman, to the defendants. It is further alleged that a part of the assets received from the estate of Mrs. Bozeman by W. S. and John G. McHenry, a portion of which had been divided between them, had gone into the hands of Mrs. W. S. McHenry; that this property had not been kept separate by her, but had been mingled with other property that she had received as sole heir at law and as the sole representative of her deceased husband.

Mrs. McHenry demurred to this petition, both generally and specially upon numerous grounds. It is unnecessary to set forth in detail the grounds of the demurrer. The rulings made in the opinion substantially cover them. Mrs. McHenry also filed her plea and answer, admitting certain of the facts alleged in the petition, and denying others. The demurrers were overruled by the court, to which ruling the defendant excepted. Evidence was submitted upon the issues made by the pleadings, and the case was submitted to the court upon the law and facts without the intervention of a jury. After holding the case for consideration, the court rendered a judgment, which was in favor of the plaintiffs for most of the material issues in the case, and the defendant Mrs. W. S. McHenry excepted.

Maddox & Doyal, of Rome, and R. J. Bacon, of Baconton, for plaintiff in error.

King & Spalding and Spalding, MacDougald & Sibley, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The first ground of the demurrer filed by Mrs. W. S. McHenry raises the question as to whether the superior court of Morgan county had jurisdiction of the defendant, the demurrant contending that she was improperly sued in that county. This ground of the demurrer was properly overruled. The plaintiffs are asserting a common right against both defendants; that is, the right of the remaindermen to have their interest declared in the described property and to have the property protected against waste. Section 5417 of the Civil Code provides that—

"Generally all persons interested in the litigation should be parties to proceedings for equitable relief."

And section 5419 declares that—

"Where there is one common right to be established by or against several, and one is asserting the right against many, or many against one, equity will determine the whole matter in one action."

While the case of Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 28 S. E. 97, is itself based upon a different state of facts from those involved here, the discussion in that case of the question of multifariousness and the authorities there cited illustrate and justify the ruling which we have made, and render a discussion and citation of authorities unnecessary. See, also, the case of Blaisdell v. Bohr, 68 Ga. 56. As substantial relief was prayed against one of the defendants residing in the county where the suit was brought, the court of that county had jurisdiction also of the codefendant.

[2] 2. The ground of the demurrer raising the question as to the character of the written document which is the basis of the suit, the demurrant contending that it was testamentary in character and not shown to have been probated as required by law, was also properly overruled. The instrument in question employs the language of a deed. It is recited that the grantor doth by the instrument "give, grant and convey" to the named grantees certain property; and it is also declared that—

"In making this conveyance it is agreed by the said Marion McHenry [the grantor] and her said two brothers [the grantees] that she hereby reserves to herself the full and absolute right to use, receive, and appropriate all dividends that may be declared during her life upon the 12½ shares of said stock [the property conveyed] in the same manner as she has heretofore done."

Elaborate argument is entirely unnecessary to show that the very material provision, the reservation of the right to receive and use the dividends during the life of the grantor, is entirely inconsistent with the idea that the instrument is testamentary in character. Other features of the instrument might also be pointed out which bear out the conclusion here reached, but we think that unnecessary.

[3] 3. The grantees in this deed are estopped from denying, as against the remaindermen, that the instrument was operative as a deed, on the ground that it conveyed a mere contingency and there is no provision as to the disposition of the property in case of the failure of the contingency contemplated. The deed itself was found among the papers, as the demurrant admits, of her husband, of whom she is the sole heir; and there are allegations to show that he at the time of his death was in possession of at least a part of the property conveyed by this deed; that there was acceptance by the life tenants of the interest in the property conveyed by the deed.

[4] 4. The general demurrer was properly overruled. The allegations of the petition show an interest in the remaindermen in at least a part of the property in controversy, which entitles them to the protection sought; and the allegations of the petition as amended are not open to the exception made in the special demurrers, that they are vague, uncertain, and insufficient. The character of the property, the way in which it was changed by substitution for other shares of stock than those which were originally held, and the reorganizations of companies which issued the shares of stock, the issuance of bonds, etc., and all the other material incidents in the history of the property sought to be impressed with the trust, are set forth with sufficient clearness and exactness to enable the parties defendant and the court to clearly understand the character of the property involved and the rights which the petitioners in the case insist that they have in the property. It may be that there are certain allegations, wherein certain claims are made in regard to the property, that are mere conclusions of the pleader and not statements of facts; but they are not of such materiality or weight as to require a reversal of the judgment because of the court's refusal to strike those conclusions, and in most cases where these conclusions are stated as a part of the pleadings they aid in making clearer the plaintiffs' contentions as to the rights which they pray the court to have ascertained and settled.

[5] 5. The property which was conveyed by the deed which we have heretofore considered, was, as we have seen, 12½ shares of the stock of the Elyton Land Company, standing at the time of the execution of the deed in the name of the grantor, Mrs. Bozeman, on the books of the company. Of this property, the shares of stock, W. S. and John G. McHenry (Mrs. Bozeman having died in 1917, without leaving a child) became the life tenants, and John G. became the sole life tenant upon the death of his brother, W. S. McHenry, leaving no child. The rights of the life tenant in the property are fixed and defined by our statute, which declares:

"The natural increase of the property belongs to the tenant for life. Any extraordinary accumulation of the corpus—such as issue of new stock upon the share of an incorporated or joint-stock company—attaches to the corpus and goes with it to the remainderman." Civil Code, § 3667.

Had the property conveyed by the deed remained in its original form, many of the questions presented in this record could not have arisen; but it did not. The Elyton Land Company was reorganized; stock in other companies was substituted wholly or in part for the original shares of stock. Divisions and distributions of funds arising from the assets of the corporation were made. Some of these distributions were unquestionably dividends paid over to and enjoyed by the grantor in the deed under the rights preserved in that instrument. Other distributions were made about which there is a contest here as to whether they were really dividends or a distribution of the corpus of the estate of the corporation. The correct decision of these questions depends upon an application of the law to the facts in the case. The law constituting the rule under which the question as to whether certain portions of the property in controversy should be deemed corpus or income has been declared in this state by a decision of this court. In the case of Jackson v. Maddox, 136 Ga. 31, 70 S. E. 865, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1216, Chief Justice Fish, speaking for the court, said:

"There are two lines of authority on the subject of whether shares so issued become part of the corpus, or whether they rank as dividends and belong to the life tenant. One of these lines of authority will be found illustrated by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 10 Sup. Ct. 1057, 34 L. Ed. 525, and of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Minot v. Paine, 99 Mass. 101, 96 Am. D. 705. The other line may be represented by Earp's Appeal, 28 Pa. 368; Pritchard v. Nashville Trust Co., 96 Tenn. 472, 36 S. W. 1064, 33 L. R. A. 856, and Hite v. Hite, 93 Ky. 257, 20 S. W. 778, 19 L. R. A. 173, 40 Am. St. R. 189. When the law of this state was codified, in view of the older English cases and of such decisions as had then been made in America, one of these lines of authority had to be selected as containing the correct rule. The codifiers in substance selected the first of the two rules mentioned above. As formulated in the present Code (Civ. Code 1910, § 3667), the rule is thus stated: 'The natural increase of the property belongs to the tenant for life. Any extraordinary accumulation of the corpus, such as an issue of new stock upon the shares of an incorporated or joint-stock company, attaches and goes with it to the remainderman.'"

In brief, it is here declared that our state by the statute quoted above has adopted what is known as the Massachusetts rule upon the subject under consideration. What is known as the Massachusetts rule is thus stated in 14 Corpus Juris, 831, § 1260:

"The Massachusetts courts have adopted the rule that whether a dividend is to be regarded as income, and as such the property of the life tenant, or as capital belonging to the person entitled to the remainder interest in the stock, is to be determined by the substance and intent of the action of the corporation in declaring the dividend; in other words, if the action of the corporation manifests an intention, so far as it is concerned, no longer to treat its surplus profits as income, but, to the extent of the dividend, as a part of its permanent capital, the dividend, as between the life tenant and the remainderman, is to be considered as a distribution of capital, and where the effect and intent of the declaration is a permanent separation of its surplus profits, to the amount of the dividend, from the capital used in its business, it is to be considered, as between such term holders, as income. The view taken by the Massachusetts courts has been followed in a number of jurisdictions; and in Georgia the substance of the rule has been enacted by statute. It follows that where this rule obtains, regardless of the time the profits out of which they are made accumulate or were earned, all stock dividends are to be considered as capital belonging to the remainderman, and all cash dividends are to be regarded as income belonging to the holder of the life term. However, if the action of the corporation in declaring a dividend amounts in substance to a declaration of a stock dividend, its character as a distribution of capital is not affected by the fact that the dividend is in form a cash dividend. But the fact that an increase of the capital stock of a corporation is voted the same day as a cash dividend, to which increase the stockholder is entitled to subscribe, does not impress the transaction with the character of a stock dividend, if the stockholder is entitled to receive his dividend and to use it as he sees fit, and is at liberty to dispose of his rights to subscribe for the new stock. And a dividend made payable in stock or in cash at the option of the stockholder is a cash dividend."

And we think that the court in rendering the judgment complained of here was right in applying the rule to the facts in this case in determining the rights of the parties. Under that rule the substitution of other stock and the distribution of such substituted stock to the holders of stock in the Elyton Land Company in designated proportions brought the substituted stock within the rule here laid down and made it a part of the corpus of the estate, and it became impressed with the trust in favor of the remaindermen. Such in character were the shares of stock of the Birmingham Trust & Savings Company, which the Elyton Land Company held and owned and in March, 1888, divided among its stockholders; such, also, were the 187 shares of the common stock of the Birmingham Realty Company and the 78 shares of the preferred stock of that company, which through successive reorganizations were substituted for the original stock of the Elyton Land Company. It is also applicable to the distribution of the capital stock of the Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company and the mortgage bonds of the Birmingham Waterworks Company, which were distributed in the proportions designated in the resolution adopted May 5, 1887. In this resolution it is provided that the stock last referred to and the bonds should be distributed as dividends.

The recital that it was distributed as dividends will not be controlling upon the court. The court will look to the substance of it. It was evidently a division of a part of the corpus of the corporation, and falls within the operation of the rule which we have pointed out. The same is true of the dividend declared and called liquidation dividends. And there are other items that clearly fall within the operation of this rule, which we will not now undertake to segregate and point out. We have pointed out merely those which are incontrovertibly a part of the corpus, to illustrate the rule which we have laid down, or, rather, which we have restated, as it has already been clearly laid down. All of the items in the accounting and the question as to whether each falls under the head of corpus or capital, or whether it is to be considered as dividends and income, can be taken up and dealt with by the court below on its next hearing; as we feel compelled to reverse the judgment of the court below because of its error in finding and holding that the "part of the property described in the pleadings which constitutes corpus and what part constitutes income is really settled in the suit between the New York Trust Company, as plaintiff, and Wm. S. and John G. McHenry, individually and as administrators of the estate of Mrs. Boze-man." No decree of that court is found in this record; and, if it were there, it would not be binding in this case. The plaintiffs in this case were not parties to that suit. There are many items in the return made by the committee of the property of Mrs. Boze-man. Some of these are designated as principal and some as income. Whether all of these items so designated as principal are a part of the corpus of the estate should have been adjudged by the trial court under the evidence submitted, and the proceeding in the New York Supreme Court should not have been considered as finally determining this question. As to certain of the items the finding is incontrovertibly right, as we have indicated above. But as to certain other items, consisting of bonds and cash, the question should have been determined as one of fact by the court below, and this court cannot undertake to decide it. And, as we have said above, we will not segregate those items about which there is no controversy, so as to uphold the judgment in part and reverse it as to the remainder, but the entire account between the parties should be considered as a whole, and a judgment rendered thereon in accordance with the rules of law which we have stated and the facts.

[6] 6. As the judgment is reversed upon another ground, in the event the evidence upon the next trial fails to show that Mrs. W. S. McHenry was appointed administratrix of

W. S. McHenry, then she cannot be proceeded against as the administratrix of her deceased husband, and the suit can only proceed against her upon the other allegations of her being the widow and the sole heir of W. S. McHenry, together with the allegations of her having taken charge of the property.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur.

CITY OF ALBANY v. GEORGIA-ALABAMA POWER CO. (No. 2247.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Corporations  $\S$ 582—Conveyance of property, contracts, etc., held not to import consolidation or merger.

A deed executed by one corporation to another, which purports to convey for a valuable consideration, reciting that it does "grant, bargain, sell, and convey to the party of the second part, its successors and assigns," all of its personal property and realty, "as well as franchises, contracts, rights, leases, and all accounts receivable," does not import consolidation or merger of the two corporations, but shows a sale of all the property of the grantor to the grantee.

2. Electricity  $\S$ 4 — Corporation purchasing property held not bound to fulfill terms of contract of grantor corporation.

Under the facts of the case the court did not err in holding that the purchasing corporation was not bound to fulfill the terms of the original contract between the vendor corporation and the municipality with which it had a contract for furnishing electric power.

3. Electricity  $\S$ 4 — Corporation purchasing property of another not estopped from denying it was bound by contract with city.

Nor did the court err in holding that no estoppel was shown, as against the purchasing corporation, from denying that it was bound by the terms of the original contract between the vendor corporation and the municipality, and asserting on the contrary that if it was bound by any contract it was the one under which it had operated from the time of its purchase, under the deed referred to, of the property of the first corporation up to the time the present controversy arose.

4. Appeal and error  $\S$ 781(1)—No dismissal unless case completely moot.

This case should not be dismissed on the ground that the questions are moot.

Error from Superior Court, Dougherty County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by the City of Albany against the Georgia-Alabama Power Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The city of Albany, plaintiff in the court below, by its petition against the Georgia-Alabama Power Company, sought to have the company enjoined from cutting off the electric current or power which it was alleged the company was then furnishing the city, under a contract, for the operation of the city's water and electric light and power plant, alleging that the company was demanding the immediate and unconditional payment in full of a bill for current, the amount of which was greatly in excess of what the city was authorized to pay, under the terms of the alleged contract; and that the company intended and was threatening to cut off the current or power being furnished the city if the entire bill was not paid; the city alleging that if the current or power was cut off the city's damage would be irreparable. The company filed its answer at the interlocutory hearing, and contended therein that its bill was correct, and offered in support of this defense an alleged contract between the city of Albany and the Albany Power & Manufacturing Company, which the defendant had succeeded, and which contract was subsequent to the original contract relied upon by the city, and was contended by the Albany Power & Manufacturing Company to have modified the original contract. The defendant produced this alleged subsequent contract and introduced the same in evidence. The city, by demurrer and objection to its admission in evidence, attacked the validity of this alleged subsequent contract, on various grounds. The court admitted the same in evidence. The original contract between the Albany Power & Manufacturing Company (hereinafter referred to as the Albany Power Company) and the city of Albany, and which is hereinafter referred to as the original contract, or the contract of 1904, embraces an agreement that upon the terms stated in the contract the Albany Power Company should furnish for a period of 17 years electrical power in a stipulated minimum amount to the municipality; and the contract also stipulates for the furnishing of additional power, and the rates at which this additional power was to be furnished. It is further agreed that the contract should be for a term of 17 years and become effective as soon as the power plant was installed and the company was in a position to furnish the power therein contracted for, not later than October 1, 1905; also, that the contract should be authorized at an election by the qualified voters of the city of Albany, as required by the Constitution of the state. Subsequently, in the year 1909, the Albany Power Company addressed the following communication to the city:

"R. P. Hall, Clerk, Hon. H. A. Tarver, Mayor, Albany, Ga.—Dear Sir: The Albany Power & Manufacturing Co. hereby agree to settle with the city of Albany for excess power on basis of 56 H. P. for 1908 and 60 H. P. for 1909, and that future settlements shall be made on basis of the average peak load above 300 H. P. The fire load coming on during the peak shall not be considered by the Power Co., but under such conditions the city agrees to throw off all power possible, so as to reduce it to the minimum. It is also understood and agreed that the city will come off of all motors which they are now operating in the city, and not to take on any more motors. Albany Power & Manufacturing Co., by Smith D. Pickett, President."

The city of Albany took action upon this communication, as shown by the following extracts from the minutes:

"Albany, Ga., Dec. 20th, 1909. Regular meeting adjourned from regular meeting on 14th day of December, 1909. Present—Mayor Tarver, Aldermen Kalmon, Jones, Ehrlich, and Sterne. Absent—Aldermen Vason and Rawlins. Mayor Tarver stated that the Albany Power & Manufacturing Company had agreed to settle with the city of Albany for excess power on basis of 56 H. P. for 1908 and 60 H. P. for 1909, and that future settlements shall be made on basis of the average peak load above 300 H. P. The fire load coming on during the peak shall not be considered by the power company, but under such conditions the city shall throw off all power possible so as to reduce it to the minimum, and the city to agree to cut off all motors which they are now operating in the city and not to take on any more. On motion the agreement was accepted by council, and the mayor was requested to have it drawn up in writing. No other business, council adjourned. Y. C. Rust, Clerk."

After hearing the case the court passed an interlocutory order denying the injunction, on the ground that it had not been shown that the contract relied upon by the city was binding on the defendant, as the original contract was between the city and a former company, to wit, the defendant's predecessor in title, and no legal merger of this former company and the defendant company had been shown. To this order or judgment the city excepted.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The court below properly held that there was no consolidation or merger of the two corporations, the Albany Power & Manufacturing Company and Georgia-Alabama Power Company. The instrument in writing introduced in the case, whereby the first-named party undertook to convey all of its property, that is, all of its realty and personalty, contracts, franchise, etc., was a deed of conveyance. It is evidence of a sale, and completed the sale and transfer of the property of the Albany Power Company to the Georgia-Alabama Power Company. There were no extraneous facts in evidence that required the trial judge hearing this case to find that the instrument was other than what it purports to be, a deed of conveyance; and we do not enter upon a discussion of the question as to whether or not such a conveyance as this might be shown to be a merger and consolidation of the two corporations by aliunde evidence tending to show that the grantee of the deed actually absorbed the grantor, or that the two were fused into a complete union. In so far as the evidence in this case shows, the Albany Power Company still maintains its corporate entity. In the case of State v. Atlantic & Gulf R. Co., 60 Ga. 268, it is said by this court that there may be a merger or consolidation of corporations in the following ways:

"First, by merger, or the extinction of one corporation, and the absorption of its stock, assets, etc., by the other. * * * Second, by coalescence, or the vital union of the two corporations, neither being extinguished, but their existence becoming joint and ceasing to be several. [Chief Justice Bleckley, delivering the opinion, said that there may be examples of this last mode, but he was unable at the time to cite any.] Third, by vital succession, or the extinction of both original corporations and the creation of a new one."

We do not think that under the rule here stated the present case falls under any one of the three ways in which a merger or consolidation of two corporations can be accomplished; and especially do we so conclude from the decision in the case of Hawkins v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 119 Ga. 159, 46 S. E. 82. In that case it was said:

"Where there has been no sale, but a merger, and no provision made for the payment of the debts of the absorbed company, the consolidated corporation is liable for the debts of the former, at least to the extent of the value of the property received. But where there has been a lawful and absolute sale of a railroad, the grantee is not responsible for the existing debts of the grantor."

The character of the transaction in the case of Hawkins v. R. R. Co., supra, held to be a sale and not a merger, is shown by the allegations of the petition and the portions of the deed set forth in the petition and as an exhibit thereto. The petition in that case alleged that on May 16, 1901, the Chattanooga Company sold to the Central Company, and made a deed (a copy of which was attached as an exhibit) conveying to it all of the railroad, real estate, personal property, rights, privileges, and franchises of, or belonging to, or thereafter to be acquired by, the Chattanooga Company; the consideration, according to the recitals in the deed, being $1,300,000 in 50-year 4 per cent. gold bonds of the Central Company, "the assumption by the Central Company of the current liabilities of the Chattanooga Company," and the payment of $5 in cash. It appears from the deed that the sale was made subject to mortgages for $2,743,000 on the property of the Chattanooga Company. It was alleged:

That "petitioner's claim for damages, under said deed and the agreement of consolidation in pursuance of which it was made, is covered in said deed, and * * * the Central Railway Company is directly liable to him for damages;" that "after said deed was made and delivered the Central Company took possession of said Chattanooga Company's entire line of railway," and of all its assets, both real and personal, "and took over also all the franchises of said Chattanooga Company, and are now in possession of the same, operating said line of railway;" that "said Chattanooga Company has gone out of existence; it has no line of railroad, no visible property of any kind, and has ceased to do business, having yielded up to the Central Company all its property, franchises, and rights, and it has no organization, no officers or agents, in the state of Georgia or elsewhere, so far as petitioner can find out, or so far as he is advised and believes."

The defendant filed a demurrer, and this was sustained. In the opinion which affirmed the judgment of the court below it was said:

"It was held (102 Ga. 443) that 'where a consolidation actually takes place between two companies under a written contract providing for the absorption of the one by the other, but making no provision for liabilities against the company which goes out of existence, these liabilities by operation of law become binding upon the new company to the extent of the assets of the absorbed company, or to the extent of the latter's ability to perform the contracts out of which such liability arose.' See, also, Morrison v. American Snuff Co., 79 Miss. 598, and note in 89 Am. St. Rep. 598. But this is not such a case. Here there was no merger, but an absolute sale, and the purchase price was paid. There is no suggestion of any fraud or attempt to hinder, delay, or defeat the creditors of the Chattanooga Company; no allegation that the price paid was less than the value of the property bought."

Numerous other cases closely analogous to the present case could be cited, showing that the sale by the Albany Power Company of all its property was not a merger of that company with the defendant in this case; but we deem it unnecessary. See, in this connection, 5 Thompson on Corp. (2d Ed.) §§ 6038, 6040, 6044, 6090, 6093, and cases cited under these sections; 10 Cyc. 308; 7 R. C. L. 183; also, the case of Vicksburg, etc., Tel. Co. v. Citizens' Tel. Co., 79 Miss. 341, 30 South. 725, 89 Am. St. Rep. 656.

[2] 2. There being no merger or consolidation of the companies, the trial court was right in holding that the defendant in the case was not bound by the contract originally entered into between the city of Albany and the Albany Power & Manufacturing Company, especially under the facts of the case. We will not stop to discuss whether or not, if there had not been a contract between the city of Albany and the Albany Power Company as to the terms upon which electrical power was to be furnished subsequently to the original contract entered into between these two parties in the year 1904, the Georgia-Alabama Power Company could be liable to carry out the terms of the original contract because of the fact that under the deed of conveyance it purchased the "contracts" of the Albany Power Company; for there was a modification of that original contract, or an attempted modification by the subsequent contract entered into between the mayor and council and the Albany Power Company. Even if the last contract between the city and the power company was not adopted with all the formalities and its execution attended with all the necessary formalities and solemnities, in substance it was in form substantially a contract between the parties and somewhat in the nature of an interpretation and modification of the original contract, and was treated and recognized by both parties as a contract for several years and up to the date of the sale effected by the execution of the deed hereinbefore referred to. And if the Georgia-Alabama Power Company took over the contracts of the Albany Power Company under such circumstances as to make it liable under the terms of those contracts, it seems clear that it would be bound by the terms of the contract as the two parties to the deed understood them to be. Even where there is a difference of intention between the parties to a contract, the meaning placed on the contract by one party and known to be thus understood by the other party at the time shall be held as the true meaning. Civil Code, § 4267. So far as concerns the present case, the judge below could well have found, if indeed he was not compelled to find, that the contract for the furnishing of electric power to the city, which the Albany Power Company sold and the Georgia-Alabama Power Company bought, was the contract as modified or interpreted by the contract of 1909.

[3] 3. Nor did the court below err in holding that the Georgia-Alabama Power Company is not estopped from denying that it was bound to continue to fulfill the contract, on the ground that it had furnished power under the contract for a number of years, or that it had thereby adopted and ratified the contract and was therefore bound by its terms. The judge was fully authorized to find, under the evidence, that the only contract the defendant had ratified and adopted or performed was the contract of 1909; and that could not be an adoption or performance according to the terms of the original contract.

[4] 4. The motion to dismiss on the ground that the questions involved are moot is overruled, as the showing that the questions are moot fails to show that they are completely so.

MANION v. VARN et al. (No. 2175.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Injunction  $\Leftrightarrow$  28—Proceeding for registration of land not temporarily enjoined under allegation that debt for which deed was given was discharged.

A proceeding under the Land Registration Act (Georgia Laws 1917, p. 108) should not have been temporarily enjoined at the instance of the grantor in the conveyance under which the applicant asserted title to the land, for the alleged reason that such instrument, though in form a warranty deed, was given to secure a debt which had been discharged, because the applicant for the registration, without authority, had appropriated to his own use timber growing on the land of value exceeding the amount of the debt, and for which, as was alleged, the applicant could not be brought to an accounting in such proceeding.

2. Injunction  $\Leftrightarrow$  28—Issue as to discharge of debt for which deed was given raised by cross-action in suit for registration.

Such issue could be raised in the suit for registration, by the filing of a cross-action thereto by the grantor in the conveyance, and the title registered in accordance with the decision on that issue.

BRIGHAM et al. v. MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF CITY OF DUBLIN. (No. 2285.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

1. Hospitals  $\S$  3—Charter authorized ordinance prescribing that hospital buildings be constructed of nonflammable material.

Under the charter granted by the general assembly to the city of Dublin authority was granted to the mayor and aldermen to make and establish such rules, laws, ordinances, regulations, and orders as may to them seem right and proper, respecting all and every such matter and thing whatsoever "that may be by them considered necessary or proper or incident to the good government of said city, and to the peace, security, health, happiness, welfare, protection, or convenience of the inhabitants of said city, and for preserving the peace, good order, and dignity of said government." They were also granted therein all other powers necessary or incident to municipal government, not in conflict with any other special power or authority given said city. Acts 1910, p. 622,  $\S$  5. Held, that the powers above expressed were sufficient to authorize the mayor and aldermen to pass an ordinance prescribing that buildings to be used for hospital purposes should be constructed of brick or other nonflammable material. This ruling is not in conflict with the principle repeatedly laid down by this court that the powers of a municipal corporation in this state are limited to those expressly granted by the General Assembly or conferred by necessary implication. Peginis v. Atlanta, 132 Ga. 302, 63 S. E. 857, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 716; Blackman Health Resort v. Atlanta, 151 Ga. —, 107 S. E. 525.

2. Hospitals  $\S$  3—Ordinance concerning construction held not unreasonable.

An ordinance of the city of Dublin declared: "That from and after the passage of this ordinance it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to erect or cause to be erected within the city limits of Dublin, Ga., any building to be used for hospital or other building of like character, of material other than brick, the same to be erected in all other respects as prescribed by the building laws of said City of Dublin." Held, that this ordinance was not void on the ground that it was unreasonable. 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.)  $\S$  698. No question was raised as to the constitutionality of the ordinance.

3. Municipal corporations  $\S$  601—City properly refused to permit wood additions to existing building.

Applying the foregoing principles to the pleadings and the evidence in the case, the mayor and council of the city of Dublin were authorized to decline to grant the permit to the petitioners to make additions to an existing building, the same to be constructed of wood; and the judge did not err in refusing the mandamus absolute.

TURNER v. DUNCAN et al. (No. 2158.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  302(3)—Ground of motion for new trial complaining of refusal to sustain objection to question held incomplete without disclosing answer.

A ground of a motion for new trial is incomplete which complains of a refusal to sustain an objection to a stated question propounded to a witness, but does not disclose the substance of the answer made by the witness.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$  302(3)—Ground of objection must be stated in motion for new trial to present question for review.

A ground of a motion for new trial complaining of the overruling of a motion to rule out certain testimony delivered by a witness, which fails to state the ground of the objection that was urged before the judge for excluding the evidence, is too indefinite to present any question for decision.

3. Justices of the peace  $\S$  135(5)—Fi. fa. issued by justice held properly admitted in evidence in trial of statutory claim.

On the trial of a case based on a statutory claim interposed to a levy on land by a constable under a fi. fa. issued by a justice of the peace, the plaintiff offered in evidence the fi. fa., which contained a caption in which was stated the names of the plaintiff and of the defendant, following which was the direction: "To any lawful constable of said county, greeting." Then followed the command to levy on a sufficiency of the property of "the defendant above named," etc. Held, that it was not error to admit the fi. fa. in evidence over the objection that, while the name of the defendant was stated in the caption, it was not again stated in the body of the fi. fa.

4. Justices of the peace  $\S$  135(5)—Fi. fa. held properly admitted in evidence though clerk did not make entry of constable in execution docket.

In the Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  4767, it is declared: "No constable shall levy on any land unless there is no personal property to be found sufficient to satisfy the debt, which fact must appear by an entry on the execution to be levied by a constable of the county where such execution was issued, or where the property to be levied upon may be found: Provided, that the defendant shall have the right in all cases to point out any portion of his property in his possession he may think proper; and should he point out land to be levied upon, the above entry of 'no personal property' may be omitted." See, also, Civil Code 1910, § 6034. The provisions of the Civil Code 1910, § 3321, require the clerk of the superior court of each county to keep a general execution docket on which executions issuing from the several courts of this state and of the United States are required to be entered in order that they may be binding as against third persons. By subdivision 4 of paragraph 6 of section 4891, it is made the duty of the clerk of the superior court to keep an execution docket which shall show "the names of the parties and their attorneys, date, the time returnable, to whom and when delivered, when returned, and memoranda of all entries on the original." Held, construing together the several provisions above mentioned, the requirement in section 4891 that the clerk shall enter upon the execution docket all entries on the fi. fa. did not render inadmissible in evidence, on the trial of a claim case as described in the first note, a fi. fa. issued from a justice's court, which is levied by a constable upon land pointed out to him for the purpose of levy by the defendant in fi. fa., who was found in possession of the land, although the constable, prior to levying on the land, made an entry on the fi. fa. to the effect that he had made diligent search for personal property of the defendant and could find no such property upon which to levy the fi. fa., and such entry was not entered by the clerk of the superior court upon the execution docket.

5. Appeal and error §1050(1)—Evidence §273(2)—Declarations of defendant in fi. fa. in claim case admissible; evidence held not prejudicial.

In a claim case the declarations of the defendant in fi. fa. tending to show the character of his possession are not inadmissible upon the ground that the declarant is not a party to the case.

(a) Testimony to the effect that the defendant in fi. fa., while residing on the land with his wife and family, declared, at a trial of his son under charge of a crime, that he was worth $2,000, was of doubtful admissibility, but of such slight materiality that its admission would not require the grant of a new trial.

6. Justices of the peace §135(5)—Evidence by claimant of land levied on held not supported by evidence.

The evidence was sufficient to show title of the land in defendant in fi. fa.; and there was no error in overruling the motion to dismiss the levy, on the ground that the plaintiff failed to make out a prima facie case.

7. Justices of the peace §135(2)—Defect in justice court summons cured by judgment.

A ground of the motion for new trial (in so far as it presents any question for consideration) is without merit which alleges that the court erred in rejecting a copy of the original summons from the justice's court on which one of the fi. fas. was based, such copy being offered in evidence by the claimant for the purpose of showing that the amount of the plaintiff's demand was not specified in the original summons by any express allegation or by attaching a copy of the note sued upon; it being contended that because of such failure to specify the amount of the debt the judgment and fi. fa. based thereon were void. Even if the copy was admissible, it would not have been sufficient to show that the judgment was void. The defect in the summons complained of was an amendable defect and was cured by the judgment.

8. Appeal and error §231(9)—Objection to charge held insufficient to raise any question for decision.

The judge charged the jury: "That a husband would have the right to make his wife a deed to any part of his property, * * * provided he does not thereby defraud his creditors, * * * provided he is not indebted, don't owe any debts at the time, no judgments or liens against him; * * * can't do it when he is in debt." Error was assigned on this charge, because: (a) "It is given without qualification." (b) The court should have charged that if defendant in fi. fa. "did not own the land and had not paid anything on it, and that his wife had paid all of the purchase money on the land," the equitable title would have been in claimant and the jury could not find a verdict against her. The charge was not strictly accurate, but the criticism that the charge was erroneous because "it was given without qualification" is not sufficiently definite to raise any question for decision. In a subsequent portion of the charge the judge instructed the jury substantially as it is insisted by the second criticism that he should have charged.

9. Justices of the peace §135(5)—Charge held applicable to issues involved in claim suit to property levied on.

In the thirteenth ground of the motion for new trial complaint is made of the charge: "He would have the right to make his wife the deed, if it was an honest transaction, * * * even though she didn't pay any money, if by doing so he didn't deprive himself of the ability to pay his debts; * * * and although he may become indebted afterwards that wouldn't be a transaction as would defeat the deed. * * * The honesty of this transaction you are to look to. * * * See whether she paid the money or he paid it. * * * If she paid it, * * * you would be authorized to find the property not subject. If you believe from the evidence that he * * * paid for this land, and that this transaction was fraudulent to defraud the plaintiff, * * * you should find the property subject." This charge was applicable to the issues involved in the case and was authorized by the evidence. There was no contention that it did not state correct principles of law.

10. Appeal and error §843(2)—Grounds of motion for new trial not considered because merely elaborative of general grounds.

Other grounds of the motion for new trial complained that the verdict was contrary to certain portions of the charge delivered by the court. Such grounds are merely elaborative of the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, etc., and do not require separate consideration. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict finding the property subject, and there was no error in refusing a new trial on any of the grounds taken.

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Actions by N. B. and J. T. Duncan against C. W. Turner, wherein judgments were rendered for plaintiffs and executions levied upon land, and S. A. Turner interposed a statutory claim. From an adverse judgment, the claimant brings error. Affirmed.

On November 6, 1914, a judgment was rendered in a justice's court, for $64.46 principal, with interest, attorney's fees, and costs of court, in favor of N. B. and J. T. Duncan against C. W. Turner, in a suit upon a promissory note. On December 4, 1914, another judgment in favor of the same plaintiffs in a similar suit against the same defendant was rendered in the same court for $90 principal, with interest, attorney's fees, and costs of court. Executions were duly issued and entered on the general execution docket on November 19, and December 17, 1914, respectively. The constable of the district in which the judgments were rendered made entry on each execution, to the effect that upon diligent search no personal property of the defendant could be found on which to levy. Subsequently the constable levied both executions on the same tract of land. When the sheriff of the county was about to expose the land to sale, Sarah Ann Turner, the wife of defendant in execution, interposed a statutory claim. The claim was returned by the sheriff to the superior court, where an issue was made, and the trial resulted in a verdict finding the property subject. The claimant made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and she excepted. On the trial the plaintiff introduced both executions with entries thereon, as above indicated; and tax digests of the county for the years 1910 to 1917, inclusive, showing returns of the property in the name of defendant Charles W. Turner; and also certain parol evidence.

One of plaintiff's attorneys testified to the following effect: At the time of the levy the defendant was in possession of the land, residing thereon with his family. He purchased the land in 1905 or 1906, and had been in continuous actual possession, by residing thereon and cultivating the land for agricultural purposes, from 1908 until the time of the trial. During that period and both before and after "this litigation" commenced, he offered to sell the property for $1,200. At the time of offering to sell he did not make any statement as to who owned the property, though in one instance he said "he would settle this matter if Mr. Duncan would buy the land. [I] told him he might work up a trade with my son. [He] said if Mr. Duncan would buy the land he would pay it all. But he wanted to sell it all * * * and get away from here." He told witness he gave $700 for the land. Witness could not identify a note dated March 10, 1912, exhibited to him while on cross-examination by claimant's attorney, as a note on which one of the judgments was based; witness explaining that he was not employed before the judgments were rendered and had never seen the notes. Another witness for the plaintiff was the constable, who gave testimony to the following effect: Defendant was in possession of the land, residing on it with his family at the time of the levy, and pointed it out to witness as his property for the purpose of levy, and went with him to the attorney for the plaintiff to make his return. Defendant had been in possession of the land for several years prior to the levy, during which time he and the several members of his family, including the claimant, engaged in the usual agricultural work on the land. Witness did not know, when he levied on the land, that claimant held any deed to it or claimed title or possession thereof. The justice of the peace testified for the plaintiff that at the time the judgments were rendered both the claimant and defendant were present. Witness has been acquainted with C. W. Turner since 1904 or 1905, during which time he has lived about a mile away, and defendant has lived on the land with his family; and witness does not know of defendant's claiming any other land. Witness has seen both Mr. and Mrs. Turner working in the field on the land. O. C. Tyson, who was the former owner of the land, testified: Some time about 1905, witness sold the land to defendant for $700, receiving seven promissory notes for $100 each, payable successively one each year after the date of sale, and giving bond for title to the purchaser. The defendant went into possession at the time of the sale, and has been living there ever since. Witness sold the notes to S. O. Fielder.

The claimant introduced evidence as follows: (a) A copy of the summons on which the judgment was predicated. (b) A deed from O. C. Tyson to S. O. Fielder, dated October 14, 1905, on consideration of $425. (c) A deed from S. O. Fielder to C. W. Turner, dated October 19, 1912. (d) A warranty deed from C. W. Turner to claimant, dated October 19, 1912, recorded October 9, 1916, and expressing a consideration of $500. Claimant as a witness in her own behalf testified:

Defendant bargained for the land, and witness furnished $700 to pay for it, giving the money to her husband to pay the notes as they would fall due each year: "I sent cotton by him to sell, except what I borrowed from my sister [Mrs. Mary O'Connell], cotton that me and the children made. There was paid from the cotton that was turned over to him $350; that was paid out of the cotton. The cotton was mine and the children's. * * * My husband just said he would not pay for it; and me and him had a right smart little row, and he said he was going to leave me. I said: 'Go, if you go for that. I have moved around with you as much as I am going to on rented land.' He says, 'If you do, you will pay for it yourself.' I told him we could; we done most of the work anyhow. He got his hat and started. I followed him a piece, and I says: 'If you go you can just go; don't come back any more; can stay with me or go if you please.' He set down a while and studied about it, and come on back to the house. I paid $350 out of the cotton for the land. That was not all paid at one time. We took up the notes as they come due, a hundred dollars a year. I got money from no one else but my sister. I got from her $350. I paid it on the land. That paid the $700 that I am speaking of."

"He said we could do as we pleased after he come back, pay for it or let it alone; he wouldn't pay any out on it; he hadn't paid none and wouldn't have anything to do with it. I told him if he would stay there and help me we would swap work, what time he worked there. He worked for Banks & Co. a right smart; did some work. Me and the children worked the crop; did not work any in the cotton patch, only what he swapped in there. We hoed for him in the corn to get him to plow for us. He cultivated a corn patch on the place. He made a little corn crop every year. I swapped with him. The corn crop belonged to him. He claimed it. I had nothing to do with the corn matter, only swapped work. We hoed for him, and he would plow some in the cotton. One of the boys plowed. He would plow some. When he got through, wouldn't have anything to do with it; just like a stranger, just like anybody else. He said he didn't care, just wanted to plow some. * * * The deed was made to me because I paid for it, or furnished the money that paid for it. He says, 'If you will go on and pay for it, I will make the deed to it to you, and it will be yours.' Wanted him to do that so he couldn't never trade it. He was sorter bad about trading, making sorter bad trades. Told him wanted the deed made to me so he couldn't trade it. He agreed for me and the children to make the cotton on it and have the property myself."

On cross-examination witness testified:

"I saw deed from Fielder to Turner. Mr. Turner [never] turned me over any deed besides this one. I never had any other. The name of this lady, my sister, is Mrs. O'Connell. She furnished me this money * * * along at different times when I needed it. I don't know that I can tell you about the times. I don't remember. When cotton was cheap and I failed a payment, she furnished the money. I don't know what year it was; before the deed was made, of course. * * * I would get about $50 a year. * * * I think I got 40 one time. I remember I got money several times. I got some every year, because cotton was cheap then."

Mrs. Mary O'Connell testified:

"I let her have, before this place in question was finally paid for, $350; let her have it at one time. I think I let her have $40 at one time, but I would have to look over the memorandum to tell how much. When she needed money, if she was short in her payments, I let her have money, helped her out whatever it took to take up a note each year. I helped her take up a note each year. I know I let her have $350 to pay on the farm. That is the land in dispute."

C. W. Turner, for the claimant, testified:

"I am the defendant in this execution here. My wife furnished the money to pay for the land. A portion of it was made on the place. Her and her children made it. Of course, I plowed through it. My crop was the corn. * * * I paid no money down on the land at first. I was to pay for it $700. I executed notes to Tyson. I give my notes to Tyson. I give my notes—these notes to become due each year. They were paid. I paid the money over to him and taken up the notes. My wife delivered me the money. * * * When a note would come due, she would give me the money, and went and paid it to Tyson or Mr. Fielder; paid it all to Fielder. Q. Here is a deed to the land that Fielder made you October 19, 1912; did he ever deliver you this deed? A. Yes, sir; the deed that I made to my wife, dated 19th day of October, 1912, the same day. Mr. Hall, J. P., witnessed both of these deeds. Q. State who wrote the deed from Fielder to you. Do you remember who wrote it? A. Mr. Hall witnessed the deed. He fixed up both these deeds the same day at Villa Rica. As soon as he turned me over the deed, I told him then it wasn't made as I intended for it to be; told him I wanted it to my wife. Then he wrote this deed. I told him to make another one, I just forgot it. That was from me to my wife. He signed the deed and delivered it to me. I taken it home and delivered it to her, my wife. I haven't had no interest in that land since then, not only just to live in it. I live there with my wife and children."

On cross-examination the witness testified, among other things, that he took the cotton away and sold and looked after it generally; that sometimes his wife would go with him; and that he sold a part in his own name and a part in his wife's name. Testimony by the daughter of the claimant tended to corroborate her testimony and that of her husband and sister, already quoted. The claimant further testified that she had furnished the money to pay the taxes on the land ever since she commenced paying the purchase money.

PICKENS v. JACKSON. (No. 2351.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trusts  $\S$ 63 $\frac{3}{4}$ , 368—Implied or resulting trust on land purchased by agent.

The allegations of the petition show that the action is a suit by a principal against his agent, to enforce an implied or resulting trust, for an accounting, and for injunction, and are sufficient to allege a cause of action.

2. Limitation of actions  $\S$ 66(10)—Does not begin to run against principal until repudiation or settlement of accounts.

In a suit for an accounting as mentioned in the preceding note, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the agent has rendered an account, accompanied by an offer to settle, or there has been by the principal a demand for settlement and a refusal by the agent to pay, or there has been an express repudiation of the agency, or until there has been such a change in the relations of the parties as would warrant the inference that the confidential agency had in fact ceased. Teasley v. Bradley, 110 Ga. 497, 85 S. E. 782, 78 Am. St. Rep. 113; Garner v. Lankford, 147 Ga. 235, 93 S. E. 411; Ramsey v. Street, 150 Ga. 539, 104 S. E. 222.

Applying the rule above announced to the allegations of the present petition, it was not open to demurrrer alleging that plaintiff's cause of action, or any portion thereof, was barred by the statute of limitations, or that the same had become stale.

3. Judgment  $\S$ 518—Trusts  $\S$ 366(3)—Grantees of trustee not necessary parties in action for accounting; petition not collateral attack on judgment.

The petition does not seek to cancel any of the deeds, nor to set aside either of the judgments of the court of ordinary, but prays for a decree of a court of equity giving to the petitioner the benefit of all of the deeds and judgments, and requiring an accounting of the defendant. The petition therefore was not subject to demurrer on the ground that the grantees in the deeds were not made parties, and that the petition as amended "collaterally attacks judgments and sales apparently regular in all other respects."

4. Trusts  $\S$ 366(3),  $\S$ 71(1,4)—Petition not subject to demurrer that it prayed for rescission without restitution.

The petitioner does not seek rescission of the sales of land in part or as a whole, and therefore the petition was not subject to demurrer on the ground that "the petition seeks to ratify in part and reject in part, while rescission without restitution cannot be accomplished; that said petition fails to attack the validity of the administrator's deed to T. M. Mann, and fails to allege that the defendant has any part of the purchase price of $10,300 therein recited, and fails to tender back to the said purchaser the price of $10,300; that said Mann is not a party to said suit, and so long as the administrator's deed to him stands said transaction cannot be inquired into."

5. Abatement and revival  $\S$ 52—Trusts  $\S$ 365(3)—Not barred by laches; right to accounting survived.

For the reasons set forth in the second headnote, the cause of action was not barred by laches during the life of the testatrix, and the suit is based upon a chose in action which survived to her legal representative.

6. Trusts  $\S$ 371(1)—Petition held to sufficiently allege collusion of third person with defendant.

Properly construed, the petition alleged that the defendant, Jackson, procured the services of T. M. Mann to be a "by-bidder" at the sale of the land by the administratrix, ostensibly, and as represented by Jackson, that Mann was bidding in the interest of the estate, but he was in fact acting in collusion with Jackson, in the interest of the latter, whose plan was to absorb the estate himself. Therefore the petition is not demurrable on the ground that it alleges "that T. M. Mann, in the event the property was not bringing its full value, * * * could bid in the same as if purchasing for himself, but his bid would be for the estate," while in paragraph 5 of the plaintiff's amendment she alleges that "T. M. Mann was the agent and servant of J. B. Jackson, and that this bid was intended for J. B. Jackson."

7. Pleading  $\S$ 248(16)—Allegation of amendment held not to set forth new cause of action.

The allegation in the amendment to the petition that the testatrix was "old, illiterate, without business experience, and easily imposed upon," was not subject to demurrer on the ground that "the petition sets forth a new cause of action in alleging that Mrs. McCravy was mentally incompetent to manage her property; that the allegations as to said incompetency are, besides, too general, vague, and indefinite."

8. Venue  $\S$ 5(1)—Suit concerning land held not one respecting title to land.

A petition that seeks a final accounting between the legal representative of a principal and the agent of the latter, and which contains a prayer that such agent be required, by decree of court, "to turn over to the petitioner the balance of the land unsold by such agent," does not render the suit one respecting title to land, and the decree prayed may be had in a court of equity in a county other than that in which the land lies. Williams v. Lancaster, 113 Ga. 1020 (7), 39 S. E. 471.

9. Pleading  $\S$  250 — Additional consistent prayers do not render petition demurrable.

An amendment to the petition, which does not add a new and distinct cause of action, or new and distinct parties, is not demurrable on the ground that it "adds additional prayers praying for new and different relief," if such prayers are consistent with the nature of the case made by the petition. This ground of the demurrer should have been overruled.

10. Grounds of demurrer without merit.

In so far as any of the grounds of special demurrer not specifically dealt with above were not met by appropriate amendment, they were without merit under application of principles above announced. It followed that the court erred in sustaining the demurrers and in dismissing the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Martha C. Pickens, as administratrix of the estate of Jane McCravery, deceased, against J. B. Jackson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. P. McCravery died intestate, owning a farm containing 179½ acres, called Turner's peach orchard farm, in Cobb county. The farm was incumbered by a deed to Marietta Trust & Banking Company, securing a debt on which there was a balance due of $7,000. Jane McCravery, widow and sole heir at law of the deceased, was appointed administratrix upon the estate February 2, 1912. Shortly thereafter the administratrix procured from the ordinary of Cobb county an order to sell the farm for the purpose of paying off the debt and realizing for herself a balance over and above the incumbrance. The lands were duly advertised and sold on the first Tuesday in September, 1913. Subsequently Jane McCravery died December 10, 1919, leaving a will in which J. B. Jackson was nominated as executor. Jackson refused to probate the will, and on application of Martha C. Pickens the will was probated in solemn form February 1, 1918, and Martha C. Pickens became administratrix with the will annexed. Prior to and until the death of A. P. McCravery J. B. Jackson was general agent and attorney at law for McCravery, and had in charge and control for him the lands above mentioned, and the renting and selling of said lands.

Jane McCravery, being old, illiterate, without business experience, and easily imposed upon, became administratrix at the suggestion and by the assistance of Jackson, who also procured for her the order to sell the land, and represented the administratrix in conducting the sale. To that end Jackson procured the services of T. M. Mann, and on the day of the sale went with him to bid on the property. Mrs. McCravery remained away from the sale. Mann was to be a "by-bidder," so that, in the event the property did not bring its full value, Mann could bid in the same as if purchasing for himself (but his bid would be for the estate); and it was represented by Jackson that Mann was bidding in the interest of the estate, but in fact he was acting in collusion with Jackson, in the interest of the latter, whose plan was to absorb the estate himself. Under such circumstances Mann bid $10,300, the property being worth twice that sum, and it was knocked off to him. In pursuance of such sale, Jane McCravery, administratrix, signed a deed to Mann, without any consideration being paid therefor by either Jackson or Mann, the deed being thus made at the instance and suggestion of Jackson. Neither Jackson nor Mann ever paid any of their own money for the land. The incumbrances thereon were paid off from the proceeds of sale of portions of the land, as will be hereafter stated.

In order to discharge $3,500 of the debt due Marietta Trust & Banking Company, that company consented to release a certain part of the land covered by its deed, to enable Mann to obtain a loan for such amount from the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company; and accordingly, at the instigation of Jackson, Mann, on December 4, 1913, executed a deed to such part of the land to the insurance company as security for a loan of the above amount, which was applied to the reduction of the debt to Marietta Trust & Banking Company. On July 29, 1914, after the execution of said deed, Jackson required Mann to execute to him a deed to the balance of the land, which deed was withheld from record until July 24, 1917, in order to enable Jackson to conceal his interest, and at the same time pay off the indebtedness. To that end, on April 20, 1915, Mann executed another deed to Jackson for a part of the property described in the deed next above mentioned, naming a consideration of $1,750, which was recorded on May 10, 1915, and Jackson on the same day executed a deed conveying the same land to T. J. Eubanks for the consideration of $5,250, Eubanks, as a part of the consideration, assuming payment of the loan of $3,500 in favor of the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company. On July 28, 1916, Jackson executed a deed to B. T. Frey, conveying a portion of the land for a consideration of $3,000, which money was applied on the remaining $3,500 due Marietta Trust & Banking Company.

In addition to the above, Mann and Jackson sold certain personalty to Mrs. Christian for $1,250. On December 8, 1913, Jackson and Mann executed a security deed on some of the property to Marietta Trust & Banking Company for $2,900; and Jackson borrowed $1,000 on the land from J. H. Patton. After the deed from Mann to Jackson was placed on record, Jackson borrowed from Garity $1,500 on a part of the land which was still unsold.

On May 6, 1920, Martha C. Pickens, as administratrix of the estate of Jane McCravey, instituted an action against Jackson, and in the petition as amended she alleged in substance all that is stated above. She further charges therein that, while Jackson has tried to manipulate said lands in such way as to destroy his identity through Mann, his agent, his acts in fraud of his principal create a trust in favor of said estate (the estate of Jane McCravey, deceased); that said estate is entitled to the benefit of all the trades made by Jackson, and is the owner of the overplus over and above what it took to pay off said debt of the Marietta Trust & Banking Company, and the remaining land unsold, namely, 61 acres of said McCravey farm, which is fully described; that Jackson is a naked trustee, holding for the benefit of the estate and all those interested in the estate; that in relation to the estate his agency and his fraudulent acts estop him from claiming the remaining lands and the overplus of money received from the sale of the lands after paying off $7,000 to the Marietta Trust & Banking Company; that no settlement was ever made between Mrs. Jane McCravey and her agent, Jackson, during the life of Mrs. McCravey, nor did she know the condition of her own affairs, but she trusted all to Jackson. The prayers were that the defendant be permanently enjoined from selling or further incumbering the land; that the plaintiff have verdict and judgment for a stated amount against the defendant; and that a decree be entered requiring the defendant to turn over to her the balance of the land; that defendant be required to account; that a trust be decreed in favor of the plaintiff; and for general relief. The defendant demurred generally and specially. Each and every ground of the demurrers was sustained, and the petition dismissed. The plaintiff excepted.

COKER v. UTTER. (No. 2329.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bankruptcy  $\S$  364—Proving claim does not estop assertion of lien against property of which court of bankruptcy has no jurisdiction.

A lien creditor by proving his claim does not waive, nor is he estopped from asserting, his lien in a court of competent jurisdiction against the property which the court of bankruptcy has not the jurisdiction to administer for the benefit of creditors. McBride v. Gibbs, 148 Ga. 380, 96 S. E. 1004.

2. Bankruptcy  $\S$  198, 433(7) — Bankruptcy does not avoid all liens; discharge does not discharge lien of judgment upon note waiving homestead exemption.

The effect of section 67f of the national Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (U. S. Comp. St.  $\S$  9651) is not to void the levies and liens therein referred to against all the world, but only as against the trustee in bankruptcy and those claiming under him, in order that the property may pass to and be distributed among the creditors of the bankrupt. It is applicable only as against such trustee, and was designed to prevent preferences between creditors. A discharge in bankruptcy does not discharge the lien of a judgment obtained within four months prior to the adjudication of bankruptcy, upon a note waiving the homestead exemption allowed by the laws of this state upon lands set aside by the bankrupt court as exempt. McKenney v. Cheney, 118 Ga. 387, 45 S. E. 433.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$  1041(3)—Pleading  $\S$  258(4)—Amendments to answer permitted after submission to judge; rejection of amendment held not harmful.

While it was competent for the plaintiff in error to file an amendment to his answer after the case was submitted to the judge, so as to give efficacy to any fact that might have been proved or admitted at the hearing, the rejection of the amendment in the present case was not hurtful to the plaintiff in error, inasmuch as the allegations of the amendment, so far as they were supported by evidence, did not materially change the controlling issues as they stood when the case was submitted to the judge.

4. Stare decisis—Opinion not overruled.

The request to review and overrule the case of McKenney v. Cheney, supra, is denied. While the ruling made in that case may not be in harmony with all the dicta in the case of C. B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. Hall, 229 U. S. 511, 33 Sup. Ct. 885, 57 L. Ed. 1306, it is not necessarily in conflict with the decision in that case upon the issues actually involved, as in the present case the judgment sought to be enforced is based upon a promissory note containing a waiver of homestead, and it was otherwise in the case last cited.

5. Error—Rendering judgment.

Applying what is said in the foregoing headnotes, the court below did not err in rendering the judgment complained of.

Atkinson, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Oglethorpe County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Action by A. B. Utter, as trustee, against John E. Coker. From an adverse judgment, the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. B. Utter, as trustee, obtained a judgment, on which execution was issued, against John E. Coker, on March 5, 1919, for something over $2,000, on two notes waiving homestead and exemption rights. On May 8, 1919, the defendant in execution was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on September 21, 1919, he obtained his discharge in bankruptcy. Later certain assets were recovered and brought into the estate. Out of the proceeds of their sale the sum of $1,445 in cash was set apart by the trustee to the bankrupt as a homestead. Before the 20 days expired, and while the money was in the hands of the trustee, an application was filed in the superior court of Oglethorpe county by R. G. Hackney, the father-in-law of J. E. Coker, bankrupt, and by A. H. Coker, administrator (a cousin of the bankrupt), on two notes given by the bankrupt, waiving the homestead, which were dated and executed after the homestead was set apart by the trustee and about 10 months after J. E. Coker had been adjudicated a bankrupt. This application asked that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the homestead fund. The bankrupt joined in this application, and asked that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the fund. J. H. Lumpkin was appointed under this petition, and is now receiver, holding the fund under order of the court. Before the 20 days expired, and while the money was in the hands of the trustee, an application was filed in the superior court of Oglethorpe county by A. B. Utter, as trustee, setting up the judgment that had been obtained in his favor some 60 days prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy, and asking that a receiver be appointed to take charge of said fund and apply the same to said execution, and that John E. Coker (the plaintiff in error), or anybody for him, be restrained from accepting this money from the trustee in bankruptcy. In this latter suit a stay of discharge was not asked, for the same had been granted. An order was taken consolidating the two cases. When the case was heard by the judge, under an agreement the petition of A. B. Utter as trustee was taken up and passed on. In answer to this suit of Utter, trustee, Coker, the bankrupt, filed his defense, alleging that the plaintiff trustee had no right of action, for two reasons: First, because he had filed proof of claim on his execution in the bankrupt court; second, because under the Bankruptcy Act the judgment or lien obtained within 4 months prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy was null and void, and the bankrupt (defendant) had been discharged as against the debt.

After the case was submitted to the judge, J. E. Coker filed an amendment to his answer, which amendment was disallowed. After considering the case as submitted, the court rendered a judgment adjudging that "the $1,445 now in the hands of J. H. Lumpkin, as receiver of J. E. Coker, is subject to the execution in favor of A. B. Utter, trustee of G. O. White, bankrupt, against J. E. Coker, issued from the city court of Lexington, March 5, 1919," and in said judgment it was also ordered that after paying certain costs specified the remainder be paid to the attorneys of record for the plaintiff in said execution. To the judgment of the court disallowing the amendment, and to the final judgment, the defendant excepted.

Stephen C. Upson, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

T. W. Lipscomb, of Rome, and Erwin, Erwin & Nix, of Athens, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except Hill, J., absent, and—

ATKINSON, J. (dissenting). In the case of O., B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. Hall, 229 U. S. 511, 33 Sup. Ct. 885, 57 L. Ed. 1306, it was held:

"The decisions of the state and lower federal courts in regard to annulment of liens on exempt property have been conflicting, and this court now holds that section 67f annuls all such liens obtained within four months of the filing of the petition, both as against the property which the trustee takes for benefit of creditors and that which may be set aside to the bankrupt as exempt. In re Forbes, 186 Fed. Rep. 76, approved."

That ruling made by the Supreme Court of the United States is applicable to the facts of this case, and controls it adversely to the defendant in error, who did not obtain a valid judgment on his claim, which was provable in bankruptcy before the bankrupt obtained his discharge, which he might have done by a timely application for a stay of the discharge.

IRVING et al. v. IRVING. (No. 2371.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Wills  $\Rightarrow$  191—Not revoked by birth of "child" of bigamous marriage.

Where one died leaving a last will and testament containing various bequests, and subsequently to the execution of the will a posthumous child was born to the testator, the child being the issue of a bigamous marriage, the testator having a living wife at the time of entering into the bigamous marriage, the birth of the child did not revoke the will.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Child—Children.]

2. Bastards  $\Rightarrow$  1—Statute held not to make child of bigamous marriage legitimate.

Such child was not made legitimate under the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 2935, relating to void marriages and legitimacy of offspring prior to the annulment of the marriage.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Marriage  $\Rightarrow$  54—Bigamous marriages absolutely void.

Bigamous marriages are absolutely void for all purposes.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Lacy Irving, deceased. Application by Willie Bell Irving and another for probate of a will, to which Lena Irving filed a caveat. From a judgment sustaining the caveat, the propounders bring error. Reversed.

Lacy Irving died on December 6, 1919, leaving a last will and testament which contains various bequests to Willie Bell Irving, referred to in the will as his wife, and to certain named children of his. This will was offered for probate by Willie Bell Irving and J. W. E. Linder; and to the application for probate a caveat was filed by Lena Irving. One of the grounds of caveat—the one out of which springs the question to be determined here—is that subsequently to the death of Lacy Irving there was born to Willie Bell Irving a posthumous child of the said Lacy Irving, this child being known as Lacy Irving, Jr.; and it is contended that the birth of the child subsequently to the execution of the will, in which no provision is made in contemplation of such an event, revoked the will. The case was appealed to the superior court, and was submitted to the judge without the intervention of a jury, on the following agreed statement of facts:

"It is agreed that Lena Irving is the lawful widow of Lacy Irving, deceased, she and the said Lacy Irving having married in Key West, Fla., on October 26, 1898; that as the issue of this marriage between Lena Irving and Lacy Irving there are three surviving children, Lewis Irving, age 20, Leroy Irving, age 19, and Lillian Irving, age 17; that about two years before his death the said Lacy Irving, while still lawfully married to Lena Irving, contracted in Fulton county, Ga., a second marriage with Willie Bell Irving; that on December 6, 1919, Lacy Irving died; that a few weeks after his death there was born to the said Willie Bell Irving a posthumous child of the said Lacy Irving, said posthumous child now being known as Lacy Irving, Jr.; that on August 7, 1919, Lacy Irving executed the instrument referred to in the petition and purporting to be a last will and testament. It is further agreed that the marriage between Lacy Irving and Willie Bell Irving was never annulled and declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction. It is agreed that said will is regularly and properly executed, and is entitled to probate unless same is revoked by the subsequent birth of the child referred to in paragraph 1 hereof."

After evidence submitted and argument of counsel, the court rendered judgment sustaining the caveat on the ground that the will had been revoked by the subsequent birth of a child to the testator. The propounders excepted.

Anderson, Rountree & Crenshaw, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Wm. A. Fuller, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] The ground of the caveat out of which springs the issue which this court has to determine does not show good ground for the refusal to admit the will to probate. Section 3923 of the Civil Code declares that—

"In all cases the marriage of the testator, or the birth of a child to him, subsequently to the making of a will in which no provision is made in contemplation of such an event, shall be a revocation of the will."

The word "child" as here used in this section, where it is declared that the birth of a child subsequently to the making of a will in which no provision is made in contemplation of such an event revokes the will, means a legitimate child. Such is its ordinary meaning in laws and statutes prescribing the rules of inheritance and property rights; and usually where the term "child" is allowed to include illegitimate children it is done under the provisions of statutes recognizing the rule just stated, and which make an exception to that rule. No doubt the court below recognized this doctrine, but the court evidently was of the opinion that section 2935 of the Civil Code, relating to void marriages and legitimacy of children, made the posthumous child, Lacy Irving Jr., a legitimate child. This section reads as follows:

"Marriages of persons unable to contract, or unwilling to contract, or fraudulently induced to contract, are void. The issue of such marriages, before they are annulled and declared void by a competent court, are legitimate. In the latter two cases, however, a subsequent consent and ratification of the marriage, freely and voluntarily made, accompanied by cohabitation as husband and wife, shall render valid the marriage."

This section does not have reference to bigamous marriages, but includes three classes of marriages: (1) Marriages between parties unable to contract; (2) marriages between parties unwilling to contract, that is, marriages procured by force or duress; (3) marriages where one of the parties is fraudulently induced to contract. Clearly the bigamous marriage does not fall within the last two classes; nor do we think it falls within the first class, that is, marriages between persons unable to contract. While the expression "marriages of persons unable to contract" might be sufficiently broad if we consider only the expression "unable to contract" to include marriages of persons one of whom had a living spouse, when we take the entire expression "marriages of persons unable to contract," we do not think that bigamous marriages were included, for the reason that a mere marriage ceremony between a man and a woman, where one of them has a living wife or husband, is not a marriage at all; it is a mere empty ceremony, and effects nothing and creates no status between the parties. Such a marriage is an absolute nullity, and may be treated so by the parties to such a ceremony and by all the world.

"The marriage of a man and woman, where one of them has a husband or wife by a prior marriage, who is then living and undivorced, is void, and not merely voidable. Being a nullity, no decree is necessary to avoid the same. Reeves v. Reeves, 54 Ill. 332; Drummond v. Irish, 52 Iowa, 41; Blossom v. Barrett, 37 N. Y. 434; 97 Am. D. 747; Janes v. Janes, 5 Blackf. 141; Tefft v. Tefft, 35 Ind. 44; Glass v. Glass, 114 Mass. 563; Martin v. Martin, 22 Ala. 86. A void marriage is good for no legal purpose, and its invalidity may be shown in any court, between any parties, either in the lifetime of the parties thereto, or after their death." Cartwright v. McGown, 121 Ill. 388, 12 N. E. 787, 2 Am. St. Rep. 105, 107.

[3] An almost unbroken line of precedents for this ruling, taken from the decisions of other states of this country, might be cited to support the proposition here stated. See annotations on the subject of bigamous marriages, whether void or voidable, in 9 L. R. A. 1916C, 711. But this court has more than once held that bigamous marriages are absolutely void. In the case of Murchison v. Green, 128 Ga. 339, 57 S. E. 709, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 702, where the presumption of the validity of the marriage arising from the performance of the ceremony came in conflict with the presumption of a continued life of a former spouse of one of the parties, neither presumption being aided by proof of extraneous facts, the presumption of the validity of the second marriage, it was ruled, will prevail over the presumption of the continuance of the life of the former spouse; and Presiding Justice Cobb, delivering the opinion of the court, gave as one of the reasons for holding that the presumption of the validity of the marriage should prevail that—

"The status of the woman is involved, as well as the legitimacy of children, and every reasonable presumption must be indulged which will relieve the woman of the charge of being a concubine and her children being declared bastards."

The converse of the proposition stated by the learned justice is that, if the first presumption had prevailed—that is, the continuation of the life of the former spouse—then the wife who became such by a bigamous marriage was a mere concubine, and her children who resulted from such bigamous marriage were illegitimate. And such we have concluded to be the law, and consequently that the birth of a child to a testator as the issue of a bigamous marriage, subsequently to the making of a will, does not work the revocation of the will, although no provision was made in the will in contemplation of the birth of such child. And it follows that the court below erred in sustaining the caveat on the ground that the birth of the posthumous child worked a revocation of the will of Lacy Irving.

Judgment reversed.

VAUGHN et al. v. VAUGHN. (No. 2331.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Homestead §122—Grantees estopped to set aside deeds executed under order of court, on ground of collateral understanding not disclosed to judge.

"Parties who have taken a homestead of realty under the Constitution of 1868 shall have the right to sell said homestead and reinvest the same, by order of the judge of the superior courts of this state." Constitution of Georgia, art. 9, § 9, par. 1 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6590); Yeates v. Donaldson, 147 Ga. 335, 94 S. E. 465; Civ. Code 1910, § 3397. Where the head of a family and his wife, being the sole remaining beneficiaries of a homestead set apart in land under the Constitution of 1868, apply to the superior court under the above-quoted provision of the Constitution, and under Civ. Code 1910, § 3397 (relating to sales of homestead property), for authority to sell the homestead property at private sale, for the purpose of reinvestment in other specified real estate, on the ground that the property to be obtained can be purchased for the price that the homestead estate will bring, and that the property to be obtained will be of equal value and produce more for rent than the homestead property, and on such application an order of sale for reinvestment is granted by the court, and the sale and reinvestment are duly made by the exchange of appropriate deeds between the parties in accordance with the order, and the sale is duly reported to the judge and the proceeding is ordered filed, and the provisions of the statute relating to such sales are otherwise carried out, the applicants for sale will be estopped thereafter from moving to set aside the deeds so executed between the parties, on the ground that there was a collateral understanding between them, not disclosed to the judge, that the exchange of the property would be made merely for convenience, to enable the grantee of the homestead property to sell it a higher price, and, if he failed to make a sale, that the deeds should be canceled.

2. Verdict—Direction.

Under the pleadings and the evidence, in a suit by the administrator of the head of the family and the widow against the purchaser of the homestead property, to cancel the deeds and restore the parties to their original status, the court did err in directing the verdict for the defendant.

BECKCOM v. SMALL. (No. 2338.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Mortgages  $\Rightarrow$  378—Security deed held to accomplish assignment of property, subject only to defeasible title under former deed.

A grantor in a duly recorded security deed executed under the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3306, 3310, 6037, to secure a debt for the principal sum of $25,000, besides interest and attorney's fees, executed a second security deed conveying the same property to a different person to secure a debt for the principal sum of $7,985.65, with interest and attorney's fees. The grantor remained in possession after execution of both deeds. Following immediately after the description of the land in the second deed were the words and figures: "There is a prior claim for $25,000 in favor" of the grantee in the first deed. The second deed contained also a provision for accelerating maturity of the principal debt for failure to pay annual interest installments as they should mature, or taxes, and the like, and declared that the grantee or her assigns are "authorized to sell at public outcry, before the courthouse door, * * * to the highest bidder for cash, all of said property to pay said principal, with the interest thereon to the date of sale and the expenses of the proceeding, including fees of attorneys, if incurred, of 10 per cent. on the amount of the principal and interest due, after advertising the time, place, and terms of sale * * * once a week for four weeks prior to said day of sale, * * * and the said party of the second part * * * may make to the purchaser or purchasers of said property good and sufficient titles in fee simple to the same, thereby divesting out of the said party of the first part all right and equity that she may have in and to said property, and vesting the same in the purchaser or purchasers aforesaid." The grantee as holder of the second deed, without having paid off or acquired the first deed, undertook to exercise the power of sale expressed in the second deed, on the ground that default had been made in payment of the debt. The advertisement announced for sale "the equity of redemption" in the land, and described the debt and the power of sale as specified in the second deed. The advertisement concluded with the words and figures: "Said land is subject to a prior lien in favor of the [grantee named in the first deed] for the sum of $25,000 and said property will be sold subject to said first lien." While the property was being so advertised the grantor instituted an action to enjoin the sale, on the grounds: (a) That the grantee had not paid off or otherwise acquired the first security deed. (b) The advertisement gives notice that the "equity of redemption" will be sold, whereas the power of sale conferred upon the grantee in the second deed does not authorize sale of the equity of redemption. (c) The advertisement is ambiguous and confusing, in that it fails to state accurately the status of the title, the statement being that the property "is subject to a prior lien," and will be sold subject to "said first lien" of the first deed, when in truth the grantee in the first deed holds "legal title to said property." At an interlocutory hearing the case was submitted upon the pleadings, from which the foregoing facts appear. The judge refused an interlocutory injunction, and the plaintiff excepted. Held:

As between the grantor and the grantee named in the second deed, the power of sale contained in such deed was valid, and authorized sale of the property under the conditions specified in the power, and the execution of the deed to the purchaser in pursuance of the sale. Such sale and conveyance would not divest or affect the title of the grantee named in the first deed or his successors in title, but, purporting to convey the property in fee simple, would accomplish an assignment of the property subject only to the defeasible title held under the first deed; and thus the conveyance would include all equity of redemption or equitable interest, by whatever name called, of the grantor in the second security deed. Williams v. Foy Mfg. Co., 111 Ga. 856, 36 S. E. 927.

2. Mortgages $\S$ 354—Advertisement held sufficient.

The advertisement was in substantial compliance with the power conferred, and was not invalid on account of either of the grounds of attack made upon it.

3. Injunction against sale properly denied.

The judge did not err in refusing an interlocutory injunction.

ETHRIDGE v. PITTS et al. (No. 2254.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 17, 1921.)

1. Guardian and ward $\S$ 81—Superior court has jurisdiction to authorize guardian to sell legal or equitable interest in land.

In this state the superior court since first established has been the court of equity, and as such has had jurisdiction, on petition, to which minors were parties (plaintiffs or defendants), to render during term decretal orders authorizing guardians to sell the lands of their wards, whether held by legal or equitable title.

2. Guardian and ward $\S$ 81—Superior court has jurisdiction to authorize guardian to sell legal or equitable interest in land.

The court of equity was not deprived of such jurisdiction by the statutory adoption of the Code of 1863, which declared (section 1779) that "All sales of any portion of the property of the ward shall be made under the direction of the ordinary, and under the same rules and restrictions as are prescribed for sales by administrators of estates." Nor did the incorporation of the same provision in Code of 1868, § 1819, have such effect.

3. Guardian and ward $\S$ 79—Life estates $\S$ 27(3)—Remainders $\S$ 16—Superior court had jurisdiction to order sale of land, including interest of remaindermen and life tenant.

In a will probated in 1865, a testator devised a plantation consisting of some 1,600 acres of land to his daughter during her life, "and immediately after the death [of his daughter] to go to and be vested in her child, children, or representatives of children, if any, surviving her." At that time she had two children, a daughter seven and a son five years of age. In 1867 another daughter was born to her. She never had other children. In 1867 a guardian was duly appointed by the ordinary for the persons and property of the three minors. In 1869, during a regular term of the superior court of the county of the residence of all the parties, where the land was situated, a judgment was rendered, upon the joint petition of the mother of the minors (the life tenant) and their appointed guardian, authorizing them, for the reasons alleged and shown, to sell at private sale to a named individual, and for its full value in cash, the entire interest or estate in some 200 acres of the land, situated at least a mile from the rest of the plantation, the proceeds of sale to be used in making necessary repairs on and in improving the balance of the plantation. Held, that the court had jurisdiction to render the judgment granting the power to sell, the facts submitted to the court authorized such order, and the sale thereunder passed to the purchaser the legal estate of the remaindermen in the land, as well as the life estate.

4. Sale by life tenant and guardian passed interests of remaindermen.

In view of the facts as agreed upon, and the rulings of law stated in the preceding notes, the trial judge, to whom the case was submitted without a jury, erred in adjudging that the remaindermen, under the devise referred to in the fourth headnote, were entitled to recover from the defendant, who is the devisee of the purchaser at the sale made by the life tenant and the guardian in 1869 under the decretal order of the equity court.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Statutes $\S$ 243—Abridging jurisdiction of equity strictly construed.

Statutes abridging the jurisdiction of courts of equity must be strictly construed.

6. Guardian and ward $\S$ 79—Remainders $\S$ 16—Ordinary would not have jurisdiction to grant order to convey contingent remainder of unborn children.

An ordinary would not have jurisdiction on joint petition of life tenant and guardian of minor remaindermen in life to grant an order of sale which would convey a contingent remainder of unborn children.

7. Remainders $\S$ 16—Equity may order sale of contingent remainder of unborn children.

A court of equity may grant a decretal order in a proper case to sell the contingent remainder of unborn children.

Error from Superior Court, Jones County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Action by P. T. Pitts and others against Della Ethridge. From an adverse judgment, the defendant brings error. Reversed.

In his will executed in 1859, and probated in solemn form in June, 1865, Thomas W. Choate devised some 1,600 acres of farm or agricultural lands, situated in Jones county, to his daughter, Mrs. Mary C. Pitts, during her life, and at her death "to go to and be vested in her child, children, or representatives of children, if any, surviving her." When the will was probated Mrs. Pitts had two minor children, Rebecca Elizabeth Pitts, about seven, and Peyton Thomas Pitts, about five years of age. Another child, Mattie Taylor Pitts, was born in June, 1867. Mrs. Pitts never had other children. Her husband having died, his father, Peyton Thomas Pitts, Sr., was thereafter appointed by the ordinary of Jones county, in 1867, guardian of the persons and property of the three minor children of Mrs. Pitts, and qualified as such. During the regular October term, 1869, of the superior court of Jones county proceedings were had at the instance of Mrs. Pitts, the life tenant, and Peyton T. Pitts Sr., as the next friend and guardian of the persons and property of her minor children, to obtain leave to sell a portion of the land covered by the devise above mentioned. These proceedings consisted of the joint petition of Mrs. Pitts, the life tenant, and of Peyton T. Pitts, Sr., as next friend and guardian of her three minor children, addressed "to the Hon. Philip B. Robinson, judge of the superior court of the Ocmulgee circuit in said state," and praying, for the reasons set forth in the petition, for an order for the sale of lot of land No. 176, in the Sixth district of originally Baldwin, now Jones county, which constituted a portion of the 1,600 acres of land devised to Mrs. Pitts for life, with remainder in fee to her surviving children. The substance of so much of the petition as needs to be here stated is to the following effect: When Mr. Choate executed his will, and at the time of his death, he owned a large quantity of land, which was cultivated by his slaves. The land devised to his daughter for life, with remainder in fee to her children, consisted of about 1,600 acres. The tenements on this land and practically all of the personality of the testator were destroyed by Sherman's army in 1864. The slaves were emancipated; Mrs. Pitts and her three minor children have no property other than the land devised to them by the testator. They are unable to cultivate all of it. In its condition they cannot rent it to others. The tenements and fences must be rebuilt, and petitioners need money with which to have this done and to carry on farming operations. They have no means with which to keep the taxes paid on all the land, and to keep it all would be burdensome to them. The lot No. 176 does not adjoin the balance of the 1,600 acres, but is a mile from any of it, and about two miles from the main body of the plantation. It is average pine land, without sufficient timber to keep it under fence for more than two years. Petitioners have negotiated with one Newton Ethridge to sell him lot No. 176 at a fair price, and greatly to the advantage of all having an interest therein; and "petitioners represent that all parties in interest are embraced in this petition, and that they have no other property than that devised by said will and as herein set forth." The prayer is for an order for the sale and conveyance of lot 176 by petitioners to Newton Ethridge on the terms agreed upon with him and as set forth, and that the proceeds of the sale may be used by petitioners in building necessary tenements, fences, repairing the farm, and carrying on its operations generally, the residue, if any, to be invested in state bonds, or put out at interest in the sound discretion of the petitioners. The petition was not filed; no process was prayed for or attached. Service was acknowledged by both of the petitioners on October 20, 1869, which was during the term of the court; and on the next day, still in term, the following judgment was rendered:

"Jones Superior Court, October term 1869. Upon hearing and considering the foregoing application it is ordered and adjudged that the said Mary C. Pitts and Peyton T. Pitts, Sr., guardian of the minor children of said Mary C. Pitts, be authorized to sell said lot of land No. 176, in the Sixth district of originally Baldwin, now Jones, county, containing 202½ acres more or less, to Newton Ethridge, at and for the sum of $1,600, it being shown that said sale is to the best interest of the said Mary C. Pitts and her children. It is further ordered that the said Mary C. Pitts and said Peyton T. Pitts, Sr., be authorized and directed to execute unto the said Newton Ethridge good and sufficient titles to said land upon payment in full of said sum of money. It is further ordered that the said Mary C. Pitts and the said guardian be authorized to use said money in the improvement and repairing the other lands of said Mary C. Pitts derived under the will of her deceased father, Thomas W. Choate; and the clerk of the superior court of Jones county is ordered to spread upon the minutes of said court this application, order, notice, and other papers attached. October 21, 1869. Philip B. Robinson, Judge Superior Court, Ocmulgee Circuit."

On December 23, 1869, Mary C. Pitts and Peyton T. Pitts, Sr., as guardian of her minor children, executed a deed to Newton Ethridge for the lot 176, in consideration of the sum of $1,800 paid in cash, the deed reciting the material parts of the decree. Newton Ethridge went into possession of the lot, being the premises sued for in the present case, immediately after the execution and delivery of the deed to him, and remained in possession until his death in March, 1901. He died testate, devising the land to his wife, Della Ethridge. The purchase price, $1,800, paid by Newton Ethridge, was the full value of the life estate and remainder interest in fee to lot 176 at the time it was conveyed to Ethridge. Mrs. Mary C. Pitts, the life tenant, died in November, 1913, leaving surviving her son, Peyton Thomas Pitts, and her daughter Mattie Taylor Pitts. Her daughter Rebecca Elizabeth Pitts died in 1905, leaving several children. Mattie Taylor Pitts died in December, 1913, leaving children.

In September, 1914, Peyton Thomas Pitts, one of the remaindermen, and the children of Rebecca Elizabeth Pitts, as remaindermen, brought in Jones superior court this action in ejectment against Mrs. Della Ethridge, for the recovery of the lot of land No. 176. The children of Mrs. Mattie Taylor Pitts did not join them in the suit. The judge by consent tried the case without a jury, and on an agreed statement of facts the material portions of which are, heretofore set out. The judgment was rendered in behalf of the plaintiffs and against the defendant for an undivided two-thirds interest in lot 176. It appears from this judgment that his honor was of the opinion that the order for the sale of the land, granted in 1869, was void, because—

“under the law and facts set out in the petition, which is a part of said agreed statement of facts in this case, that the judge of the superior court of said circuit had no authority to order the sale of the interest of the minors in the property in controversy, and said order which is attached to said petition, under the law as it existed at that time, in 1869, was void, and did not authorize the sale of the interest of the minors in said property. At the time of the date of said order, in order to sell the interest of wards in property, the ordinaries only had the legal authority to empower such sale.”

The defendant excepted, assigning error on this judgment.

F. Holmes Johnson and Willard W. Burgess, both of Gray, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. R. L. Smith and Grady C. Harris, both of Macon, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. Section 1779 of the Civil Code, which went into effect on January 1, 1863, declared:

“All sales of any portion of the property of the ward, shall be made under the direction of the ordinary, and under the same rules and restrictions as are prescribed for sales by administrators of estates.”

The same language was contained in the Codes of 1868, 1873, and 1882. The act of 1889 (Civil Code 1895, § 2545; Civ. Code 1910, § 3064) provides that—

“By order, in term or vacation, of the judge of the superior court of the county of the guardian's appointment, guardians may sell the whole or any part of the estate of their wards, for reinvestment, upon such terms and at such time and place as said judge may order.”

The following section provides for the publication of notice of the application for sale, and that the application shall describe the property sought to be sold, the reasons for making the application, the property in which the guardian wishes to reinvest the proceeds of sale, etc. The next section is as follows:

“All other sales of any portion of the property of the ward shall be made under the direction of the ordinary, and under the same rules and restrictions as are prescribed for sales by administrators of estates.”

Except for the word “other” in the first line, this is the same language as that contained in the Codes of 1863, 1873, and 1882, as above noted. Administrators may sell lands of their intestates when necessary for the payment of debts or for distribution under an order of the ordinary, granted upon petition setting forth the reason for the application, and on publication of the prescribed notice; and all such sales, except of annual crops sent off to market, and of vacant lands, must be at public outcry and to the highest bidder. In view of these statutes, did the judge of the superior court, in 1869, have jurisdiction, while presiding over a session of the court, on a petition then presented by a life tenant and the guardian of minors owning a legal remainder interest in land, to grant, during term, a decretal order for the sale of such remainder by the guardian?

[1,2] The superior court has been the court of equity in this state at least since the judiciary act of 1799 (Digest of Laws 1802, p. 292) and the language used in reference to it by the Constitutions, as in that of 1868, has been that “the superior courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction in * * * equity cases.” In Beall v. Fox, 4 Ga. 404, it was said:

“The act of 1784 adopted the laws of England, adapted to our circumstances. The act of 1799 conferred equity powers on the superior courts, necessary to give to those laws a complete and practical application, for the benefit of the citizens of this state, in as full and ample manner, as the same existed in Great Britain, for the benefit of the subjects of that kingdom. We have not only adopted the laws of England suited to our circumstances, but we have created the necessary judicial machinery, to give to those laws a practical and beneficial effect, and such we understand to be the office and duty of a court of equity, and such we understand to have been the object of the Legislature, in 1799, in conferring equity powers on the superior courts."

In Jones v. Dougherty, 10 Ga. 281, it was said:

"We have not only adopted the whole system of English jurisprudence, common law, and chancery, suited to our condition and circumstances, but * * * we have framed the necessary judicial machinery to give to that system a practical and beneficial effect, and that such is the office and duty of a court of equity, and such was the object of the Legislature of 1799, in conferring equity powers upon the superior courts."

And in Mordecai v. Stewart, 37 Ga. 375, it was said:

"The equity jurisdiction was created by the act of 1799. Cobb's N. D. 467; section 53 of the Judiciary Act. It was a special grant, and gave an exclusive jurisdiction. It authorized the superior courts to "exercise the powers of a court of equity" by such proceedings as were "usual in such cases." * * * Generally, equity jurisprudence embraces the same matters of jurisdiction and modes of remedy in Georgia as was allowed and practiced in England." Civil Code of 1863, § 3033; Id. 1868, § 3045.

And the language of this section is embodied in all subsequent civil codes.

[5] As was said by Justice Story, the origin of the jurisdiction in chancery over the persons and property of infants is quite obscure, and has been a matter of much juridical discussion. "But whatever may be the true origin of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery over the persons and property of infants, it is now conceded on all sides to be firmly established and beyond the reach of controversy. Indeed, it is a settled maxim that the king is the universal guardian to infants, and had, in the court of chancery, to take care of their fortunes." 3 Story's Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) §§ 1743, 1752. In 14 R. C. L. 268, § 43, it is said:

"But is it also within the inherent and comprehensive power of a court of general equity jurisdiction, according to the great current of American decisions, to sell the land of infants lying within its jurisdiction when such sale is necessary. * * * The clearest case for the exercise of such a power is when the sale is necessary to procure funds for the infant's proper maintenance and education; and the weight of authority seems to be that it does not extend to sales merely because it appears to be for the general interest of the infant, though there is not lacking very respectable authority for the power to sell real estate when shown to be for the manifest interest of the minor. The jurisdiction does not spring from, nor is it dependent upon, the character of the estate, whether absolute or contingent, whether in possession, or the possession postponed until the happening of a future event. It rests upon the power and duty of the court to protect infants, to take care of and preserve their estates while under disability debarring them from the administration of property. The courts would be more reluctant to decree the sale of an estate in remainder, or of a contingent estate, lest it might operate a sacrifice of the interests of the infant; but the jurisdiction exists even as to such estates, though it may be more seldom and more sparingly exercised, and it has been held that such a sale could be made, though contingent interests were vested in persons whose residences and names were unknown, or even in possible children yet unborn."

See, also, 21 C. J. 121, § 99.

Many cases are cited in support of the text quoted, and a few to the contrary of some portions thereof. Other text-writers, and many adjudicated cases might be cited to the same effect.

"In general it may be said that in all the states having the complete equity system, the original jurisdiction of chancery must be considered as remaining in full force and effect, notwithstanding the jurisdiction given to the probate courts, unless the constitutional or statutory provisions creating these courts, by express, negative, prohibitory language, take away the former chancery jurisdiction, or unless by these statutes the probate jurisdiction is given in such affirmative and exclusive language as to raise necessary implication that it was the intention to displace the former corresponding chancery powers." 21 C. J. 120, § 98, note 63.

Statutes abridging the jurisdiction of courts of equity must be strictly construed.

This court has decided a number of times that a judge of the superior court, at chambers, was without authority, prior to the act of 1889 (Civil Code of 1910, § 3064), upon a petition then presented, to order a sale of the legal estate of minors in realty, although it may be represented as beneficial to them. Webb v. Hicks, 117 Ga. 335, 43 S. E. 738, and cases cited; Morehead v. Allen, 131 Ga. 807, 63 S. E. 507, and cases cited; Powell v. Heyman, 143 Ga. 728, 85 S. E. 891. These decisions were evidently based mainly upon the grounds that chancery jurisdiction in this state was conferred upon the superior courts, not upon the judges thereof, and that the judges acting in vacation were not courts of equity (Milledge v. Bryan, 49 Ga. 397), because "the judges of the superior courts of this state can do no act nor grant any decree in vacation unless it be authorized by statute" (Rogers v. Pace, 75 Ga. 436), and because "the power of a judge of the superior court to authorize, in vacation, a sale of the legal estate of a minor can be derived only from a statute" (Mitchell v. Turner, 117 Ga. 958, 960), 44 S. E. 17.

In Milledge v. Bryan, supra, it was said: "The general rule was by an application to the court of ordinary." In Knapp v. Harris, 60 Ga. 398, 408, it was said:

"Equity may, in some cases, interfere with the administration of the estates of deceased persons, or direct the management and disposition of property belonging to minors; but, generally, executors, administrators and guardians are to resort to the court of ordinary for orders of sale, and such judgments as are necessary to supplement their general powers."

From these quotations it appears that the jurisdiction of a court of equity—the superior court—to order the sale of a minor's property was not entirely taken away by the section of the Code authorizing ordinaries to exercise such power. In McCamy v. Higdon, 50 Ga. 629, it was held:

"A deed purporting upon its face to have been made by the guardian of a minor, under the authority of a decree of the superior court, is inadmissible in evidence without the production of said decree."

There is a clear implication that if the decree had accompanied the deed the instrument would be admissible; and, further, that a decree of the superior court, authorizing a guardian to sell his ward's estate was valid.

The decisions holding that the judge of the superior court had no power to grant an order to a guardian to sell the legal estate of his ward all stressed the point that the judge had no power to grant such order in vacation, and on a petition presented in vacation, thereby raising the strong implication that if the petition had been presented to the judge when he was presiding over a session of the court, and he had granted an order for such sale during term, it would have been valid. As was said in Richards v. East Tenn. etc., Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 614, 634, 33 S. E. 193, 201 (45 L. R. A. 712):

"As far as this court has ever gone is to declare that the chancellor has no power to grant at chambers an order for the sale of the legal estate of minors."

It has never since gone further.

There are several decisions of this court to the effect that by a decretal order of the superior court, granted during a session thereof, upon a petition to which the minors are parties, plaintiff or defendant, a guardian may be authorized to sell the lands of his minor ward, whether held by legal or by equitable title. In Rakestraw v. Rakestraw, 70 Ga. 806, the will of the testator was probated in April, 1878. The widow was named as executrix, and qualified. Certain realty was devised to the widow for life, with remainder to testator's children. She filed a bill in her own right, and as next friend of the six minor children of the testator, making his three adult children defendants, and alleging that the rents, issues, and profits of the land so devised were not sufficient for the support of herself and the minor children. The prayer was that she be allowed to sell such land or a portion thereof for the support of herself and the minor children. It was held (in 1883) that it was—

"competent for the life tenant to waive the life estate in the property devised; and this would vest the whole estate in the children; and it would be in the power of a court of equity to decree a sale of the whole or a part of the property for the support, education, and maintenance of the children and the support of the widow. The court could hear evidence as to the probable value of the life estate, and decree to the widow such sum as would be equal thereto, and could, by proper order, protect the remainder for the use of the children, or decree that the same be turned over to the guardians of the minors and to those children who have become of age."

Also:

"An amendment should be made specifically, setting forth the property constituting the estate held by the widow, and stating her willingness to surrender her life estate," and "it seems to be the policy of the law to provide for the support of the widow and minor children, and the court should in all proper ways forward and carry out this policy."

That was a clear-cut holding that a court of equity could grant an order for the sale of the legal estate of minors.

In Sharp v. Findley, 71 Ga. 654, the executor of a will filed a petition, to which legatees were parties, and minor legatees were represented by a guardian ad litem praying for an order, at chambers, for the sale of the realty of such infants. Chief Justice Jackson in delivering the opinion (at page 665) said:

"The very minute this petition came before this chancellor and disclosed the fact that the land of infants was involved, his wards were before him, and the case was concerning 'an estate of the wards of chancery.' The case was made where these wards were suffering or likely to suffer; where their property must be changed, so as to realize for them the necessities of life, and it was necessary that his protective powers be exercised to make such decree as would relieve that necessity, and at the same time protect the estate by looking to the reinvestment and preservation of the fund. Again, the 'proceedings' to 'be had therein' are to be such 'as the necessity of each case may demand.' Of that necessity he is the judge and the only judge. If the infant be not safe in his breast, where shall he look for help? If chancery protect not its wards, what guardian, what law, can protect them? I had rather confide an infant to the custody and care of an honest judge than to any jury ever sworn to find facts and apply law."

In Mitchell v. Turner, supra, it was said (referring to the above quotation from Sharp v. Findley):

"The language of the Chief Justice is manifestly sound as applied to applications filed in term, as were those in the McGowan and Richards Cases, supra, and it was with reference to such applications that those cases approved the language used in Sharp v. Findley. The language, when applied to proceedings instituted in vacation, is opposed to the rulings made in many cases, both before and after the Sharp Case, and it has never been followed in a case where the proceedings were had and the order of sale granted at chambers."

Richards v. East Tenn., etc., Ry. Co., supra, was an especially well-considered case, as will readily appear from a perusal of the majority opinion delivered by Justice Lewis, and the dissenting opinion by Chief Justice Simmons. As several rulings made by the majority in that case bear directly on and control questions involved in the case at bar, we quote the following headnotes from the majority opinion:

"1. The jurisdiction of equity over the estates of wards of chancery is broad, comprehensive, and plenary.

"2. When one holds title to realty in trust for the benefit of a mother and her minor children during the life of the mother, but is not clothed with the title to the legal fee in remainder which vests in the children, he may apply to a court of equity for a sale of the entire property, including the legal as well as the equitable estate, the purpose of the application being for the benefit of the children as well as the mother. The moment such an ex parte petition comes before the chancellor and discloses the fact that the legal as well as the equitable estate of infants is involved, they become his wards, and the case is one concerning, 'an estate of the wards of chancery'; and accordingly the chancellor has jurisdiction to grant in term an order to sell the entire property, the minors being properly made parties and represented before him.

"3. The petition of the trustee for the sale of the premises in dispute having been made and passed upon prior to the act of 1876, requiring personal service on minors, the appointment of a guardian ad litem for them, and his appearance and answer to the petition, were sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of their rights.

"4. Where such a trustee petitions for the sale of the entire property embraced in the conveyance to him, for the purpose of supplying the immediate necessities of all the beneficiaries, including the children, and of making permanent investments for their benefit, an order granted to sell the property in accordance with the petition in effect directs an absolute sale of the entire estate, both legal and equitable. * * *

"5. Since the first Code went into effect on the 1st of January, 1863, it has never been necessary, in order to give the chancellor jurisdiction to direct a sale of the legal and equitable estate of minors in the same property, that a regular proceeding in equity be instituted; but such a sale may be ordered by the judge without a jury, upon an ex parte petition, and at the term of the court when the petition is filed or presented.

"(a) In the absence of any legislative provision to the contrary, it would seem that equity has inherent jurisdiction to order a sale of the legal estate of minors for reinvestment, whenever to the minors' interest. Be this as it may, the present case is distinguishable from one where the sole purpose is to sell such an estate for reinvestment. This is so because the petition for sale now under consideration involved equitable rights over which the superior courts of this state clearly had jurisdiction.

"6. Where such a petition had entered thereon 'January adjourned term, 1871,' and the order of sale had entered on it at the place of the judge's signature, 'January adjourned term, May 12, 1871,' and it appeared that the judge was actually on that day holding a regular session of such adjourned term, this was sufficient to authorize the presumption that the order in question was granted in open court, during its regular session in the transaction of term business, and was therefore a proceeding in term and not at chambers. The facts that the petition was not filed, that the case was not entered on the regular docket of causes for trial, that no process was attached to the petition, and that the order of the sale directed a record of the proceedings on the minutes, as is usually the case when such orders are granted at chambers, were not sufficient to overcome this presumption; especially in view of the principle that the court should adopt that construction which treats the order as completely legal, and not as partially illegal and to that extent void.

"7. Even if the proceedings to sell the property were defective on account of the omissions to file the petition, attach process, and docket the case, these were mere irregularities which did not render void the judgment of a court that had jurisdiction over the persons and subject-matter of the suit; especially where the interests of innocent purchasers are involved, with whose rights equity is always loath to interfere."

In that case there was a trust estate for the joint use of a mother and her minor children during her life, with a legal remainder in fee to the children at the death of the mother. The main point in the case, however, was as to the power of a judge of the superior court to grant in term, upon a petition then presented to him, a decretal order for the sale of the legal estate in remainder of wards; and the majority of the court held, in effect, that the judge had jurisdiction so to do. This construction was placed upon the ruling in the Richards Case, in Reed v. Alabama, etc., Iron Co., 107 Fed. 586 (Circuit Court N. D. Georgia), wherein District Judge Newman delivered an able opinion, the headnotes to which, so far as here relevant, being as follows:

"Under the law of Georgia, as settled by the decisions of its Supreme Court, a court of equity has inherent jurisdiction to order a sale of the legal estate of minors in real estate for reinvestment, where it is to the minors' interest, at least, when grounds exist, aside from the interest of the minors, which make it proper to invoke the jurisdiction of equity in the premises. * * *

"2. Where an estate in remainder in comparatively unproductive property is vested in the children of the life tenants who shall be living at the time of their death, and there are a number of such children in being, who are minors and in need of funds for their maintenance and education, a court of equity has the inherent power, having before it the life tenants and the remaindermen in esse, with their guardian ad litem, and on a proper showing, to render a decree for the sale of the property and the reinvestment of the proceeds so as to produce an income for the children; and such decree will bind children afterwards born, provided it has made proper provision for the investment and protection of their interests in the proceeds."

In line with the ruling covered in head-note 2, just quoted, is a decision of this court in Cooney v. Walton, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 167. There a testator died in March, 1918. The will devised certain realty to his wife for life, remainder in fee to his issue living at her death, and, if none, then to named persons. Included in the realty so devised was a city lot on which there were buildings in need of repair, and therefore could not be advantageously rented. The life tenant brought suit against the only issue of the testator, an adult son, who was childless, and the contingent remaindermen named in the will, the purpose of the suit being to obtain a decree for the sale of the property, including every possible interest therein of contingent remaindermen in being or any possible future issue of the testator's son, for reinvestment under the same limitations provided in the will. It was held that the court had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, and that the decree rendered, authorizing the sale as prayed for, was binding upon all parties to the suit, and upon any unborn issue of the son of the testator who might be in life at the death of the life tenant. The rulings in this case were followed in Donaldson v. Donaldson, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 272.

In Palmer Brick Co. v. Woodward, 135 Ga. 450, 60 S. E. 827, this court construed the Richards Case, supra, as holding in effect that a judge of the superior court, on a petition presented during term by a guardian for the sale of his ward's legal estate, had jurisdiction to grant, during a session of the court, a decretal order for the sale. In that case Howell, in 1876, conveyed certain land to Woodward in trust for the sole and separate use of his wife "during her life, and then to her children, if she should leave any, by her present or any future husband." In 1896 an application addressed to the judge of Fulton superior court (the land lying in Fulton county), "exercising jurisdiction in chancery therein"—was made by Woodward, calling himself trustee, for an order to lease the property conveyed in the deed, for 20 years, to the Palmer Brick Company for it to use the clay in the land for making brick, and for other purposes. The life tenant acknowledged service on the petition, and stated therein that she united with the petitioner in the application, and requested the court to grant the same. The minor remaindermen were served, and a guardian ad litem was appointed for them, who recommended the granting of the order, as it would be for the best interest of the beneficiaries. The order as prayed for was granted in term. It was, among other things, held:

"The petition having been considered and passed upon in term time, the minors [represented by guardian ad litem] became wards of chancery, and the order granting the application to lease the property was binding upon the defendant in error [a remainderman]. This is true although the deed may have created no valid trust, and the remainder estate conveyed to the minors was a legal estate. * * * The minors having duly been served and being represented by a guardian ad litem, who filed an answer in their behalf, and the proceedings being in term time and the minors having become wards of chancery, the absence of process did not vitiate the proceedings. * * * The contract of lease made was authorized by the terms of the order. * * * The court erred in granting an injunction restraining the plaintiff in error 'from mining, digging, or removing any soil, dirt, or clay from the premises described in the petition.'"

It is clear that the deed involved in that case did not create a valid trust for Mrs. Woodward, as it was executed in 1876, when she was sui juris under the act of 1868, and no trust could therefore be created for her. No attempt was made to create a trust for the remaindermen. The life estate of Mrs. Woodward was a legal estate, as was the estate of the remaindermen. That decision is directly applicable to the case at bar. It was not founded upon the act of 1889, and could not have been based upon that act (Civil Code 1910, § 3064), because it was not a sale for reinvestment, but a lease the proceeds of which were to be consumed in their use. The decision does not refer to that act. The fact that the order of the judge of the superior court, granted during term, authorized a lease for 20 years of the land (in which the remaindermen had a legal estate), to be used for the manufacture of brick, could not, of course, differentiate, on principle, such order from one authorizing a sale of the legal interest of the remaindermen in the land. While the remaindermen in that case, who had no general guardian, were represented by a guardian ad litem when the order for the lease was granted in term, there was no necessity for a guardian ad litem in the case at bar, wherein the order for the sale of the land was granted in term, for the reason that the minors were represented by the guardian duly appointed for their persons and property by the ordinary. In the cases we have cited in support of the doctrine that a judge of the superior court, on a petition presented while he is presiding over a session of the court, by a guardian for the sale of the legal estate of his ward, has jurisdiction in term to grant an order for such sale, we say that in such cases the orders for the sale so granted by the judge of the superior court were passed since the Civ-

11 Code of 1863, wherein first appeared the section that:

"All sales of any portion of the property of a ward shall be made under the direction of the ordinary, and under the same rules and restrictions as are prescribed for sales by administrators of estates"

—and, with the exception of the Woodward Case, prior to the passage of the act of 1889, authorizing judges of the superior court to grant, either in vacation or in term time, orders for the sale of a ward's property for reinvestment. It clearly appears, therefore, that this court in none of the cases cited was of the opinion that the section of the Code, as to ordinaries granting orders to guardians for the sale of the estate of their wards, deprived the superior courts, as courts of equity, of the jurisdiction to grant, during term, on petition then presented, decretal orders for the sale of the estates of wards, whether legal or equitable. Judge Powell in his excellent work Actions for Land, § 254, and at page 320, says:

"Minors are wards of chancery. The jurisdiction of equity over the estates, both legal and equitable, of wards in chancery is broad, comprehensive, and plenary. The superior courts are the courts of equity in this state. Hence, by a decree of the superior court, granted during a session of the court, upon an equitable petition to which the minors are parties (plaintiff or defendant), a guardian may be authorized to sell the lands of his minor ward, whether held by legal or by equitable title."

[3,4] There were controlling reasons why the court of equity, and not the ordinary, had jurisdiction to grant the order for the sale of the land involved in this case. The land, as we have seen, was devised to the widow for life, with remainder to her surviving child or children. She and her children, all of whom were minors of tender years, had practically no other property than their interest in the devised lands, which constituted a plantation of some 1,600 acres, the tenements on which had been destroyed by federal troops during the then recent war; and the fences thereon needed rebuilding, in order that the lands could be rented and the widow and children supported. The duly appointed guardian for the minors and their mother, the life tenant, found a man, Newton Ethridge, who was able and willing to purchase the lot 176, which was not contiguous to the balance of the plantation of some 1,200 acres, but situated a mile therefrom, and to pay the full value of the entire interest therein—the life estate of the widow and the remainder estate of her surviving child or children. There was an actual necessity, in view of the circumstances, that the lands be put in condition to be rented, that money for the maintenance of the widow and children could be secured. She and the guardian evidently believed it would be best for all interested in the lands that the entire interest in lot 176 be sold to Ethridge at private sale, for the prearranged price, the full value of the entire interest. The ordinary did not have jurisdiction to grant an order for such a sale. The only power he had under the statute was to grant an order to the guardian to sell the legal estate in remainder of his wards in the land at public sale to the highest bidder, and any prearranged agreement to sell to a particular person at a given sum would, if carried out, have rendered such sale voidable. Moreover, is it not clear that, at a public sale, to the highest bidder, of the legal estate alone of the remaindermen, it would, on account of the uncertainty of the life estate, bring an uncertain and inadequate price? Such a sale would necessarily be speculative. As it happened, the widow, who owned a life estate in lot 176, sold under order of the superior court, lived for about 44 years after the sale. Of course she might have lived only a very short time. All of such uncertainty as to price was avoided by the widow and guardian uniting in an application to the court of equity for leave to sell the entire interest in the land to a named person for its full value.

Again, the jurisdiction to order the sale of the minors' estate was improper for the ordinary, and proper for chancery, because the minors did not have a clear and fixed title, but a title affected by the chances of survivorship, and because there was a contingent remainder to unborn children. The devise was to the widow for life, and at her death to such child or children or representatives of any as might survive her. Under the devise any child or children of the life tenant living at her death, or the descendant or descendants of such, would be entitled to share in the lands devised. One child was born in 1867, after the probate of the will, and survived the life tenant; there might have been others.

[8,7] The ordinary did not have jurisdiction, upon the joint petition of the life tenant and the guardian of the minor remaindermen then in life, to grant an order of sale of lot 176 which would convey the contingent remainder to unborn children; but this court and others have decided that a court of equity could grant a decretal order in a proper case to sell the contingent remainder of unborn children. Cooney v. Walton, Donaldson v. Donaldson, and Reed v. Alabama, etc., Iron Co., supra, and cases cited.

We have reached the conclusion from the foregoing that the trial judge erred, in view of the agreed statement of facts and the law applicable thereto, in holding that the order of sale involved in the case was not valid, and that the several plaintiffs in the court below were entitled to recover.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTHERN EXCH. BANK v. POPE.
(No. 2156.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading  $\S$ 248(8)—Petition held not to set forth new cause of action.

The amendment to the petition did not set forth a new cause of action, and it was properly allowed.

2. Banks and banking  $\S$ 226—Petition against bank converting special deposit in another bank held sufficient.

The petition set forth a cause of action; the special demurrer to it was not meritorious; overruling the demurrers was not error.

3. Merits—Instructions—evidence.

The case upon its substantial merits is controlled by the legal principles announced in the second division of the opinion; the request to charge was, so far as consistent with the law of the case, covered by the general charge; the verdict was authorized by the evidence; and in none of the grounds of the motion for a new trial does cause for a reversal of the judgment below appear.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Banks and banking  $\S$ 153—Bank an agent for deposit for specific purpose.

Where money or property is delivered to a bank for some designated purpose, in using the deposit the bank acts as agent of the depositor, and, if it fails to apply it or misapplies it, it may be recovered as a trust deposit, and the agency is revocable by the depositor at any time before the purpose of the deposit has been accomplished, and a mere parol direction is sufficient to create such a deposit.

5. Banks and banking  $\S$ 153—One aiding bank in diversion of specific deposit liable.

When a bank becomes the agent of a depositor by accepting from him a deposit for a designated purpose, the least turning aside by the bank of the funds is legally a wrongful act and subjects any person who knowingly aids in such diversion to full responsibility.

6. Banks and banking  $\S$ 116(1)—Notice to president notice to bank.

Notice to the president of a bank of facts affecting its interest is imputed to the bank.

7. Principal and agent  $\S$ 172—Agent cannot repudiate act in part.

A principal cannot ratify an act of his agent in part and repudiate it in part, and, if he receives money or other benefit under a contract of his agent, he must restore it upon demand or account for it.

8. Banks and banking  $\S$ 226—Petition held to definitely inform bank aiding in diversion of special deposit as to facts giving notice.

In action against bank which aided in diversion of a specific deposit in another bank, held, that the petition was not subject to demurrer on the ground that it did not definitely and fully inform defendant of facts that imparted to it such knowledge of the facts and circumstances that put it on notice of the special deposit and trust.

Error from Superior Court, Wheeler County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

Action by Daniel Pope against the Southern Exchange Bank and others. From judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Daniel Pope sued the Bank of Alamo of Wheeler County, the Southern Exchange Bank of Dublin, Laurens County, and C. R. Williams of the latter county. The substance of the petition here material is to the following effect: Pope, as treasurer of Wheeler county, had a deposit account with the Bank of Alamo, subject to his checks drawn in such official capacity, and subject also to warrants drawn on him as treasurer by the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of that county in favor of those to whom the county was indebted. On April 23, 1915, the board drew an order or warrant on Pope as treasurer of Wheeler county, in favor of F. P. Helfner, for $4,755.31. This warrant was held for collection by the Bank of Wheeler County, and was presented by that bank to Pope for payment, who directed that the warrant be presented for payment to the Bank of Alamo. This was done; whereupon, the Bank of Alamo informed Pope that he as treasurer did not have a sufficient fund on deposit in that bank to pay the warrant, and that the deficiency was approximately $2,500. Pope thereupon, as treasurer of Wheeler county, drew a check on the Farmers' Bank of Glenwood, payable to the Bank of Alamo, for the sum of $2,000, at the same time giving to the Bank of Alamo his check, as treasurer, on the Wheeler County Bank for the sum of $500. These checks were delivered by Pope to the Bank of Alamo in accordance with an express agreement between him and that bank that the two checks were given and were to be used only for the specific purpose of paying the county warrant drawn on him as treasurer in favor of Helfner by the board of commissioners. The Bank of Alamo sent the $500 check to the Wheeler County Bank, and it was paid. The Bank of Alamo delivered its check on the Southern Exchange Bank, its correspondent, to the Bank of Wheeler County for an amount sufficient to pay the balance due on the county warrant in favor of Helfner, and deposited with the Southern Exchange Bank the check for $2,000, drawn by Pope as treasurer on the Farmers' Bank of Glenwood and in favor of the Bank of Alamo; this check "to be credited [by the Southern Exchange Bank] to the account of the Bank of Alamo, for the purpose of paying the draft of the Bank of Alamo on said Southern Exchange Bank, given to pay said order," or warrant. The Southern Exchange Bank refused to pay the check drawn on it by the Bank of Alamo and in favor of the Bank of Wheeler County; whereupon, Pope stopped payment by the Farmers' Bank of Glenwood of the check for $2,000 drawn by him on it and in favor of the Bank of Alamo.

Thereupon the cashier and president of the Bank of Alamo assured Pope that the check of that bank on the Southern Exchange Bank and in favor of the Wheeler County Bank would be paid if he would permit payment of his check for the $2,000 on the Farmers' Bank of Glenwood. Pope thereupon agreed to allow payment of his check, and it was paid to the Southern Exchange Bank; but that bank refused the check drawn on it by the Bank of Alamo for the purpose of paying the Wheeler County Bank the amount of the county warrant to Helfner, and Pope as treasurer was forced to pay Helfner "from other funds in the treasury of said county of Wheeler." The Southern Exchange Bank, with knowledge that Pope's check on the Farmers' Bank of Glenwood was given by him to the Bank of Alamo for the special purpose of being appropriated, together with other funds he had on deposit in the Bank of Alamo, to the payment of the county warrant drawn on him as treasurer, appropriated such $2,000 in paying existing indebtedness due the Southern Exchange Bank by the Bank of Alamo, and refused to pay any part thereof to Pope, or to the Bank of Alamo. The Bank of Alamo was insolvent when the county warrant was presented to it for payment, and has since continued in that condition; and its cashier falsely represented to Pope that the bank would and could pay the county warrant with the money of his on deposit, together with the amount of his checks for $2,500. Williams, the president of the Southern Exchange Bank, knew of the insolvency of the Bank of Alamo during the transactions set forth in the petition, and the Southern Exchange Bank had received from the Bank of Alamo large quantities of its paper for the purpose of giving the Southern Exchange Bank preference for whatever amount might be due it in case the Bank of Alamo should have to discontinue its business. Among others, there were prayers in the petition that the Bank of Alamo be enjoined from disposing of any of its assets and preferring any of its creditors, that a receiver be appointed to take charge of its assets, and that plaintiff have judgment against all of the defendants.

Over objection of the defendants, an amendment to the petition was allowed, which in substance set up that after Pope had stopped payment of his check for $2,000 drawn on the Farmers' Bank of Glenwood and in favor of the Bank of Alamo, and while the check was in the possession of the Southern Exchange Bank, that bank, through its president, Williams, offered and proposed that, if Pope would allow his check paid, the Southern Exchange Bank would pay the check drawn by the Bank of Alamo on the Southern Exchange Bank and in favor of the Wheeler County Bank, for the purpose of paying the county warrant; that Pope thereupon agreed to allow the Farmers' Bank of Glenwood to pay his check; but that the Southern Exchange Bank thereafter refused to pay the check drawn by the Bank of Alamo on it in favor of the Bank of Wheeler County, and in settlement of the county warrant, and refused to pay Pope any part of the $2,000. The Southern Exchange Bank demurred to the petition generally and specially. It is also answered, denying all the material allegations except such as it could neither admit nor deny for want of sufficient information. The Bank of Alamo made no defense, and a verdict was directed against it. A verdict was rendered against the Southern Exchange Bank for the sum of $2,000 and interest thereon. It moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and it excepted, assigning error upon that ruling, and also upon exceptions pendente lite to the allowance of the amendment to the petition and the overruling of its demurrers thereto. Williams seems in some way to have dropped out of the case, and there were no rulings or findings as to him.

Larsen & Crockett, of Dublin, for plaintiff in error.

W. S. Mann, of McRae, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The amendment to the petition was properly allowed over objection by the defendant "that it was irrelevant and immaterial and changed the cause of action and set up a new cause of action."

[2-4] 2. Nor was it error to overrule the demurrers to the petition.

"A deposit may be for a specific purpose; as where money or property is delivered to the bank for some particular designated purpose, as a note for collection, money to pay a particular note or draft, etc. While such a deposit is sometimes termed a 'special deposit' and partakes of the nature of a special deposit to the extent that title remains in the depositor and does not pass to the bank, yet it seems more accurate to look on this as a distinct class of deposit. In using deposits made for the purpose of having them applied to a particular purpose, the bank acts as the agent of the depositor, and, if it should fail to apply it at all, or should misapply it, it could be recovered as a trust deposit; and the agency created by the deposit is revocable by the depositor at any time before the purpose of the deposit has been accomplished." 7 O. J. 632, § 307.

where many cases are cited in support of the text in notes 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Among the cases cited are McGregor v. Battle, 128 Ga. 577, 58 S. E. 28, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185, and Howard College v. Pace, 15 Ga. 486. It was held in the latter case:

"Where money is paid by A., into the hands of B., to remain at the disposal of C., the right to that money continues in A. until B. gives and C. takes credit for it, or B. actually pays it to C.; up to this period B. is the agent of A. only, and A. may countermand the authority to make the payment; in the same manner as a person who sends another to pay money may stop him before he arrives at the place where it is to be paid, and require him to deliver it back."

Also, Mayer v. Chattahoochee National Bank, 51 Ga. 325(2), was cited. It was there held:

"When A. deposits money in a bank, with directions that it is to be paid out to a check which he has given, or will give, to C., the money is still the money of A. until the bank either pays it, or promises C. to pay it, or unless it be deposited at the instance of procurement of C., or under an arrangement with him."

In Dolph v. Cross, 153 Iowa, 289, 133 N. W. 669, it was held that a depositor, making a deposit for the specific and stated purpose of meeting checks which he had just issued, binds the bank by the special conditions imposed, and does not make the bank merely the debtor of the depositor, as is the case with general deposits. And it has been held that a parol direction is sufficient to create a "specific deposit" or a deposit for some specific, designated purpose.

[5] Of course, it is the duty of the bank, when it becomes the agent of a depositor by accepting from him a "specific deposit," or one for a particular designated purpose, to use the deposit for that purpose and no other; and it has been held that the least turning aside by an agent of funds of his principal, held by the agent for a particular, designated purpose, is legally a wrongful act, and subjects any person who knowingly aids in such diversion to full responsibility. 21 R. C. L. 833, § 15.

[6] Notice to the president of a bank of facts affecting its interest is imputed to the bank. Fouche v. Merchants' National Bank, 110 Ga. 827(3), 36 S. E. 256, and cases cited; Faircloth v. Taylor, 147 Ga. 787(4), 95 S. E. 689; Balfour v. Fresno Canal, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 395, 55 Pac. 1062; Magee on Banks and Banking (3d Ed.) 120; 1 Michle on Banks and Banking, 825, § 116(1); Id., 834, § 116(3).

[7] A principal cannot ratify an act of his agent in part, and repudiate it in part. He must either ratify or repudiate it in its entirety; if he receives money or other benefit under a contract of his agent, he must restore it upon demand, or account for it.

[8] Applying the foregoing legal principles to the allegations of the petition as set forth in the statement of facts preceding this opinion, it set forth a cause of action against the Southern Exchange Bank as well as the Bank of Alamo. The special demurrer to the petition was without merit. The ground of it was that the petition did "not definitely and fully inform this defendant of the facts that would impart to it such knowledge of the facts and circumstances upon which the plaintiff relies that would put this defendant on notice of the special deposit and trust as aforesaid."

3. The rulings announced in the third headnote do not need elaboration.

GILLIAM v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (No. 12018.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Banks and banking — 188½ — Agent represents sender of money in signing application.

It is no part of the duty of a telegraph company's agent in charge of an office, which receives messages and transmits money by telegraph, to write out an application for the transmittal of money by an applicant; and when one desiring to transmit money by telegraph makes a verbal application over the telephone to the agent of the telegraph company, requesting him to transmit the money on the applicant's credit, and is informed by the agent that the rules of the company require the agent to have the money in hand before undertaking to transmit it, and where, for the convenience of the applicant, it is arranged between the agent and the applicant that the applicant shall deposit the money for the agent at some point where the agent will call and receive it, and where the agent, after having made such agreement with the applicant, takes the steps necessary for the transmission of the money to a distant point, and makes out an application to the telegraph company, signing thereto the applicant's name, the agent is, in signing such application, under such circumstances, the agent for the applicant; and where such application contains a waiver on the part of the applicant of identification of the payee of the money at the office at the point where the payee is to receive it, and authorizes and directs the telegraph company to pay the sum named in the order at the applicant's risk, and to such person as the company's agent believes to be the payee named in the application, the applicant is bound thereby. See, in this connection, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Prevatt (1907) 149 Ala. 617, 43 South. 106(2); Western Union Tel. Co. v. Holcomb (Tex. Civ. App. 1912), 152 S. W.

190(1); Carroll v. Sou. Express Co. (1892) 87 S. C. 452, 16 S. E. 128.

2. Banks and banking ⚡188½—Held not negligent in delivering money to wrong person.

Where the agent of the telegraph company at the office at the point of payment in good faith delivers the money to one whom he believes to be the payee, after satisfying himself from the direction on a letter in the possession of such person and from such person's correct knowledge of the amount of money expected and the name and address of the applicant, the telegraph company is not negligent in delivering the money to such person, and therefore is not liable to the applicant for delivering it to the wrong party, and to one who is not entitled thereto.

3. Verdict directed.

In a suit by the sender against the telegraph company to recover against the latter for having delivered the money transmitted to the wrong party, and to one not entitled thereto, where the evidence showed the above facts, a verdict was properly directed for the defendant.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Sept. 27, 1921. Rehearing Denied Oct. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Contracts ⚡170(2)—Meaning placed on contract known by other party to be so understood.

Where a building contractor contracted with the owner to perform certain services in the construction of a building, the compensation being a fixed amount, to be paid in part in certain stipulated monthly installments, and where, during the performance of the contract and before its completion, the entire interest in the lot and the interest in the contract were sold by the owner and acquired by a third party, who, under negotiations with the same supervising architect, who had devised the original plans and had been employed by the original owner to supervise the construction of the building, changed the original plans of the building, and enlarged thereon and planned for a building larger and costing more than as originally planned, and where the contractor, with knowledge of these facts and without any specific agreement with the new owner, continued in the capacity of contractor under the new conditions, and received from the new owner monthly installments in amounts equal to those provided in the original contract, the inference is authorized that the contractor was continuing to work for the new owner for the same compensation fixed by the original contract, and that the contractor knew that the new owner so understood and believed. In a suit by the contractor against the new owner to recover on quantum meruit for the services thus rendered to the defendant, a greater sum than he would have been entitled to under the original contract, where the above facts appeared from the evidence, section 4267, Civ. Code 1910, was applicable, and that section, or its substance, should have been given in charge to the jury without qualification. The section reads as follows: "The intention of the parties may differ among themselves. In such case, the meaning placed on the contract by one party, and known to be thus understood by the other party, at the time, shall be held as the true meaning."

2. Work and labor ⚡30(2)—Implied agreement of contractor to perform services for purchaser of lot held for the jury.

Under the conditions above narrated, where there is no express agreement between the contractor and the new owner obligating the contractor to perform services to the new owner under the terms of the original contract as to compensation, it may be inferred, from all the facts and circumstances of the entire transaction and the knowledge of the same by the contractor, that the contractor impliedly agreed to perform his services under the original contract and for the compensation therein provided, and this theory of the evidence should have been fully submitted to the jury under appropriate instruction.

3. Instructions—Judge did not misstate defendant's contentions.

Properly construing the plea and answer of the defendant, the trial judge did not misstate the defendant's contentions.

4. Evidence ⚡370(4)—Witnesses ⚡388(7)—Writings held properly excluded from evidence.

Certain writings offered in evidence by the defendant, the exclusion of which is excepted to in the first, second, third and fourth grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, were properly excluded, since it does not appear that they were written by the plaintiff or by his authority or by his authorized agent. Nor were they admissible for the purpose of impeachment, as being previous contradictory statements of the writers, since no foundation was laid for their admission for this purpose.

5. Grounds of motion without merit.

Except as above indicated, there appears no error as complained of in any of the grounds of the motion for a new trial.

6. Motion for new trial.

The defendant's motion for a new trial should have been sustained.

ZABAN v. COLEMAN et al. (No. 11812.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Sept. 27, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Partnership §200—Suit against firm suit against individuals and recovery permitted against one of the several defendants.

A suit against named parties, where it is alleged in the petition that the defendants did business under a certain style and name importing a partnership, is not necessarily a suit against the partnership alone, but is also a suit against the named individuals jointly and severally, and where the evidence sustains a verdict against one of the defendants only, the verdict will not be set aside at the instance of that defendant upon the ground that the evidence fails to support the plaintiff's petition.

2. Landlord and tenant §169(10)—Instruction pertinent to defect in premises prior to plaintiff's tenancy held proper.

This being a suit by a tenant to recover against the landlord for personal injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff, due to a defective condition in the rented premises, and the amendment to the plaintiff's petition and the evidence adduced upon the trial having presented an issue as to whether or not the defective condition of the premises arose prior to the commencement of the plaintiff's tenancy, a charge pertinent to such issue was proper, and was not subject to the exception that it introduced a foreign issue calculated to prejudice the defendant's case.

3. Landlord and tenant §164(8)—Liable for injuries occasioned by defect in premises.

While a landlord cannot be held liable for damages caused from defects in the rented premises occurring after he has parted with the possession, unless he has been notified thereof and has had a reasonable time in which to make repairs, he may nevertheless be liable for damages resulting from defects of which he had no notice, but the existence of which he could in the exercise of ordinary care have discovered when repairing the defects of which he did have notice.

4. Trial §242—Instruction referring to the defendant, where there were several, held not misleading.

A verdict having been directed for all of the defendants except one, and the case having proceeded to trial against this one defendant alone, a reference to "the defendant" in the charge of the court could not have misled the jury, and caused confusion in their minds as to which one of the defendants the court had reference to.

5. Deeds §119—Whether certain land falls within description may be question of fact for jury.

While the construction of a deed is a question for the court, yet whether certain real estate falls within the description recited in the deed may be a question of fact for the jury.

6. Tenants—Evidence warranting inference that defendant was landlord and was negligent.

The evidence warrants the inference that the defendant was the plaintiff's landlord, and that through his negligence the plaintiff was injured by reason of a defective condition in the rented premises.

7. Personal injuries—No abuse of discretion in denying new trial for excessive verdict.

Under all the evidence in this case this court is unable to hold that the trial judge abused his discretion in failing to sustain the defendant's motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict is excessive.

8. Appeal and error §242(1)—No review of statements by counsel, in absence of ruling.

Exceptions to statements made by counsel in argument to the jury, where the attention of the court was not called thereto and no ruling invoked thereon, present no ground of error for this court to consider. The fact that counsel for the complaining party refrained from invoking a ruling because of his fear that his act in so doing would operate to prejudice the jury against his client cannot affect the soundness of the present ruling.

9. Appeal and error §1075—Ground expressly abandoned not considered.

The seventh ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, having been expressly abandoned by the plaintiff in error, will not be considered.

10. Appeal and error §303—Ground of motion for new trial, not approved, not considered.

The eighth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, not being approved by the trial judge, cannot be considered.

11. Instructions—Court correctly charged jury.

In view of the above rulings, the court correctly charged the jury, and did not otherwise commit any error.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

band placed the automobile with the plaintiff for repairs, by the direction of his wife, or by the approval of his wife," then she would be liable for the debt "that she had directed her husband to incur, or that she had approved or ratified," is not subject to the exception that the use of the word "approval" was calculated to mislead the jury to the prejudice of the defendant, in that "no explanation was given or limitation made as to just what would and what would not amount to an approval." Nor was this excerpt from the charge subject to the exception that it was not applicable to the issues made in the case.

2. Motion for new trial overruled.

A verdict for the plaintiff being authorized by the evidence, and no error of law appearing, the court did not err in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial.

JONES v. NEWSOME. (No. 12057.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Sept. 27, 1921. Rehearing Denied Sept. 30, 1921.)

1. Logs and logging §26(3)—Proprietor of sawmill held not to acquire lien.

The proprietor of a sawmill who contracts to saw timber and to furnish for that purpose a mill and a fireman at a stipulated price per day, such price to cover the rent of the mill, as well as his own labor and the labor of the fireman, does not acquire, and cannot foreclose, a lien for the price thus contracted for, under sections 3357, 3334, and 3335, Civ. Code 1910, providing for laborers' liens. Evans v. Beddingfield, 106 Ga. 755, 32 S. E. 664.

2. Logs and logging §28—Proprietor of sawmill, to acquire lien upon lumber, must file and record it.

In order for the proprietor of a sawmill to acquire a lien upon the lumber sawed by his mill under a contract with the owner of the lumber, after the lumber sawed has been surrendered to the owner thereof, it is necessary for him to file and record his lien within 10 days from the time of the completion of the work. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3354, 3356.

3. Logs and logging §33(9)—Affidavit of foreclosure of lien held properly dismissed.

It appearing from the affidavit of foreclosure in the instant case, as amended, that the plaintiff was a sawmill proprietor, and counsel for the plaintiff having admitted that the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3354, 3356, had not been complied with, and it also appearing from the original affidavit of foreclosure, as amended, that the sum sought to be recovered was the contract price, which included the labor of the proprietor, as well as the labor of an employee of the contractor and the rent of the sawmill, and thus not within the provisions of the statute providing for the foreclosure of laborers' liens, the court did not err, upon motion of the defendant, in dismissing the plaintiff's affidavit of foreclosure as amended, since the amendment in substance adopted the allegations in the counter affidavit denying the existence of a lien.

ANDERSON et al. v. HOLDEN et al. (No. 11645.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Aug. 8, 1921. Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Banks and banking §58(3)—Salt held brought by receiver.

Under an order of the superior court a petition was filed in the name of the receiver of the bank by and for the benefit of certain named persons, with the privilege of all others similarly situated to join therein. Demurrers, both general and special, were filed to the petition. On the hearing of the demurrers the court held that the petition was in the name of and by the receiver. This question was certified to the Supreme Court and that court held that under a proper construction of the pleadings the suit was by the receiver.

2. Banks and banking §58(3)—Bank need not be defendant in its receiver's action.

In addition to this ruling by the lower court the judge ruled as follows: (2) That it was not necessary that the bank be named as party defendant; (3) that the amendments to the petition were allowable and did not add a new party or new cause of action; (4) the general demurrers were overruled; (5) the special demurrers were overruled. Held, that these rulings and judgments of the trial judge were not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned.

THACKER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  304(20)—Common knowledge that corn whisky is intoxicating.

It is a matter of common knowledge that corn whisky is intoxicating.

2. Intoxicating liquors  $\S$  138—Fixed destination not necessary to constitute unlawful "transportation."

An ultimate destination at a fixed point is not necessary to constitute "transportation" within the prohibition statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Transport—Transportation.]

3. Intoxicating liquors  $\S$  138—Transportation held unlawful.

Transportation of corn whisky in an automobile to be drunk along the road by defendant and the friends who were riding with him held unlawful.

4. Intoxicating liquors  $\S$  224—No burden on commonwealth to show quantity unlawfully transported.

In a prosecution for unlawfully transporting corn whisky, where it appeared that defendant took a half-gallon fruit jar of the whisky along on an automobile trip to be drunk along the road, there was no burden on the commonwealth to show that the jar contained more than a quart.

5. Criminal law  $\S$  1172(8)—Where verdict is correct error in instructions immaterial.

Where the jury could not have found any other verdict than that of guilty error in the instructions is immaterial.

Error to Circuit Court, Alleghany County.

One Thacker was convicted of unlawful transportation of ardent spirits, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Revercomb and W. Chapman Revercomb, both of Covington, Va., for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of unlawful transportation of ardent spirits, and sentenced to pay a fine of $50 and to confinement in jail 30 days. There is no conflict in the testimony, which was to the following effect: The plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant) invited two friends to accompany him in his automobile to the country. They accepted the invitation and drove into the country to the house of one Harmon Smith, where the defendant obtained a half-gallon glass fruit jar with something in it, whether more or less than a quart the witness did not know, and put it on the running board of the car. The contents of the jar tasted and smelt like corn whisky, and was corn whisky, but did not make the witness drunk. While the defendant was cranking his car for the return trip, one of his friends, who was the witness testifying, picked up the jar and took a drink out of it, and set it in the rear of the car, and "they all drank out of this jar on the way back."

[1-5] Several errors are assigned, but it would be a waste of time to discuss them. It is matter of common knowledge that corn whisky is intoxicating, and section 1 of the prohibition act declares that "whisky" shall be embraced in the term "ardent spirits." The court is also of opinion that an "ultimate destination" at a fixed point is not necessary to constitute "transportation" within the meaning of the prohibition statute; that the transportation was not in the personal baggage of the defendant; that the transportation "to be drunk along the road" was unlawful; that there was no burden on the commonwealth to show that the jar contained more than a quart; and that the jury could not have found any other verdict than that of guilty, and hence the ruling of the trial court on the instructions was immaterial.

The judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

OSBORNE v. RICHMOND et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Descent and distribution §117—Evidence held sufficient to show payment of consideration recited in deed.

On an issue, in a partition suit, as to whether land conveyed by a deed reciting a consideration "in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged" was intended as an advancement constituting plaintiff's full share in the estate, evidence held sufficient to show that such consideration was actually paid; the recital being accepted as true unless overturned by clear proof.

2. Descent and distribution §117—Evidence held insufficient to show inadequate consideration for lands conveyed to plaintiff.

On an issue in a partition suit as to whether land conveyed to plaintiff by deed reciting payment and receipt of a named pecuniary consideration constituted his full share of the estate, parol evidence, though admissible to show there was also the consideration of an advancement, held insufficient to show the amount paid was inadequate.

3. Descent and distribution §117—Evidence held to show conveyance not intended as advancement.

In a partition suit, evidence held to show decedent intended deed conveying land to plaintiff as one for valuable consideration, and not as advancement or gift constituting plaintiff's full share of the estate.

4. Descent and distribution §115—Gift to child presumed advancement to be brought into hotchpot.

Whether a gift to a child adapted to advance it in life is an advancement to be brought into hotchpot depends on the parent's intention, and a free gift so adapted is prima facie presumed to be so designed.

5. Descent and distribution §112—Value of advancement brought into hotchpot fixed as of date of gift, and consideration paid deducted from value of land as of date of deed.

The value of an advancement brought into hotchpot must be fixed as of the date of the gift, not that of the partition, and a consideration actually paid must be deducted from the value of the land as of the date of the deed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Scott County.

Suit by G. W. Osborne against Ellen Richmond and others. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

S. H. Bond, of Gate City, R. P. Bruce, of Wise, and Will H. Nickels, of Gate City, for appellant.

W. S. Cox, of Gate City, for appellees.

KELLY, P. This is a partition suit, and the sole question for decision is whether a certain deed from David Osborne to his son, G. W. Osborne, should be treated as an advancement and brought into hotchpot.

David Osborne at one time owned three separate tracts of land—the "home tract," of 211 acres, the "Buckner's Ridge tract," of 236 acres, and the "mountain tract," of 220 acres.

On August 8, 1901, he conveyed 120 acres of the Buckner's Ridge tract to his son, G. W. Osborne, for life, with remainder in fee to his children, reserving, however, a life estate in the grantor, and excepting and reserving "all minerals on, in, and under the aforesaid tract of land which have been contracted or sold to other parties." The deed recited a consideration of "four hundred and ninety-five dollars in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged."

On October 2, 1903, David Osborne, in consideration of $1,500, the receipt of which was acknowledged in the deed, conveyed to another son, L. N. Osborne, all of the home tract with the exception of the "iron ore" theretofore sold to Patrick Hagan, and reserving to the grantor and his wife a life interest in 100 acres of the tract thus conveyed. This deed contained the following stipulation:

"The said grantee, L. N. Osborne, accepts the above tract of land described in this deed as his part, or interest, in the real estate owned by said David Osborne."

In 1915 David Osborne, being still the owner of the mountain tract and 116 acres of the Buckner's Ridge tract, died intestate; and shortly thereafter this suit was brought by G. W. Osborne against the other heirs of David Osborne, seeking a partition of these lands. The bill alleged that the above-recited deed of October 2, 1903, to L. N. Osborne constituted an advancement to him of his entire interest in the estate, and that he was not entitled to participate in the partition. The truth of this allegation conclusively appears on the face of the deed, is conceded by L. N. Osborne, and he claims no share in the lands herein involved. Mrs. Ellen Richmond, a daughter, T. J. Osborne, a son, and some of the other heirs of David Osborne, answered the bill, and denied the right of the complainant, G. W. Osborne, to share in the partition, because, as they claimed, the deed made to him by his father on August 8, 1901, constituted his full share in the estate.

Proof was taken on both sides, and the court upon final hearing entered a decree adjudging that the land conveyed to G. W. Osborne by deed of August 8, 1901, "was an advancement, and should, if complainant participated in the partition, be brought into hotchpot." Thereupon G. W. Osborne obtained this appeal.

[1] Many witnesses were examined on both sides, and the evidence is in some particulars in great conflict. There is one material fact, however, which seems to us established by the clear weight of testimony, and that is that the consideration of $495 named in the deed was actually paid. Whether this consideration was adequate, and, if not, whether the excess in value of the land should be treated as a gift and advancement, are different questions; but the fact that the $495 was paid is hardly open to fair debate under the evidence before us. The recital itself, though open to contradiction by satisfactory proof, is prima facie true, and must be so accepted unless overturned by clear proof. The solemn acknowledgment of this payment in writing is evidence of the highest and most satisfactory character, and of great probative value. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) p. 963. This rule certainly applies to recitals in a deed in so far as the grantor and his heirs are concerned. 2 Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) §§ 817-821. G. W. Osborne testified directly to the payment, and explained in a plausible and reasonably satisfactory way how it was made. The notary public who wrote the deed and took the acknowledgment testified that David Osborne dictated all of the terms of the deed, including the recital as to the consideration. At least eight witnesses, apparently free from bias or interest, testified that David Osborne in his lifetime acknowledged that G. W. Osborne had bought and paid for the land. No witness testified in terms that the consideration was not paid, and the only evidence which can be construed as being substantially to that effect is the statement of the witness L. N. Osborne, who said that G. W. Osborne stated soon after the deed was made that he "had the deed made as though it was a sale in order to make it hold good." This witness has no property interest in this suit, and his testimony is entitled to careful consideration. We do not think, however, that his evidence as just quoted is sufficient to offset the recital in the deed and the volume of evidence in its support. The money consideration recited in the deed from David Osborne to G. W. Osborne must, in our opinion, be regarded as having actually passed.

of an advancement to the daughter of the bargainor." 2 Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) 829. It is insisted that the evidence shows that the land was worth much more than G. W. Osborne paid for it. This insistence, however, is not very well supported by the evidence in its entirety. The witnesses differ, but upon the whole, and considering the fact that a life estate in the land was reserved to David Osborne and his wife, that the minerals on the land had been sold and were accepted, and that it was shown that the best of the timber had been sold and taken from the land, we are unable to say that $495 may not at the time have been a reasonably adequate price for the conveyance.

[3] Coming to the question of the intention of the grantor, it may perhaps be fairly said that the parol evidence is about equally balanced as to whether David Osborne by his own subsequent statements indicated that he intended the land conveyed by the deed of August 8, 1901, to be in lieu of G. W. Osborne's share in his estate; but it certainly does not preponderate in favor of the affirmative of this question. We are very much impressed by the testimony of Dr. N. W. Stallard, a practicing physician, who had known David Osborne for 40 years, had been intimately acquainted with him for 20 years, and had repeatedly heard him say that L. N. Osborne had already received his full share, that he expected the other children to share equally in the remainder of the estate, and that G. W. Osborne had bought and paid for the land theretofore conveyed to him. This testimony strikes us as being entitled to especial weight, not only because of the character of the witness and his opportunity to know the facts, but because it is in harmony with the provision in the deed to L. N. Osborne to the effect that the land he got was to be treated as his full share, and with the absence of any such provision in the deed to G. W. Osborne. The fact that the father of these two boys put such a provision in one of the deeds and omitted it in the other is quite significant. In view of this circumstance and the parol testimony in harmony with it, and in the absence of any preponderating proof that the price paid was not reasonably adequate, or that David Osborne intended the transaction as other than an ordinary deed and conveyance for a valuable consideration, we have reached the conclusion that it was error to treat the same as an advancement.

[4] The general propositions of law controlling the subject of advancements are well settled in this state, and have been reviewed by this court in several recent cases. Whether a gift to a child, supposing the gift to be adapted to advance the child in life, is or not to be deemed an advancement such as must be brought into hotchpot, depends upon the intention of the parent; and a free gift so adapted is prima facie to be presumed to have been so designed. Payne v. Payne, 128 Va. 33, 104 S. E. 713, 715; Poff v. Poff, 128 Va. 62, 104 S. E. 719, 724. In this case, however, the gift is not proved, and the case of the appellee breaks down at this point.

[5] The conclusion we have reached does not affect the result of the partition as materially as might upon a casual view appear. The Buckner's Ridge land, a part of which was conveyed to G. W. Osborne, and the remainder of which now belongs to the estate to be partitioned, appears at this time to be quite valuable, but it was not so valuable at the time of the alleged advancement, and, if it were treated as an advancement, the value when brought into hotchpot would be fixed as of the date of the gift, and not as of the date of partition. Graves' Notes on Real Prop. § 171. Moreover, the $495 which was paid for the land by G. W. Osborne would have to be deducted from its value as of the date of the deed, so that in the final result the value for which G. W. Osborne would have to account in the partition would perhaps not amount to a great deal as compared with the value of the whole estate at this time. But, however this may be, the decree complained of, for the reasons stated, will be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

ATWOOD v. HUFF.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Corporations §152 — Corporation acting on stockholders' resolution declaring dividend estopped to deny its validity.

Where stockholders and directors by common consent concur in the management of a corporation, it will be assumed that the directors accepted a resolution of the stockholders declaring a dividend, and the corporation, having acted on the resolution, is estopped to deny its validity.

2. Corporations §155(4) — Dividend belongs to owner of stock when declared whether due or not.

A dividend belongs to the owner of the stock at the time it is declared whether it is payable at a future time or not.

3. Corporations §121(5) — Buyer of stock has burden of showing that dividends previously declared are included in sale.

The burden is on buyer of stock to show that a dividend previously declared, but not yet paid, is included in the sale; the presumption being that it is not included if the agreement is silent in that respect.

4. Corporations §152 — Stockholders' ratified resolution held effective declaration of dividend.

A resolution of the stockholders of a corporation declaring a dividend from assessments from new stock issued, ratified by the corporation, held an effective declaration of a dividend, constituting a contract between the stockholders and the company whereby definite rights were fixed, though such dividend was not immediately payable.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Roanoke.

Suit by B. P. Huff against the Virginia Atwood Orchard Company, Inc., wherein K. C. Atwood intervenes. Judgment against the Company in favor of plaintiff, and intervener brings error. Affirmed.

Staples, Cocke & Hazlegrove, of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error.

Woods, Chitwood, Coxe & Rogers, and Hall, Wingfield & Apperson, all of Roanoke, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. On November 9, 1911, the stockholders of the Stuart Orchard Company, at a meeting lawfully called by the board of directors for the purpose of amending its charter by increasing its outstanding capital stock from $50,000 to $75,000, passed a resolution, the pertinent part of which as it affects this litigation, reads thus:

"Resolved that we increase the capital stock of the Stuart Orchard Company to $75,000.00, and that the present stockholders shall have a cash dividend declared to them of 10 per cent. payable out of the last assessment from the extra $25,000.00 issue. * * *

The reason for this resolution is thus explained in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error:

"At this time it was found necessary to have additional capital in order to carry on the business with greater success, and hence the appropriate steps were taken to obtain an amendment to the charter in order to enable the Stuart Orchard Company to issue and sell $25,000 of new stock. However, the assets of the corporation were in excess of its capital stock, and hence the shares of stock with a par value of $100 were now worth more. Therefore it would be unfair to the old stockholders to allow the new stock to participate equally in the gross assets of the corporation at a purchase price of $100 per share."

In order to obviate this unfairness, it was determined to guarantee to the then stockholders by way of a preference over those who should subscribe to the new stock an amount equal to the difference between its actual and its par value; this difference being found to be $10 per share, or 10 per cent. To effect this purpose, therefore, the resolution declared a preferred dividend of this amount to be paid out of the last assessment on the new stock whenever paid.

This resolution accomplished the same result as if the new stock had been sold for a premium, instead of at par, $100 per share.

The purpose of the resolution may be otherwise expressed thus in the language of the attorneys for the defendant in error:

"At the time of the passage of the resolution, the Stuart Orchard Company had a surplus. To have sold the new stock at par and to have allowed the purchasers of the extra $25,000 issue to share in this surplus would be giving them the benefit of the years of accumulation that the old stockholders had brought about. The obvious purpose, therefore, was that the surplus should be distributed among the persons who were the stockholders on November 9, 1911, and thereby put their stock on an equal basis with the new stock. Both the old and the new stock would then be on a parity."

Pursuant to that resolution, the board of directors of the Stuart Orchard Company secured an amendment to its charter, the additional $25,000 of stock was subscribed for, and the stock issued. The last assessment, 10 per cent., was paid in July, 1917.

The Stuart Orchard Company and another corporation, the Atwood Orchard & Nursery Company, had previously, in the year 1916, merged with each other, under the name of the Virginia Atwood Orchard Company, Inc., and the new or merged company assumed all of the obligations of the Stuart Orchard Company, and collected the last 10 per cent. assessment due upon the $25,000 capital stock increase of the Stuart Orchard Company referred to. On November 9, 1911, when the resolution was adopted, Huff, the defendant in error, owned 105 shares of stock in the Stuart Orchard Company, and he subscribed for 54 shares of the new stock. Thereafter, on May 13, 1913, Huff and certain other stockholders gave a written option, whereby they agreed to sell their stock in the Stuart Orchard Company. This option did not refer to the resolution of November 9, 1911, or to the 10 per cent. cash dividend thereby declared. This option was assigned to John C. Shockley, trustee, who on September 1, 1913, exercised it, and there is a fair inference that he was then acting for Atwood and another. At the time that option was exercised, Huff and Taylor, another one of the old stockholders, stated to Shockley that they claimed this 10 per cent. dividend, and demanded that the amount thereof be added to the $150 per share for which their entire holdings were about to be sold. Shockley, however, neither admitted nor denied that they were entitled to the dividend, but responded that the dividend was not then due. Huff, upon advice of counsel, in Shockley's presence, did not insist upon the dividend being then paid because it was not then payable. Atwood claims that when he bought the stock from Shockley he understood that the dividend was sold to him with the stock, but he admits that this information was not derived from either Huff or any of his associates.

The proceedings of both companies show that all of the interested parties were fully aware of the existence of the original resolution, and frequent references thereto appear in the records of the Stuart Orchard Company and in reports made by its secretary and treasurer. One of several similar reports, that of December 31, 1915, containing a statement of outstanding liabilities as well as the working capital of the company, has this memorandum attached:

"This takes no account of the interest on past-due assessments, and no account of the 10 per cent. dividend to be paid old stockholders out of the last assessment of the last stock issued. This dividend will amount to $5,000."

And the minutes show that this report was ordered to be spread upon the records of the company upon motion of Shockley by Atwood. After the final installment of 10 per cent. upon the additional stock had been collected, Huff instituted this motion against the Virginia Atwood Orchard Company, Inc., for the recovery of the 10 per cent. upon 105 shares of stock of the Stuart Orchard Company, of which he was the owner in November, 1911, when the resolution was adopted—that is, for $1,050.

The defendant company filed its affidavit disclaiming any interest in the amount constituting the subject-matter of the motion, but alleging that Atwood had a claim thereto; and thereupon Atwood was allowed to intervene, and this controversy is between Huff and Atwood as to which is entitled to the amount.

The parties waived a jury, and submitted all questions of law and fact to the judge of the trial court upon a written stipulation of the evidence. The court entered judgment against the company in favor of Huff, and Atwood assigns error.

The chief argument for Atwood appears to be based upon the claim that the stockholders in 1911 had no legal authority to declare a dividend, because the board of directors alone has such authority to declare corporate dividends.

[1, 2] In this case we do not think it necessary to undertake to follow the learned counsel in their discussion of the powers and the limitations thereof of stockholders and directors in this respect. It is observed however, that where stockholders and directors, by common consent, concur in the management of a corporation, as is clearly shown to have been the case here, the rights of creditors being in no way involved, it will be assumed that the directors accepted the resolution of the stockholders declaring a dividend, and the corporation, having acted on the resolution, is estopped to deny its validity. Thiry v. Banner Window Glass Co., 81 W. Va. 39, 93 S. E. 958, L. R. A. 1918B, note 1051. In our view it is entirely immaterial whether the 10 per cent. which the company by the resolution obligated itself to pay to the then stockholders is technically a dividend or not. It created an obligation having all of the effect of a dividend. It is referred to in the resolution as a dividend, whenever referred to in the minutes of the stockholders' meeting it is so called, and by both litigants in their pleadings it is thus designated. When acted upon, it constituted an obligation of the Stuart Orchard Company to its then stockholders, created for the purpose of equalizing the value of the old and the new stock. The Virginia Atwood Orchard Company, Inc., has recognized it as its obligation only because upon the merger it assumed the liabilities of the Stuart Orchard Company. If it was not then a debt previously contracted by the Stuart Orchard Company, it could not be an obligation of the merged company. This dividend or debt was a part of the consideration to be paid out of the subscriptions of the new stockholders to the old stockholders upon the amendment of the charter whereby the new subscribers were permitted to become stockholders. By acting upon that resolution in securing the amendment to its charter, under which the corporation has since transacted business for many years, it ratified and approved the incurring of that obligation. It is perfectly well settled that a dividend (and, as we have indicated, this obligation must be construed to have all of the attributes of a dividend) belongs to the owner of the stock at the time it is declared, and this whether it is payable at a future time or not.

This is said in 14 C. J. p. 820, § 1242:

"So as between vendor and vendee, although the rule may be changed by contract between the parties, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, dividends declared prior to the transfer of ownership belong to the transferor, and the rule is the same although the dividend is not payable until after the transfer, while dividends declared subsequent to the change of ownership belong to the transferee, and it is immaterial that such dividends were earned in whole or in part prior to such transfer."

Pertinent cases are Bowers v. Post (D. C.) 209 Fed. 660, affirmed 220 Fed. 1006, 135 C. O. A. 665; Wheeler v. Northwestern Sleigh Co. (C. C.) 39 Fed. 347; Cogswell v. Second Nat. Bank, 78 Conn. 75, 60 Atl. 1059, affirmed 204 U. S. 1, 27 Sup. Ct. 241, 51 L. Ed. 343; Bright v. Lord, 51 Ind. 272, 19 Am. Rep. 732; Hill v. Newichawanick Co., 8 Hun. (N. Y.) 459, affirmed 71 N. Y. 593; Hopper v. Sage, 112 N. Y. 530, 20 N. E. 350, 8 Am. St. Rep. 771; Clark v. Campbell, 23 Utah, 569, 65 Pac. 496, 54 L. R. A. 508, 90 Am. St. Rep. 716; 7 R. C. L. § 267, p. 292.

This proposition is not questioned. It is insisted, however, for the plaintiff in error, that this was not a dividend declared in 1911, and that it did not have the attributes of a dividend until after the contract between the Stuart Orchard Company and the Virginia Atwood Orchard Company, which provided that the latter should pay a dividend to the stockholders of the former company, and so, regardless of any corporate action by the former company, this debt only then became an executed obligation of the new corporation to then holders of the stock of the dissolving corporation. Thenceforth it is admitted it had every attribute of a dividend, but that it was not until after Atwood had become the holder of the stock that this contract arose, and not until then did any of the essential attributes of a dividend attach.

[3] We cannot agree that this is true. If the action of the stockholders of the Stuart Orchard Company and its repeated confirmation thereof from time to time did not create this obligation, it has never yet been created, and does not exist because it has never been formally declared as a dividend by the board of directors of either company. Atwood did not become the owner of this fund merely because he purchased the 105 shares of stock of Huff, after the obligation had been created. It was, of course, within the power of Huff, when he sold the stock, to include this debt or dividend of the company, and to make it payable to his vendee, but the burden is upon the vendee upon such a transfer of stock to show that such debts previously incurred, or dividends previously declared, but not yet paid, are included in the sale. The agreement being silent on this subject, the presumption is that they are not so included, and hence do not pass to the vendee.

There is some conflict in the evidence as to what the parties understood, but this conflict was submitted to the judge of the trial court, and under Code 1919, § 6363:

"When a case at law is decided by a court or judge without the intervention of a jury, and a party excepts to the decision on the ground that it is contrary to the evidence, and the evidence (not the facts) is certified, the judgment of the trial court shall not be set aside unless it appears from the evidence that such judgment is plainly wrong or without evidence to support it."

[4] This judgment is neither plainly wrong nor without supporting evidence. There is evidence that, when the settlement for the transfer of the stock was made, Huff called attention to and claimed this dividend, but, as it was not then due and had not been paid, he had no legal right to insist that his vendee should pay it, and upon the advice of counsel he transferred the stock. This, as we have indicated, does not of itself assign the dividend. So that we are of opinion that the resolution of November 11, 1909, ratified in so many ways as it has been since, was the effective declaration of a dividend, constituting a contract between the then holders of the stock of the Stuart Orchard Company and the company, whereby definite rights were fixed, though the realization thereof was deferred, which contract was thereafter assumed by the Virginia Atwood Orchard Company, and that Atwood has failed to show that this dividend obligation or debt thus clearly due originally to Huff has ever been by him either sold or assigned.

It is unnecessary for us further to follow the elaborate arguments of counsel in all of their details, because the reasons herein indicated are sufficient to support the judgment of the trial court.

Affirmed.

CYPHERS v. DINGUS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Deeds ⇨211(3)—Burden of proof on party charging fraud.

One charging fraud as a ground for cancellation of deeds must prove it by strong, clear, and convincing evidence.

2. Deeds ⇨207—Circumstances considered in determining whether instrument was obtained by fraud.

The mere fact that oral testimony relating directly to the execution of the deed is equally balanced in point of number of witnesses testifying for and against its fair execution does not necessarily mean that the attack upon the instrument must fail, since a question of fraud may depend as much upon circumstances as upon the statements of the parties.

3. Deeds ⇨211(3)—Finding of fraud warranted by evidence.

A finding of fraud in an action to cancel deeds conveying land held warranted by the evidence.

4. Appeal and error ⇨931(1) — Presumption of correctness of decree on appeal.

On appeal in an equitable action to cancel deeds conveying land, the Supreme Court sits as a court of review, and the decree comes to it with a presumption of correctness, and it will not be reversed if the court is not fully satisfied that it is wrong.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Suit by J. B. Dingus against W. A. Cyphers. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fulton & Vicars, of Wise, for plaintiff.

Bond & Bruce, of Wise, for defendant.

KELLY, P. On April 5, 1916, J. B. Dingus conveyed to J. J. Moore, trustee, two small tracts of land containing in the aggregate about 13 acres. On the same day J. J. Moore, trustee, conveyed this land to W. A. Cyphers, and received in exchange therefor a deed from Cyphers for a house and four lots known as the "Buchanan property," and two other lots known as the "Oates Cyphers" lots. The decree appealed from, rendered in a suit brought for the purpose by Dingus, set aside and canceled all three of these deeds and undertook to place the parties as far as possible in statu quo by directing a commissioner to reconvey the respective properties to Dingus and Cyphers.

The ground upon which Dingus sought to have the deeds canceled was that Cyphers, acting for himself and for one H. C. Cornett, procured from him the deed for the 13 acres by false representation, and in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme between Cyphers and Cornett, whereby the subsequent exchange was to be made.

There are no new or novel questions involved, and the decision of the case depends wholly upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the charge of fraud on the part of Cyphers in procuring the deed from Dingus.

The evidence is voluminous and in many respects conflicting. We shall first state briefly what, as we think, may fairly be called the undisputed facts material to the controversy:

Dingus, Cyphers, and Cornett all resided at or near the town of Coeburn. Dingus and Cyphers were acquaintances and neighbors of long standing. Dingus was a laboring man not much experienced in trading, but was intelligent and thrifty, and in addition to the property here involved owned a tract of about 29 acres, worth perhaps several thousand dollars.

Cyphers was a dealer in real estate, on his own account and as agent for others, owned a good many properties, and was an experienced trader.

Cornett had lived at Coeburn only a short time, was not well known there, but so far as known was generally regarded as something of an adventurer, and of rather uncertain credit and standing. He was the owner of two negotiable notes of $2,000, executed to him by F. A. and A. C. Shuyler, of Cornelia, Ga., as an advance payment on lumber which Cornett and his associates were to manufacture for the Shuylers.

Cornett had deposited one of these notes with the Miners' Bank of Commerce at Coeburn as collateral security for a loan of $500 from that bank, but he was pressed for money, and for some time prior to April 5, 1916, had been making continued and strenuous efforts to exchange one or both notes for real estate. He had a number of opportunities to exchange the notes for land at prices acceptable to him, but all of the owners of such lands refused to take the notes as cash, and insisted on retaining a lien to secure the amount in case the notes were not paid. Cornett would not trade that way, giving as his reason that he needed money, and would want to procure a loan on the property, which he could not do if a vendor's lien thereon was retained.

Mr. C. O. Ramsey, cashier of the Miners' Bank of Coeburn, had in former years known Mr. F. A. Shuyler in North Carolina, and regarded him from the reputation he bore there as an honest and upright man, but Ramsey did not know how he was rated in point of financial worth. About the time the Miners' Bank made the $500 loan to Cornett, Ramsey had some correspondence with the Shuylers and with a bank at Cornelia, Ga., in regard to the notes held by Cornett, and as a result had been informed by the Shuylers that the notes were genuine and good, and would be paid at maturity; and had also been informed by the bank that the Shuylers had been fairly good customers, and were regarded as honest and reasonably safe.

Cyphers was one of the men, and, indeed, to have been the principal one, whom Cornett had endeavored to interest in a trade for the notes, and their negotiations had embraced properties owned by Cyphers individually, as well as properties owned by third persons. Cornett had referred Cyphers to Ramsey for information as to the Shuyler notes, and, while Ramsey would not take the responsibility of advising Cyphers to trade for them, he gave him the information in regard thereto above recited, and Cyphers says he reached the conclusion that the notes were good, and was willing to risk his judgment on them in a trade which he was trying to make with Cornett for land owned jointly by Cyphers and his brother in West Virginia. This latter trade was pending and awaiting communication by Cyphers with his brother in West Virginia when the sale was made by Dingus to Cornett. There were also other negotiations pending at that time respecting various other properties between Cornett and Cyphers, and between Cornett and others.

Some little time before the trade was made with Dingus, Cyphers and Cornett had looked at the 29-acre tract owned by the former, and Cornett seemed to be favorably impressed with it. It seems that they had also at the same time seen the two tracts which we have referred to as the 13 acres. Shortly thereafter Cornett came to the N. & W. pump-house where Dingus worked every day, introduced himself to Dingus, talked to him in a general way about how land was selling in the community, and told him that Cyphers wanted to see him. Still later, but in a very short time, Cyphers went to see Dingus and tried to purchase the 29-acre tract from him, and in the course of the negotiations told him that he thought he could sell that tract to Cornett. Cyphers says he was trying to buy this land on his own account, and turn it over to Cornett at a profit, but the mere fact that they were negotiating, and that Cornett was named as a probable buyer, is all that need be mentioned here, with the addition that the negotiations were abandoned because certain infant heirs had an interest in the 29 acres, and the title thereto was not marketable.

A day or two later Cornett saw Dingus at Kilgore's store and asked for a price on the 13 acres. Dingus named $2,000 as the price, and Cornett said Cyphers would see him about it.

While there is a direct conflict of testimony as to the circumstances under which Cyphers and Dingus next met, the parties agree that a day or two later they did meet at the pump house, discussed the exchange of the 13 acres for one of Cornett's $2,000 notes, and on the same day Dingus conveyed these tracts to Moore, trustee for Cornett, in consideration of the $2,000 note, and that Dingus paid Cornett $100, which went to him as his compensation for helping to make the deal. It is also admitted that Cyphers prepared all three of the deeds involved in this litigation, that at the time Dingus acknowledged and delivered his deed to Moore, trustee, Cyphers had the two other deeds in his pocket, and that they were all three executed and delivered the same day, although it seems clear that Dingus did not at the time know anything about the exchange. The Buchanan property, which Moore, trustee, got by virtue of the exchange, was one of the properties which Cyphers had offered to Cornett, and about which they had been negotiating just prior to the time of the Dingus trade.

Some time in the afternoon of the day on which Dingus delivered the deed to Moore, trustee, he took the note to Coeburn to place it in the First National Bank, where he kept an account, and was there given information which made him uneasy about its value. He asked Cyphers to indorse it, and upon his refusal brought this suit.

Up to the time of the trade with Dingus nothing more was known about the Shuyler notes than was indicated in the information possessed and given out by Ramsey at the Miners' Bank. It developed shortly afterwards that Cornett defaulted in his contract with the Shuylers, and, furthermore, that they, as well as Cornett, either were or soon became insolvent, and the notes were wholly worthless.

It is difficult for us to reach an entirely satisfactory conclusion in this case. Cyphers denies having made any representations to Dingus about the notes, and claims that he abandoned all his own negotiations with Cornett at the earnest solicitation of Dingus, who, as he claims, was acting independently, had started negotiations with Cornett, and employed him to help complete the trade. He has given an intelligent and clear deposition, which, standing alone, makes a complete defense to all in the charges against him.

On the other hand, Dingus has testified without qualification to the effect that he had offered Cornett the land for $2,000, and, after Cornett had said that he would see Cyphers about it, the latter came up to his place of work, said he had come to close the trade, and represented the note to be good, saying (in response to a statement by Dingus that he did not know anything about the Cornett notes):

"They are absolutely gilt edge and good and will be paid at maturity; I have investigated the note thoroughly myself and know what I am talking about."

Further on in his deposition Dingus says again:

"I traded for the note from Cyphers; took his word and honor. He recommended the note to be gilt edge and good and worth 100 cents to the dollar."

Upon many of the details and circumstances bearing upon the execution and delivery of the deed Dingus and Cyphers and their respective witnesses squarely contradict each other. It is not easy to say where the preponderance of evidence lies. Both Dingus and Cyphers are contradicted by other witnesses as to certain statements made by them, but it is perhaps fair to say that the circumstantial evidence, independent of the presumption in favor of the finding of the lower court, turns the scale in favor of Dingus.

The transaction in itself is unusual, and the circumstances by which it is surrounded or set about render it suspicious in itself. Cyphers evidently thought the notes were probably good, but he knew they were risky. He was a real estate trader; he knew Cornett better than Dingus knew him, and he knew that Cornett was anxious to trade the notes for real estate without the retention of a lien. For weeks Cornett had been diligently trying to buy land from or through him on just the terms he got from Dingus, and had failed. The record leaves no room to doubt, and Cyphers must have known, that Cornett was willing to let the notes go for less than their face value if he could get in exchange therefor a deed for real estate without a lien retained to secure the payment of the note. Indeed, while there is no shocking difference in the value of the two properties actually involved here, the Dingus land acquired by Cornett was worth appreciably more than the Buchanan property and the Oates Cyphers lots which Cornett got in exchange. Cyphers had been in close and intimate touch and communication with Cornett up to the very morning of the Dingus trade, and there is little doubt that he knew he could exchange for the note the very property which Cornett that day accepted in exchange for the Dingus land. The face value of the note was more than the value of the property which he gave up in this exchange, and it seems a little strange, if he was really willing, as he says he was, to risk the note, that he did not sell direct to Cornett the property which the latter actually acquired in the exchange. Of course, Cyphers in fact made a still better trade, for the Dingus property was worth more than his, but the point is that Cyphers was an active real estate dealer, he wanted to sell the Buchanan property, he could easily have sold it and the Oates Cyphers lot to Cornett for the note, and, if he thought the note was a fair risk, this sale would have been an unmistakable bargain. Why then, if he had no advance information or understanding about the Dingus sale and the subsequent exchange, did he pass this bargain?

Again, Cyphers was claiming to act as agent for Dingus, and, while there was nothing inherently wrong in making the exchange, it seems hardly consistent with that confidential relationship to withhold from Dingus the fact (known to Cyphers before the Dingus deed was delivered) that he, and not Cornett, was to get the 13 acres.

According to some of the witnesses, Cyphers had theretofore expressed himself as being afraid of the note, and had referred to Cornett on one occasion as a scoundrel, and on another as a slick duck. The witness, R. L. King, who happened to be present when Dingus delivered the deed, says that immediately after the delivery Cyphers said to Dingus:

"These notes are absolutely gilt edge. I would not be afraid to risk 100 cents to the dollar on them."

Dingus corroborates King by saying that Cyphers told him the notes were good, both before and at the time the deed was delivered. Cyphers denies all this, as well as practically everything else that was said by any witness tending to sustain the theory of fraud and misrepresentation on his part, but in making these denials he has at least in one particular gone further than reasonable credulity can follow. He unqualifiedly and emphatically states that he never discussed the solvency of the Cornett note at all with Dingus until some hours after the trade was made, when Dingus had become dissatisfied and asked him to indorse the note; that the only time the notes were even mentioned between them was when Dingus asked him to help make the trade, and said he expected to get from Cornett a $2,000 note. It is clear that Dingus knew almost nothing about Cornett, had never investigated the notes, and that all the negotiations with reference to this transaction had been confined to these three parties—Cornett, Dingus, and Cyphers. The latter was a neighbor of Dingus, was a trader, and man of affairs, and it is hard to believe that Dingus, in the several conversations which these two men had in respect to probable sales of Dingus' land to Cornett, would not have asked Cyphers something about the probable value of the paper to be given in exchange. If Cyphers had said that he told Dingus he thought the notes were good, the statement would be consistent and reasonable, but as much can hardly be said for the statement which he does make in that respect and repeats more than once in his deposition.

[1] It is of course true that the burden of proof is on Dingus. The presumption is in favor of innocence, and not of guilt, and one who charges fraud as a ground of relief must prove it by strong and clear and convincing evidence. This is especially true where, as here, the contract in question has been consummated by the delivery of a deed. These propositions are too well settled to require citation of authority in their support.

[2] The sole question in this case is whether Cyphers represented to Dingus that the notes were good, and thereby induced him to make the conveyance. Dingus says he did; Cyphers says he did not. If there were nothing else in the record, the case would be with Cyphers. It often happens, however, and it happens here, that the question of fraud depends as much upon circumstances as upon the statements of parties directly concerned. The mere fact that the oral testimony relating directly to the execution of a deed is equally balanced in point of the number of witnesses testifying for and against its fair execution does not necessarily mean that the attack must fail.

As was held in Hale v. Hale, 62 W. Va. 609, 59 S. E. 1056, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221, when, in a suit by the grantor in a deed to set it aside for fraud in the procurement thereof, the oral evidence of the parties relating directly to the execution thereof is flatly contradictory and wholly irreconcilable, the circumstances bearing on the issue must be allowed unusual prominence and effect, and their controlling force depends more upon their character and power to create mental impression than upon their number and variety.

In Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Hogue, 105 Va. 355, 360, 54 S. E. 8, 10, this court, in an opinion by Judge Cardwell, approved the following general statement of the law as to the burden and requisite degree of proof in support of an allegation of fraud:

"According to the overwhelming weight of authority, fraud need not, like the guilt of the accused in a criminal prosecution, be established beyond a reasonable doubt. A preponderance of evidence, as in any civil case, is sufficient, provided the proof is clear and strong enough to preponderate over the general and reasonable presumption that men are honest and do not ordinarily commit frauds, and reasonably to satisfy the understanding and conscience of the judge or jury. If it does this, it is sufficient both at law and in equity." 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 200, and cases cited.

[3, 4] In view of the facts and circumstances above outlined, and the rules of law applicable thereto, we are reasonably well satisfied that the decree complained of is right. To say the least of it, we are unable, after a thorough examination of all of the evidence, to find enough in it to justify us in holding that the lower court was wrong. We sit as a court of review, the decree comes to us with a presumption of correctness, and we ought not to reverse it if we are not fully satisfied that it is wrong. Reynolds v. Adams, 125 Va. 295, 312, 99 S. E. 695; Britton & Kennedy v. Terry, 130 Va. —, 107 S. E. 687.

The record shows that the property conveyed to Moore, trustee by Cyphers has been ordered sold in another suit to satisfy certain of Cornett's creditors. The debts owned by these creditors, however, were in existence when the deed was made, and were not created upon the faith of that property. Cyphers was not a party to the suit in which the aforesaid decree of sale was made. Both suits are pending in the same court, and it is reasonable to expect that the restitution undertaken to be made by the decree complained of here can be worked out in such a way as to restore the parties in large measure to the former status.

STALLARD v. SUTHERLAND et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

Infants §56—No relief from contract induced by fraudulent representations as to age.

Where an infant fraudulently represents that he is of full age, and has the appearance of full age, and the other party is thereby induced to execute a contract, the infant will be estopped in equity by his own fraud to avoid the contract on the ground of infancy to the prejudice of the other contracting party.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Suit by Walter Stallard, by next friend, against G. B. Sutherland and others. Decree dismissing the bill, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Vicars, of Wise, and J. M. Quillin, Jr., of Coeburn, for appellant.

Bond & Bruce, of Wise, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. Walter Stallard, claiming to be an infant, suing by his next friend, instituted his suit, alleging, in substance, that on the 24th day of August, 1914, while still an infant, he was induced to convey a tract of land in Wise county to M. M. Long, trustee, to secure a debt to one J. F. Ford; that no part of the debt was for necessities, and the most of said debt he did not owe, but that it was for goods bought by his brother, one E. T. Stallard, and that none of such goods or proceeds were then owned by or in the possession of the infant; that the trustee on the 26th day of June, by authority of the deed of trust, sold the property for $265, and conveyed it to G. B. Sutherland and J. F. Holbrook, two of appellees. The bill prayed for an annulment and vacation both of the deed of trust and of the conveyance made by the trustee to his vendees, and for general relief. Before the case was heard the infant became 21 years of age, and upon his petition was substituted as complainant.

The defendants answered the bill, denying that Walter Stallard was an infant at the time of executing the deed of trust, and alleging in addition that he had for a long time theretofore been engaged in business for himself in his own name, without the aid of either parent or guardian; that he was fully matured and developed mentally and entirely competent and able to transact business for himself; that he was more than 21 years of age at the time of the execution of the deed of trust; that he made oath to that effect before the notary who took his acknowledgment thereto; and that, relying upon these representations of the said Stallard, the creditor was induced to dismiss his action for the recovery of the debt, and to accept the joint note of the alleged infant and the debtor, secured by the deed of trust given as security therefor, and omitted any further effort or proceedings to collect or secure the said debt.

Depositions were taken, and upon the hearing the trial court entered a decree dismissing the bill, from which this appeal was taken.

The pertinent facts shown by the evidence are that the appellant was an infant at the time of the execution of the deed of trust, having been born February 5, 1895. He was therefore about 19½ years of age at the date of the deed of trust in August, 1914. His father and mother had moved from that community to Georgia, but he had returned, was working for himself as a laborer, collecting his wages, depositing his money in bank, writing his own checks, paying his own board bill, and that he appeared to be 21 years of age. The complainant in his testimony does not deny the allegation that he represented himself to be 21 years of age before and at the time he executed the deed, but contents himself with saying that he does not remember whether or not he did so. The evidence to the contrary is convincing, so that the determining question is whether or not under these circumstances, he can secure the aid of a court of equity in his effort to repudiate the deed of trust.

Much has been written upon this subject, and the authorities are not in accord upon the precise question which this record presents. In cases like this, it is proper to remember the oft-quoted language of Lord

Mansfield in Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1802, 1 W. Bl. 575:

"A third rule deducible from the nature of the privilege, which is given as a shield, and not as a sword, is that it never shall be turned into an offensive weapon to assist fraud and injustice."

Confining the discussion to the question at issue here—that is, whether an infant thus guilty of fraud and deceit is estopped in equity to reassert his title—the English cases all appear to hold that an infant is thereby estopped. The cases are collected in a note to Lowery v. Cate, 108 Tenn. 54, 64 S. W. 1068, 91 Am. St. Rep. 744, 57 L. R. A. 685. The American cases are not all consistent, but the weight of authority is in accord with the English rule.

Among the American cases are the following:

Hayes v. Parker, 41 N. J. Eq. 630, 7 Atl. 511, where an infant, by representing himself of age, secured a settlement with his guardian, and executed a discharge. He was not permitted to compel his guardian to account further. This is said there:

"At law * * * he [an infant] is incapable of fraudulent acts which will estop him from interposing the shield of infancy. * * * In equity, however, this rigid rule has its exceptions. Equity will regard the circumstances surrounding the transaction—the appearance of the minor, his intelligence, the character of his representations, the advantage he has gained by the fraudulent representations, and the disadvantage to which the person deceived has been put by them—in determining whether he should be permitted to invoke successfully the plea of infancy."

So in New York, where in Blakeslee v. Sincepaugh, 71 Hun, 412, 24 N. Y. Supp. 947, the implication in Spencer v. Carr, 45 N. Y. 406, 6 Am. Rep. 112, is followed. The infant having stated to the purchaser of the land, of which he was actually the owner, that he had no title to it, it was held that he was estopped to sue in ejectment, because he was "an infant of sufficient age to appreciate his rights and duties."

In Schmitheimer v. Elseman, 7 Bush (Ky.) 298, it is held that an infant who conveyed land, falsely representing himself to be of age, cannot have his deed set aside on the ground of infancy.

In Ferguson v. Bobo, 54 Miss. 121, an infant with knowledge of her rights conveyed her land to her father to enable him to borrow money, and her father later conveyed to a mortgagee. She was held estopped to set up her legal title.

In Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 437, 38 Am. Rep. 13, an infant remainderman was held estopped from repudiation of a sale of land by the life tenant; the infant having received his share of the compensation.

In Ontario, in Bennetto v. Holden, 21 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 222, it was held that, where an infant conveyed land representing herself to be of age, and after majority conveyed to others who had knowledge of the earlier grant, she was bound by her misrepresentations.

It appears that in Louisiana an infant is precluded as effectually as an adult, for in Guidry v. Davis, 6 La. Ann. 90, it is said:

"It is an error to suppose that the law can sanction the perpetration of frauds by minors; the truth and reality of bona fide transactions are as binding upon them as upon majors."

In Rundle v. Spencer, 67 Mich. 189, 34 N. W. 548, the court avoided putting the decision upon the ground for equitable estoppel, but awarded an injunction to stay proceedings in an action of ejectment brought by one who had sold the land in question while an infant, putting the decision on the equities of that particular case.

In Harmon v. Smith (C. C.) 38 Fed. 482, it is said that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply to minors "unless such conduct is intentional and fraudulent."

In the case of Commander v. Brazile, 88 Miss. 668, 41 South. 497, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1117, it is held that, where a minor who, by false representations that he is of age, aided by his mature appearance, induces another to enter into a contract with him under the belief that he is of full age, of which he accepts the benefit, he cannot set up his minority in defense of an action upon the contract.

A modern case in which there is quite a discussion of the whole question is International Land Co. v. Marshall, 22 Okl. 693, 98 Pac. 951, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1056, where it is held that equity will refuse to lend its aid in any manner to one seeking its active interposition who has been guilty of any unlawful or inequitable conduct in the matter with relation to which he seeks relief, and applies the doctrine to an infant who fraudulently represented himself to be over 21 years of age, when in fact he was only 19 years of age, and refused to cancel a deed in the absence of an offer to refund the amount of money so fraudulently obtained.

There are cases to the contrary, and this statement is deduced from the American cases in 14 R. O. L. 241, 242:

"But where the contract has been executed, and the infant seeks to avoid the title conferred thereby in order to maintain either an action or a defense, the decisions are more conflicting. According to the apparent weight of authority, his right of avoidance is not lost to him by estoppel based on his false assertions as to his age, but there are well-considered cases to the contrary. If the infant is obliged to bring an action in equity to obtain a cancellation of the deed in question, or like equitable relief, the distinctive rule of the equity courts that he who seeks equity must do equity has often been held to prevent his recovery; but even on this point the cases are not entirely uniform. Of course, to create the estoppel it must be proved that the infant in fact misrepresented his age, that the other party was deceived by the misrepresentations, and that he would not otherwise have made the contract."

The distinction seems to be that, in order to charge the infant with equitable estoppel, he must be guilty of something more than a mere failure to disclose his infancy at the time he enters into the contract. If, however, he fraudulently represents that he is of full age, or actively conceals his minority, and the other party is thereby induced to execute the contract, then it is held that the infant will be estopped in equity by his own fraud to avoid the contract, on the ground of infancy, to the prejudice of the other contracting party. It may be stated as a well-supported general proposition that, where one who, though an infant, has arrived at years of discretion, and by direct fraud or deception has entrapped another who was ignorant of the facts into waiving valuable property rights, such an infant will be estopped thereafter from relying upon his infancy to avoid such a contract. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 563, 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 703, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891; note Craig v. Van Bebber, 18 Am. St. Rep. 635; 22 Cyc. 512, 548.

The Virginia case of Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Grat. (56 Va.) 329, 76 Am. Dec. 209, is relied upon by the appellant. While there are expressions in that opinion which can be quoted in opposition to the doctrine which we have indicated as here applicable, in that case no element of fraud or falsehood was involved. There the purchaser of the interest of the infant knew that he had no legal right to convey, and accepted the title upon condition that he was to make the purchaser a good deed with general warranty thereafter upon the day when he should attain the age of 21 years, and the infant's repudiation of his contract was upheld. The instant case presents an entirely different question. Here the infant falsely represented himself to have attained his majority, his appearance confirmed it, and he was in fact holding himself out to the community by his conduct in attending to all his business transactions just as an adult would; and in the transaction in question the false statements of his brother and himself were made to induce the creditor to believe that he was of age and forego the collection of his debt by legal process.

It was in Watts v. Creswell, 9 Vin. Abr. 415, that Cowper, said:

"If an infant is old and cunning enough to contrive and carry on a fraud, in a court of equity he ought to make satisfaction for it." 4 Ann. Cas. 536.

In the states of Iowa, Kansas, Utah, and Washington, the doctrine to which we give our approval is enforced by statutes, each of which provides that an infant cannot disaffirm his contract "in cases where, on account of the minor's own misrepresentations as to his majority, or from his having engaged in business as an adult, the other party had good reason to believe him (the minor) capable of contracting."

Mr. Pomeroy appears to give his full adherence to this rule, saying:

"Since an infant is not directly bound by his ordinary contracts, unless ratified after he becomes of age, so obligations in the nature of contract will not be indirectly enforced against him by means of an estoppel created by his conduct while still a minor. On the other hand, an equitable estoppel arising from his conduct may be interposed, with the same effect as though he were adult, to prevent him from affirmatively asserting a right of property or of contract in contravention of his conduct upon which the other party has relied and been induced to act."

And he says this also:

"The incapacity of infants to enter into binding contracts is the same in equity as in law; but such contracts are generally voidable only, and may therefore be ratified after the infant attains his majority. Fraud, however, will prevent the disability of infancy from being made available in equity. If an infant procures an agreement to be made through false and fraudulent representations that he is of age, a court of equity will enforce his liability as though he were adult, and may cancel a conveyance or executed contract obtained by fraud." 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) §§ 815, 945.

In Rice v. Boyer, 108 Ind. 472, 9 N. E. 420, 58 Am. Rep. 61, it is held that under the Code of Civil Procedure of Indiana the distinction made in the English cases between suits in equity and actions at law is immaterial, and in an action for deceit against an infant applied the equitable rule, saying that the courts there would not inquire as to the form of the proceeding.

Without prolonging the discussion, it is sufficient to say that we prefer to follow, in this conflict in the American cases, that line which tends to discourage and prevent fraud, and which is in accord with equitable doctrines. This infant, who was managing his own business just like an adult, whose appearance indicated that he had attained his majority, who falsely misrepresented his age, who was intelligent enough to appreciate the fraudulent scheme and in conjunction with his brother to attempt its execution, should not be aided by a court of equity to consummate such fraud.

LOGWOOD et al. v. HOLLAND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921).

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨114—Purchaser of orchard held to have waived right to rescind for false representations.

A purchaser of an apple orchard wherein the number of trees had been misrepresented, who failed to offer to return the property and merely sought a rebate from the purchase price, held to have elected to retain the property and to have waived his right to rescind.

2. Logs and logging ⇨3(7) — Sale of growing trees is of an interest in land.

Growing trees are part of the realty, and a sale thereof is a sale of an interest in land.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨334(7)—Pecuniary recovery allowable in equity for mistake resulting in loss of any part of realty affecting purchase price.

While bills in equity seeking a purely pecuniary recovery on account of mutual mistake, or mistake of one party through fraud or culpable negligence of the other, have been confined to shortage of acreage, the principle in a proper case may be extended to mistakes resulting in loss of any part of the realty which affected the purchase price.

4. Principal and agent ⇨188—Agent properly joined with vendor in equity suit for shortage of trees in orchard purchased.

In a suit in equity brought against a vendor of an apple orchard and a land immigration bureau which was his agent to recover for a shortage in the number of trees, held, that the bureau was properly joined as defendant; it being charged as primarily responsible for the fraud.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨176—Rule as to compensation for deficiency in acreage stated.

In cases of deficiency in acreage, in the absence of special considerations, the compensation is to be fixed by multiplying the number of acres lost by the average price per acre, and if exceptional advantages exist, as buildings or springs, their relative value is to be fixed with reference to the contract price for the whole estate.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨174—Rule of compensation for shortage in number of trees in orchard sold, stated.

Where an apple orchard was purchased under representations that it contained 500 bearing trees, when there were in fact only 332, the value of the trees lost must be determined with reference to the price agreed upon for the whole estate.

7. Reference ⇨65—Exception to report properly overruled where no objection was made at hearing.

An exception to the report of a commissioner appointed to assess damages for a shortage of trees in an orchard purchased that the wrong measure of damages was used was properly overruled, where no objection to evidence on that ground was made until the commissioner had made his finding, and no rebuttal testimony was introduced.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bedford County.

Bill by W. B. Holland against J. O. Logwood, Jr., and others to rescind a contract for the sale of real estate or for damages. From a decree overruling defendants' demurrer, refusing a rescission, and directing a commissioner to ascertain damages, and a decree awarding a recovery, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

O. C. Rucker, of Bedford City, and Jas. D. Johnston and Jackson & Henson, all of Roanoke, for plaintiffs.

Nelson Sale, of Bedford City, for defendant.

KELLY, P. On January 1, 1916, John C. Logwood, Jr., through the agency of the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau, sold and conveyed to W. B. Holland an orchard property in Bedford county containing about 25 acres. The consideration for this sale and conveyance was $3,000 paid and to be paid as follows: $500 cash; $500 September 15, 1916; $1,000 January 1, 1917; and $1,000 January 1, 1918—the deferred payments being represented by Holland's negotiable notes and secured by deed of trust on the property. All of these notes were subsequently paid.

In August, 1917, Holland filed his bill in equity against Logwood and the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau, in which he alleged that he had been misled as to the number of apple trees on the land, and prayed that the court would either set aside the contract of sale and order a refund of the purchase price and the expenses incurred by him in connection therewith, or require the defendants to pay him the sum of $1,050, the alleged difference between the value of said property as represented to him and its value as shown by an actual count of the trees.

The defendants demurred to and answered the bill, proof was taken on both sides, and the court on April 8, 1918, entered a decree which (1) overruled the demurrer, (2) refused a rescission of the contract, and (3) held that the complainant was entitled to an abatement of the purchase price in an amount equal to the value of the trees which were represented to be, but turned out not to be upon the land, and directed one of the commissioners of the court to ascertain and report such value, the report to be based on the evidence already adduced in the cause, as well as any other evidence offered by the parties which the commissioner might deem necessary and pertinent.

The commissioner, after taking further proof, reported that the value of the short or missing trees was $1,000. The Virginia Land Immigration Bureau excepted to the report on several grounds, the one chiefly relied upon being that the commissioner had proceeded on the wrong theory as to the measure of damages; and the court on May 10, 1919 entered a decree reducing the sum fixed by the commissioner to $925, and awarding the complainant a recovery against both defendants for that amount, with interest from the date of the conveyance.

This appeal calls in question the correctness of the two decrees above recited, and the first assignment of error brings under review the action of the court in overruling the demurrers.

The allegations of the bill, which of course must be regarded as true upon the demurrers, make out a case which in narrative form may be stated as follows:

In the fall of 1915 Holland saw an advertisement of the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau which was as follows:

"Peaks of Otter Orchards.

$10,000. 25 Acres. No. 1047. Bedford Co., Va. 7 mi. Ry. Terms Satisfactory.

"Located on Peaks of Otter road, near Peaksville, R. F. D. route 1 mile of church, store and near mill; black Porter's loam soil with black subsoil, watered by branch and spring, hard wood timber land, considerable oak and chestnut; land lies gently rolling with a slope to the southeast, 16 acres cleared and in orchard, balance in second growth timber.

"Orchard consist of 16 acres, one of the finest old orchards in the state with 500 bearing trees, 35 years old, nearly all Albemarle pippins, probably 100 Cannon Pearmains; in addition there are 200 Albemarle pippins 2 years old; plenty of pears, cherries, plums, grapes, all bearing and of the best variety.

"Improvements consist of a double dwelling of five rooms and apple house with cellar, barn, and implement house. Improvements are not in the best condition. Fences sufficient for the place and satisfactory for the turning of sheep.

"The most magnificent mountain stream passes through the property. This property is one of the most desirable in the state and the most productive. It has produced $3,000 worth of apples in one year. It is located right near the Peaks of Otter and between two peaks. The scenery is splendid, and there can be no more attractive or desirable orchard location. and the orchard itself has been pruned, sprayed and kept in good order, always having been scientifically handled. The prospects are sufficient to believe that 1912 stock will give returns to pay half the price of the place."

Holland, who had been contemplating buying an orchard for some time, was attracted by the terms of the foregoing advertisement and decided to look into it. He was a city man residing in New York, had no practical experience or knowledge in respect to orchards and like property, and relied entirely upon what was stated in the advertisement and upon what he was subsequently told with reference to the property.

(198 S.E.)

On November 17, 1915, Holland visited the office of the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau in Roanoke, Va., discussed the property with that concern, was informed that it might be bought for as little as $3,000, and then came to Bedford county with one Mr. Kinsey, a representative of the Bureau, to visit the orchard. There he met Logwood, the owner, with whom he discussed the property, but who made no direct or important statements or representations to him. Holland remained at the orchard on that occasion for about half an hour looking over it in a somewhat casual manner, but made no attempt to count the trees.

After making this inspection Holland returned to his home in New York, and on December 11, 1915, by appointment and in company with Dr. W. J. Quick, general manager, and George D. Wingfield, local agent of the Bureau, he made a second visit to the property. At that time Dr. Quick stated to Holland that he was a practical scientific orchardist; that the orchard was a very fine one; that in one year $3,000 worth of apples were sold from it; that he counted the trees with one Mr. Cummins, who had bought the orchard about three years prior thereto, and that there were then about 495 old bearing trees; that possibly a few had died or been blown down since that time, and that he believed that it would be safe to say that there were at the time they were talking not over 490 or 495 trees, but that 200 young trees had been planted. On the next day Holland visited the orchard again, but the weather was very cold and disagreeable, the ground was covered with snow, and Holland did not attempt to make any count of the trees, and did not consider a count necessary because of the above-recited representations made to him by Dr. Quick. He returned to New York, and on December 17, 1915, wired Dr. Quick that he would take the property at the price and on the terms mentioned in the conveyance of January 1, 1916, hereinbefore set out.

Holland did not visit the orchard after his purchase until June, 1916, and did not make a very full inspection at that time because of weather conditions; but he had placed a man named Clark on the property to care for it, and was informed by him some time in July, 1916, that there were only 320 bearing trees on the place. It does not appear that he made any complaint about this fact until September, 1916, when he saw Dr. Quick and "mentioned this shortage to him and asked if he did not think he [Holland] should have a rebate, to which Quick replied: 'You certainly should have if the count is short as you say, but I cannot believe that they can be that short.'"

During the next two or three months Holland mentioned to Dr. Quick on several occasions the shortage in the trees in an effort to get some settlement on that account, and

Dr. Quick led him to believe "that something could be done in the matter, but that it would have to be passed on by the board of directors of the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau," and Holland was "put off in that way from time to time"; and "this proposition for a settlement or rebate on account of this shortage continued on through the fall of 1916, until January 2, 1917." In the meantime the purchase-money note for $500 due in September, 1916, was paid by Holland "under the impression and belief that the shortage in trees would be made good to him."

On January 2, 1917, Holland and the said George D. Wingfield, at the former's request for an accurate count of the trees, made such a count and found that there were only 332 old bearing trees, and this fact was reported to Dr. Quick, who stated that the matter would be taken up with the board of directors the next day. After that meeting Quick wrote Holland that "the board of directors declined to make any settlement."

It is further alleged that when the purchase-money note due January 1, 1917, became due, and in order to avoid a sale of the property under the deed of trust, it became necessary to pay not only that note, but all of the remaining purchase money, whether at that time due or not.

The bill further alleges that, by reason of the false advertisement, representations, and inducements on the part of the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau, Holland was grossly and fraudulently deceived concerning the property and the number of trees thereon, and thus persuaded to give much more for the property than he would otherwise have given and much more than its true value, and was thereby defrauded and cheated out of $1,050.

The prayer of the bill, after naming the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau and John C. Logwood, Jr., as defendants, and calling upon them to answer, but waiving answer under oath, was as follows:

"May the said contract of sale as above set forth as having been induced by false and fraudulent representations be set aside, declared null and void, and your complainant be refunded the sum of $1,000 expended by him in and about said purchase, and your complainant's purchase money of $3,000 be returned to him, or, if said sale is confirmed, may the defendants be required to pay to your complainant the sum of $1,050, the difference between the value of said property as shown and estimated by said advertisement and the true value of said property by an actual count of the trees upon the same; may all proper accounts be ordered and taken, and all such other and general relief be granted to your plaintiff as to equity seems fit and good conscience may require."

The chief ground relied upon in support of the demurrer is that the bill shows on its face that it was not good as a bill for rescission, and asserts a purely legal demand for damages cognizable only in a court of law.

[1] We think it reasonably clear that the bill does not state a proper case for rescission. It alleges that after the complainant was appraised in July, 1916, by his own representative and caretaker, Clark, as to the shortage in the number of old trees, he neither at that time nor at any other time before the bringing of this suit offered to return the property, or even intimated any desire to do so. Upon the contrary, he made no request or suggestion, so far as the bill indicates, for any settlement or redress except a rebate on the purchase price. Under these circumstances he must be regarded as having elected to retain the property, and to have thereby waived his right to have a rescission of the contract. Hurt v. Miller, 95 Va. 32, 41, 27 S. E. 831.

[2, 3] But it does not follow from this conclusion that the demurrer was improperly overruled. The bill states facts entitling the complainant to relief in another view of the case. It is well settled in this state that growing trees are a part of the realty, and that a sale thereof is a sale of an interest in land. Stuart v. Pennis, 91 Va. 688, 690, 22 S. E. 509. It is probably true, as contended by counsel for appellants, that bills in equity seeking a purely pecuniary recovery on account of mutual mistake (or mistake of one party caused by fraud or culpable negligence of the other) have heretofore in this state been confined to cases involving a shortage of acreage, or loss of part of the acreage contracted for by title paramount. Some of the cases, however, have expressly recognized the propriety of considering improvements or other items of special value in fixing the abatement, and we are unable to see any reason why this principle, so sound and just in itself, and so well established as to shortage of acreage, should not be extended in a proper case to mistakes resulting in loss of any part of the realty which affected the purchase price. The underlying reason for allowing an abatement when there has been a loss of acreage is that the estimated amount influenced the price. Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. (40 Va.) 304; Watson v. Hoy, 28 Grat. (69 Va.) 698, 705. The allegations in the bill show that the sale in this case was made upon an understanding that there were a certain number of trees on the land, and, independent of the prima facie presumption that in the sale of an orchard the number of trees influences the price, the bill further affirmatively shows that this was in fact true, and to a very material degree.

If we were warranted in treating the mistake as to the number of trees as being controlled by the principles governing a mistake in acreage—and we cannot doubt that we are—then there can be no question as to the jurisdiction in equity to afford relief by an abatement of the purchase money, or, as in this case where all the money had been paid, by a money recovery for the deficiency. The equitable jurisdiction in such cases is perfectly well settled and is not questioned here. Blessing v. Beatty, supra; Boschen v. Jurgens, 92 Va. 756, 24 S. E. 390; Hull v. Watts, 95 Va. 10, 27 S. E. 829.

The ground of the jurisdiction as clearly stated in the cases cited is that of mistake, "whether the mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of one of them occasioned by the fraud or culpable negligence of the other." This ground plainly exists here. The Virginia Land Immigration Bureau by its advertisement, and by the subsequent representations of Dr. Quick, relied upon by the complainant, led the latter to believe that there were approximately 500 bearing trees on the land, the greater part of which the evidence clearly shows were understood by Holland to be Albemarle pippins, when as a matter of fact there were 168 trees less than that number, and only 126 Albemarle pippins. The bill charges that these representations were false and fraudulent. They were certainly false; whether designedly so or not is immaterial. If Dr. Quick did not know them to be false, there was a mutual mistake; if he knew, or ought to have known, that they were false, then there was a mistake on one side occasioned by fraud or culpable negligence on the other.

[4] It is insisted that in any event the bill should have been dismissed as to the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau because it was neither a party to the contract or the deed, but was simply an agent for the grantor. This position is not tenable. The bill shows that the agent was primarily responsible for the alleged fraud, and fraud on its part is distinctly charged. It was therefore clearly proper to join the Bureau as defendant. 31 Cyc. 1624. And we may add in this connection that when the proof was taken it appeared that the Virginia Land Immigration Bureau, while not the owner of the property, had a direct interest in it and was to receive all of the proceeds of the sale over and above $2,100.

The proof sustains the material allegations of the bill. We do not understand it to be seriously contended that upon the facts the complainant is not entitled to proper compensation for the loss of the trees both against the principal, Logwood, and his agent, and if there were any such contention we would have no difficulty in rejecting it. The only questions in this case are as to the form of procedure and the measure of relief.

We come now to the only other assignment of error requiring attention, and under this assignment it is claimed that, if the defendants were liable to the plaintiff, "the value of 168 trees without reference either to the purchase price paid for the property or the value of the property actually received by the plaintiff is not the true measure of the plaintiff's damages."

We have held that this case is controlled by the same principles as if part of the acreage instead of part of the trees had been short; and the measure of recovery must be fixed accordingly.

The evidence shows that the false representations affected the substance of the thing contracted for, and the purchaser therefore originally had two remedies—he could restore the property and have a rescission of the contract, or he could keep the property and have compensation for the loss. He has by his conduct elected to adopt the latter remedy. What, then, is to be the measure of his compensation?

[5] In cases of deficiency in acreage, unless there be special considerations requiring a departure from the rule, the compensation is to be fixed by multiplying the number of acres lost by the average price per acre. Blessing v. Beatty, supra; Watson v. Hoy, supra. If there be exceptional circumstances, such, for example as the existence of valuable buildings, springs, or bridges and fisheries, on the land involved, then the relative value of such things is to be fixed with reference to the contract price for the whole estate, and compensation therefor determined accordingly.

In Hoback v. Kilgore, 26 Grat. (67 Va.) 442, 21 Am. Rep. 317 (a suit for a specific performance), there was a shortage of acreage, but there were upon a portion of the land acquired by the vendee improvements consisting of a dwelling house, outhouses, a tanyard, and a gristmill, the value of which had evidently influenced the purchase price. This court, in an opinion by Judge Moncure, while recognizing the general rule as laid down in Blessing v. Beatty that in cases of mere deficiency in quantity compensation is to be awarded according to the acreage value of the land, held that the improvements above mentioned required a departure from the general rule, and said:

"In this case the just and true measure of compensation is according to the average value of the land without the improvements, considering both together to be worth the contract price of $1,400, estimating the quantity of the land, as the parties did, at 127½ acres."

In Watson v. Hoy, 28 Grat. (69 Va.) 698, 713 (a judicial sale in which the purchaser after confirmation was allowed an abatement of the purchase price for a deficiency of acreage), the court, in an opinion by Judge E. C. Burks, after calling attention to the fact that there were on the land actually acquired by the purchaser certain valuable buildings, bridge privileges, and fisheries, which must have entered largely into the agreed price for the entire estate, held that in fixing the amount of the abatement the relative value of these improvements should be deducted from the entire purchase price for the whole estate, and the sum remaining should be used in determining the average price per acre.

In Yost v. Mallicotte, 77 Va. 610 (a suit for an abatement of price on account of deficiency in the acreage), this court, in an opinion by Judge Lacy, applied the general rule of the average price per acre, and reversed the lower court, which had fixed the compensation for the deficiency by first ascertaining and deducting from the price of the whole the value of the improvements, the latter court having apparently followed Hoback v. Kilgore, supra, and Watson v. Hoy, supra. Upon the facts it is difficult to reconcile the court's refusal to give any consideration to the valuable improvements in Yost v. Mallicotte with the rule of decision as settled in the other two cases last above cited, but the rule itself was not in any way changed by the Yost Case, because that case expressly recognized the rule as laid down in the other two cases and disregarded the improvements because, as the opinion held, they were not of sufficient importance to constitute an exception to the rule.

In the case of Grayson v. Buchanan, 88 Va. 251, 13 S. E. 457, the vendor had represented the tract to contain 140 acres when it contained only 126 acres, and it also represented that half of a certain spring was situated on the tract, when as a matter of fact no part of the spring was so situated. The purchaser was sued for the purchase price, and the defendant offered an equitable plea seeking an abatement for the false representations as to the acreage and as to the spring. In an opinion by Judge Lewis this court held that as to the acreage the usual rule based upon the average price per acre applied and abated the price as to the acreage accordingly; but as to the loss of the spring the abatement was fixed by taking the total price of the property and determining how much less than the whole price the land would be worth by reason of the loss of the spring.

The rule as gathered from the foregoing cases seems to be that, when improvements or other features of peculiar value form a part of the realty sold, the value in fixing compensation for a deficiency in the substance of the thing sold is to be based upon the agreed price for the whole estate, and this rule seems to us to be entirely in accord with reason and justice.

[6] In the instant case it follows that the value of the trees lost must be determined with reference to the price agreed upon for the whole estate, and a substantial variation from this rule would constitute error. It is fairly deducible from the record, however, that there has been in fact no substantial departure from this rule.

[7] The decree of reference found as a matter of fact that the complainant (who was shown to have bought for a total price of

$3,000) made his calculation to buy and was induced to buy on the belief that there were 500 bearing trees (the greater part of which were represented as Albemarle pippins), when in fact only 332 bearing trees were on the land, and of these only 128 were Albemarle pippins. With these facts before the court it ordered the commissioner to report "the value of the 168 trees." The clear meaning of the court was that the commissioner was to determine the relative value of the trees which were short. More than this, the two witnesses whose evidence was relied upon chiefly in fixing the value made their examination of the property at the request of counsel for the complainant, who had informed them in writing that he had paid $3,000 for the land, that the orchard contained 25 acres, and that trees of certain varieties and in certain numbers had been represented as being on the land, and asked them to ascertain the proportionate loss. And it is manifest that these two witnesses, as well as practically all of the witnesses who testified upon this point, did so with the original cost price in view, and that upon the evidence as a whole the court could not reasonably have fixed the damages at less than $925 even if the rule contended for by counsel for the defendant had been specifically laid down in the decree and followed by the commissioner and the court. The evidence which was introduced on behalf of the complainant to establish the damage does not appear to have been objected to on the ground that the complainant was following the wrong measure of damage until after the commissioner had made his finding, and no evidence at all was introduced before the commissioner on the part of the defendant to rebut the evidence thus introduced by the complainant, or to fix the damage by any different rule. Under these circumstances the exception was properly overruled. See Jeffress v. Virginia Railway & Power Co., 127 Va. 694, 732, 104 S. E. 393, 405, and cases cited.

It is insisted that the commissioner's allowance of $1,000 for 168 trees means that, if the whole 500 trees had been lost, the damage would have been equal to the entire purchase price of the land, and the purchaser would have received the land and the young trees free. This contention is not sound. It must be remembered that the value of the land itself was very small. The property was valuable chiefly as an orchard, and the evidence clearly shows that the 168 trees must have been regarded as worth relatively more than the average value of all the trees contracted for. Neither the commissioner nor the court attempted to follow the exact figures or the precise method of calculation adopted by the witness. The commissioner reported that it was "impossible to figure the exact valuation of these trees, in view of the differences of opinions expressed by the witnesses," that after carefully considering all the evidence he was of opinion that the value of the 168 trees which were short could safely be placed at about $1,000, and that he accordingly reported that sum as the proper amount to allow complainant as damages for the loss sustained. The court, "having fully read and considered all the evidence upon which the report of the master commissioner was based, being of opinion from the evidence that the amount of damages to which the plaintiff is entitled, whether based upon the relative value of the shortage in the number of trees to the purchase price, or based upon the difference between the actual value of the land and trees upon the day of sale and the total amount paid by the plaintiff for said property, is $925," sustained the exceptions to the report to the amount of $15 and awarded a recovery against both defendants for the former sum.

There is no error in the decree to the prejudice of the appellants, and it must be affirmed.

BURKS, J., absent.

(121 Va. 570)

OLIVER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

Intoxicating liquors  $\S$  236 (6½, 7, 20)—Evidence held insufficient to support conviction of possessing, transporting, and offering for sale.

In the prosecution for illegally possessing, transporting, exposing for sale, and soliciting orders for ardent spirits in violation of the Prohibition Law, evidence held insufficient to support a conviction.

Error to Hastings Court of Richmond.

J. J. Oliver was convicted of violating the prohibition law, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Mapp & Mapp, of Keller, and L. O. Wendenburg, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. Oliver, the plaintiff in error, was convicted of violating the Prohibition Law (Acts 1918, c. 388) by having unlawful possession of, transporting, exposing for sale, and soliciting orders for ardent spirits, and sentenced to be confined in jail for 30 days and to pay a fine of $250.

There are a number of assignments of error, among them that the trial court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict for lack of evidence to support it. We are of opinion that this assignment of error is well taken. It will be unnecessary, therefore, to consider the other assignments.

Oliver and S. L. Chase were prohibition inspectors, and, amongst other things, were charged with the duty of destroying stills and apprehending persons engaged in violation of the prohibition law. On Saturday, October 18, 1919, after a successful week's work in counties near Richmond, they discovered a still in Amelia county on a tract of land of which Charles W. Venable was the tenant. Two men were found at the still, but they made their escape. Oliver and Chase, however, took possession of one five-gallon keg and three one-gallon jugs or bottles of whisky and of the still, loaded them into the Ford machine in which they were traveling, and carried them to the city of Richmond, to the office of the prohibition commissioner. Before leaving the farm they endeavored to find Venable, but he and his family were absent from home. A colored man, however, was there, who had been plowing for Venable that day, and Oliver left a note and also a verbal message for Venable, saying that they had found a still and a five-gallon keg of whisky and three one-gallon jugs of whisky, and advising him to go to the court house in Amelia county and surrender himself to the attorney for the commonwealth, or to come to the prohibition commissioner in the city of Richmond. This note appears to have been signed by Oliver in his own name and also that of Chase. Venable could not read, but had the note read to him by his wife, and testified that the verbal message was also delivered to him, describing, as aforesaid, what they had captured: i. e., the still and the kegs and jugs of whisky aforesaid. They started for Richmond late in the evening, and arrived at the office of the prohibition commissioner about 10:30 p. m. They unloaded the still and put it in the office of the prohibition commissioner, and also a bag of apples which they had purchased. Just at this time, and before the whisky had been unloaded, "Nubby Arnold" appeared on the scene and stated to them that he knew where 3 or 4 cases of bottled in bond whisky was, just brought in that day, and that he could take them to it. Arnold had shortly before that (about two or three weeks) given them information as to the location of a lot of bottled in bond whisky, and as a result of this information they had taken 41 quarts of whisky and captured the man who had it in charge. There was no place at the prohibition office where the whisky could be left with safety, and after a brief conference between Oliver and Chase they determined to take Arnold with them in the machine along with the whisky, and go after that which Arnold had spoken to them about. Arnold got in the car with them and directed the route to be taken, until they were far out on the outskirts of the city, when he asked them to stop and wait a minute, and with that he got out of the car and went diagonally across the street to the house, which turned out to be that of a colored man, William Stewart, whose house had been several times searched for whisky. Down to this point there is absolutely no controversy about the facts. What thereafter transpired is in many respects in great doubt and uncertainty. The chief witness for the commonwealth was Policeman Chinault, of the city of Richmond, who was not only flatly contradicted by other witnesses on the most material points of his testimony, but also, time and again, made statements on trial in conflict with his testimony before the police court on the preliminary examination of the case, which testimony had been taken down by a stenographer, and was admitted by the attorney for the commonwealth to be correct. Notwithstanding these contradictions, it was the province of the jury to hear and consider all of the testimony, and settle the disputed questions of fact. According to the testimony of Chinault, which seemed to have been accepted by the jury, he and Policeman Porter were in that section of the city, and heard the engine of an automobile running, and rode up to where it was, and found Oliver sitting at the wheel, and inquired of him why his rear light was not burning. Oliver made some excuse for his delinquency and got out of his machine to light his rear light. In doing so, he exposed a pistol in his hip pocket, which Policeman Porter reached down and pulled out, and asked what he was doing with it, and he replied that they were prohibition officers, and exhibited his badge. The pistol was then given back to him. The automobile had no side curtains, and the keg and three jugs were sitting in the space between the two seats open to observation. Chinault asked Oliver what was in the car, and Oliver replied there was not anything in the car. At that time, however, Chinault had seen what was in the car. About that time Chinault saw William Stewart walking along the street not far from the automobile, and stopped him and asked him what was coming off, and Stewart replied, "Not anything." Chinault said to him then, "Come clean, don't give me that stuff," and Stewart replied:

"Well, the man Arnold that just went up the hill is the man that was at my house and tried to sell me some whisky at $20 a gallon and I refused to buy it, and he dropped to $17 a gallon."

Just before this Arnold had come out to the machine where Chase and Oliver were, and Chinault had inquired of Oliver if Arnold was with him, and Oliver replied, "No." And Arnold was told to go on, which he did. Arnold also, in reply to a question from Chinault, had stated that he was not with them. After Arnold left, Chinault put the defendant under arrest, and walked over to where the car was, and Oliver told him that there were eight gallons of whisky in the car, and also gave him an account of the capture of the whisky that day. There is much other testimony relating to what took place at the time of the arrest and subsequently, but it is not deemed necessary to set it out here. William Stewart was also examined as a witness for the commonwealth, and states that Arnold came to his house and offered to sell him eight gallons of whisky, but nowhere in the testimony for the commonwealth does it appear that Oliver or Chase ever offered to sell any of the whisky to any person, or authorized any other person to make such sale. Arnold undoubtedly did go with them, and if the evidence of the commonwealth is to be accepted as true that they denied that fact, then they simply lied as to that question. But this is far from establishing the fact that Oliver offered whisky for sale, or authorized Arnold to offer it for sale. They were dealing with a suspected party, and used their own devices to entrap him, and if Arnold lied in this conversation, that is no ground for convicting Oliver of offering the whisky for sale.

Evidence was also introduced by the commonwealth to show that in September, 1919, the accused offered to sell F. D. Kelly one or two cases of whisky in pint bottles, and that in the latter part of September he offered to sell George W. Smith some whisky known as "Four Roses."

It should be said in respect to the offers to sell to Kelly and Smith that it appeared in the evidence that on neither occasion did Oliver have any whisky with him to sell, and that the offer was merely an effort to entrap these parties.

Oliver and Chase had the undoubted right to take the whisky along with them for safe-keeping while they were in search for the additional whisky which Arnold said he could find, and it seems incredible that they should attempt to sell that whisky after having left both verbal and written evidence of what they had captured on the afternoon of that day.

The Attorney General, after making a statement of the evidence offered on behalf of Oliver, concludes this branch of his argument as follows:

"This is a fair summary of the evidence in this case. We are frank to say that the fact that, before coming to Richmond, the accused left written evidence of his possession of the whisky, and the fact that the prohibition commissioner investigated the matter after the arrest of the accused, yet kept the inspectors in his employ, all of which is undisputed, raises some question as to whether there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict that the accused was offering for sale ardent spirits. However, the jury passed upon this, and we do not feel that we can say that the verdict was without evidence to support it."

It seems fairly plain that the only reason that the Attorney General did not confess error was because the jury had found the prisoner guilty on the evidence, and he did not think that under these circumstances he should confess error founded entirely on the testimony.

The evidence on behalf of the commonwealth may be consistent with the guilt of the accused, but it is very far from being inconsistent with his innocence.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the evidence was not sufficient to support the finding of the jury, and for this reason the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the Hustings court will be set aside, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial, if the attorney for the commonwealth shall be of opinion that he can make a better case on another trial than at the former hearing.

MATNEY et al. v. YATES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Trusts  $\S$ 372(3)—Evidence held to show release from trust of agent taking title in himself.

Where complainants, desiring to acquire the interest of certain heirs in a tract of land, procured respondent to act as agent, but, the heirs demanding more money than he was authorized to pay, respondent took title in himself, risking a repudiation of his agency by complainants, in a suit wherein complainants sought to hold respondent as trustee, evidence held to sustain a finding that complainants, by refusing to pay respondent a reasonable remuneration as agreed, thereby released him from his trust.

2. Equity  $\S$ 427(1)—Dismissal without disposition of affirmative defense not supported by evidence not error.

Where respondent in a suit involving title to land set up an elder title in himself, it was not error, on dismissal of complainants' suit, to fail to take action respecting such title, where there was no evidence of its existence.

3. Evidence  $\S$ 343(7)—Copy of county clerk's record of land patent held inadmissible.

Code 1904,  $\S$  2367, referring to the recordation of new grants only, held not to authorize the recordation of an original land patent from the commonwealth in the office of the county clerk, so as to make a certified copy of such record admissible in evidence under section 3334, in lieu of the original.

4. Equity  $\S$ 418—Refusal to take bill as confessed for want of answer held not error.

Where a third amended bill was filed without leave and no process issued thereon, and the cause was brought to trial subject to objection to the bill, which objection was not passed on, and the substance of the bill was covered by the answer to the previous bills, it was not error not to take such bill as confessed for want of an answer.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County.

Suit by John H. Matney and another against Richard Yates. From a decree of dismissal, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

This is the sequel to Matney v. Yates, 121 Va. 508, 93 S. E. 694. The case as made by the pleadings as they then stood was dealt with on that appeal. The facts of the case as they were taken to be admitted on demurrer and the questions thus put in issue and decided on that appeal fully appear from the report of the case just cited and need not be repeated here.

When the case went back to the court below the appellee, Richard Yates, by leave of court by order entered November 20, 1917, filed his answer to all of the bills then in the cause, to wit, the original and first and second amended bills.

This answer is a long one, and its positions need not be set forth in detail. It is sufficient to say that it put in issue all three claims of appellants made in their bills at that time filed in the cause, which were, in substance, that appellants were the complete owners of the 241-acre tract involved in the cause: First, by title by adverse possession; secondly, by reason of the lost or destroyed deed mentioned in the report of the case on the former appeal and the acquisition by appellants of the Walter Matney title to said land, as also set forth in such report of the case; and, thirdly, by reason of the alleged agency of appellee and the resulting trust as growing out of such agency because of which it is alleged in said bills that the appellants were entitled to have a decree compelling the appellee to convey to them the interests of the Richard Yates, Sr., heirs at law in said land which were extant if the appellants failed both in proof of adverse possession and in furnishing sufficient proof to set up said lost or destroyed deed. And thereupon the answer went further and attempted to set up a superior title to that of appellants to the said 241-acre tract of land derived under an alleged grant from the commonwealth of a larger body of land which included all but about 10 or 15 acres of such 241-acre tract, such grant bearing date December 1, 1858, and having been made to one E. F. Harman and one Peter L. Surdam, which superior title, the appellee claims in said answer, was acquired by him by deed dated February 25, 1914, from Henry C. Stuart and wife and Harman Newbery, who, as the answer alleged, were the then owners of such title through mesne conveyances and descent from one party to another, all as set out in such answer in detail. This alleged title will be hereinafter referred to as "the Stuart title."

Thereafter, on July 18, 1919, the appellants filed their third amended bill in the clerk's office, without any leave of court first obtained and without any process having issued thereon, but it appears from an order of court entered in the cause on August 5, 1919, that the cause then came on to be again heard "on the proceedings heretofore had herein and papers heretofore filed herein and on the third amended bill filed by the complainants in the clerk's office of this court on July 18, 1919, by agreement of the parties hereto, but counsel for defendant reserved the right to move to strike out the last amended bill. * * *

The third amended bill was substantially the same in its allegations as those contained in the original and first amended bill in so far as they concern the matters in controversy between the parties at the time the pleadings were filed which were involved in the former appeal; the only difference in the former pleadings and the third amended bill as to these matters being this: Whereas the second amended bill admitted that "all of the parties who were connected with and who knew anything about" the execution of the alleged partition deed by Richard Yates, Sr., conveying all of his interest in the 241-acre tract of land involved in the cause to Walter Matney (being the alleged lost or destroyed deed aforesaid) "are dead, and your orators are unable to prove that this deed was made," the third amended bill did not contain this admission, but returned, in substance, to the allegations of the original and first amended bills on this subject and claimed under and sought to set up such deed as a deed which had been executed and delivered about the year 1875 and subsequently recorded and destroyed by the fire which destroyed the records of Buchanan county in the year 1885, as well as the positions that the appellants had acquired title to the land by adverse possession, and that the appellee, Richard Yates, the grandson of Richard Yates, Sr., was the agent of appellants when he obtained the conveyance to himself in 1913 of the interests of the Richard Yates, Sr., heirs at law, and must be held to occupy the position of a trustee for appellants as to such interests, and hence was compellable to convey the same to appellants, all as substantially set forth in the original and first amended bills and as appears from the report of the case aforesaid on the former appeal.

The appellants introduced in evidence the depositions of a number of witnesses upon the subjects of the claims of appellants aforesaid of title to the 241-acre tract of land by adverse possession, by reason of the lost or destroyed deed aforesaid, and concerning the existence of the alleged agency of appellee,

Richard Yates, aforesaid, etc., and the appellee introduced his own deposition which had reference especially to his claim of the non-existence of the aforesaid alleged agency on his part, and the acquisition of the Stuart title aforesaid, and the deposition of one other witness in his behalf.

Upon consideration of the whole case the court below on October 21, 1919, entered the decree under review on the present appeal, which provides as follows:

"* * * Being of opinion that the complainants (the appellants) have failed in their proof, which therefore renders it immaterial as to whether or not the court shall sustain or reject the last amended bill on account of repugnance or inconsistent allegations, it is now adjudged, ordered, and decreed that this cause be, and the same is, dismissed at the cost of complainants."

Of the evidence in this case in reference to the claim of appellants of title by adverse possession aforesaid, it is sufficient to say that it wholly fails to show the acquisition of title by such possession, even of any part of the 241-acre tract; and this is expressly admitted in the petition of appellants for the present appeal.

The petition for the present appeal calls attention to the fact that the third amended bill "alleges and seeks to set up the partition deed between Walter Matney and Richard Yates, Sr.," and contains statements of abstracts of what it is claimed that four old witnesses for appellants and J. H. Stinson, one of appellants, testify in the case on the subject of such deed; but we do not find that the petition takes the position that such evidence is sufficient to establish the execution and delivery of such a deed. Such being the attitude of the petition for appeal, it is deemed sufficient to say that it appears from the testimony of the witnesses just referred to that the statement contained in the second amended bill on this subject is correct, namely, that "all the parties who were connected with and knew anything about the transaction are dead, and" appellants were "unable to prove that this deed was in fact made," if it was made.

On the subject of the alleged agency aforesaid, there is some conflict in the testimony, but very little, if any, on material points.

The testimony for appellants is to the effect that the appellant John H. Matney had seen some of the Richard Yates, Sr., heirs, before the appellee, Richard Yates, Jr., was approached on the subject of acting as agent for appellants in getting such heirs to execute a release deed or conveyance of their possible interests in the 241-acre tract of land, and John H. Matney testifies that he found "that it was all right and agreeable and they would sign up theirs," and it was then that he (Matney) "got Richard Yates," she appellee, "and he said he could see them all and they would sign the deed for him. * * * I got him to go ahead and take the deed for me."

The following from the deposition of the appellant John H. Matney will show the positions taken by him on this subject:

"Q. I will ask you to detail the conversation or conversations you had with Richard Yates, the defendant in this suit, relative to obtaining a release deed from the heirs of old man Richard Yates.

"A. Well, one morning I was here in town, and I met Richard here on the street, and he asked me had I seen any of the heirs, and I told him I had seen some of them, there were three of the heirs that I had seen, and I had a talk with them and it was all right. Richard told me that they were to sign it up, as well as I remember, and we were discussing the matter, and I knew that he was one of the heirs in it, and he said he would sign over his interest in it, and I forgot now just which one mentioned it first, but Richard told me that he could get all of them to sign up the release deed without any trouble. I had to go away in a couple of days, and I didn't have time to see all of the heirs, and I told Richard that would be all right if he could do that. I had to go to Pond Creek to work for Riley Lester. He would see all of the heirs, and that probably all of them would meet him at Stone Coal, and that they would sign a release deed for him. I told him I would pay him for the trouble, and asked him what he would charge me, and he said he wouldn't charge me anything much, and I asked him if $10 would pay him for his trouble, and, as well as I remember, he said $10 would be liberal payment, and I told him I would pay him if he would see all of the heirs and get them to sign the deed.

"Q. Did you have prepared a release deed and turn it over to Richard Yates?

"A. I told him that Mr. Stinson would prepare the deed when he got ready to get out and get them to sign it. I went and we went up to Mr. Stinson's office.

"Q. You say we went up to Mr. Stinson's office; do you mean that Richard Yates went with you?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, I will ask you to detail as nearly as you can the conversation with Richard Yates after you went to Mr. Stinson's office?

"A. Well, after we went up there I told Mr. Stinson that Richard said that he could get the heirs to sign a release deed for us without any trouble, and explain it to them, how he was one of the distant heirs, and didn't have anything in it much, if anything at all, and that as I had to go away that he would get out and get the heirs to sign up the deed, and he had promised to do it.

"Q. Was Mr. Stinson present during this conversation?

"A. Yes, sir; he was present.

"Q. Did he prepare the deed then?

"A. No; as well as I remember, he didn't prepare the deed then.

"Q. What arrangement was made about the preparation of this deed, if anything?

"A. Well, Mr. Stinson told Richard he would prepare the deed when he, Richard, got ready for to have them sign it up, and prepare the deed and send it to him.

"Q. Do you know whether or not Mr. Stinson prepared this deed?

"A. He didn't prepare that deed right that day, that I know of, but he prepared it later on.

"Q. Did Richard Yates secure the heirs of Richard Yates, Sr., to sign this release deed?

"A. The one that Mr. Stinson prepared him a deed and sent it to him, and he sent it back, said that he had left out one of the heirs, and he went ahead then and had a deed prepared himself and got the heirs to sign it.

"Q. What did Richard Yates do with this deed?

"A. As well as I remember, I believe he sent it back to Mr. Stinson.

"Q. And was the deed that he secured from the heirs of old man Yates to himself?

"A. He had it made to him, and told the heirs that he would make it over to us when we would pay him for doing the work.

"Q. Did he make the deed over to Mr. Stinson and yourself?

"A. No; he did not make it over to us.

"Q. Did you ever talk to Richard Yates about this release deed that Yates secured from the heirs?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did he say about it?

"A. While I was gone I had heard that Richard had took the deed up in his own name, and that he was going to make it over to us when we paid it over for doing the work. At that time I didn't have the money right at present, and was aiming to raise the money and pay him when I got back. I didn't know exactly when he would get all the heirs to sign the deed, and when I come back he had the deed made in his name and put on record.

"Q. Did you talk to Richard Yates afterwards about the matter?

"A. Yes, sir; he said he wouldn't make the deed over to us for the amount agreed upon, $10.

"Q. What reason did he give, if any, for refusing to make the deed over?

"A. He said that after he got to looking into the matter of the land that he found that the Yates heirs had a better title than he thought they had, and I believe he said it would cost him a little more to buy them out than he had thought, and he couldn't sign the deed over to us to what he had paid the heirs for $10, but he said he would make the deed over to us for $400, and he would assign the deed over to us if we would pay him $400.

"Q. Did he say how much it had cost him to secure the release deed?

"A. About $10 to the heirs, as well as I remember.

"Q. Were you ready to pay Mr. Yates the $10 and the amount that he had paid the heirs for the release deeds?

"A. Yes, sir; when I came back to see him later on I was ready to fix up the matter and pay him for it.

"Q. Did Mr. Yates ever present the deed to you with a bill?

"A. No, sir; he never presented me a deed or bill. He told me that he wouldn't make it over, and I told him that I felt the Matneys had owned the land long enough and had been in possession of it, as we had always had in it quiet possession, and everybody, as well as myself, regarded the land as belonging to the Matneys heirs.

"Q. And what did Richard Yates say, if anything?

"A. I told him that we could win the land and hold it by law, and I said, as it was our land, we had been paying the taxes on it, and nobody had ever been disputing our right to this land, and also regarded it as our land.

"Q. Well, now, what did Richard Yates say?

"A. Richard told me that we didn't have any deeds for it, had been burnt up, and there wasn't anything to prove that old man Walter Matney and Richard Yates had swapped land or traded their lands. This was the conversation between us, as well as I remember. He told me if I would pay him $400 he would make the deed over to us."

Cross-examination:

"* * * A. Well, he wouldn't agree to take what we offered to do the work for us. I was aiming to pay him when we got the money.

"Q. You didn't give him a penny with which to buy the interest of these heirs, did you?

"A. No; not at that time. I was getting ready to furnish him the money. I didn't know how much it would take me.

"Q. Well, you went to Pond Creek about that time?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you write him a letter back and tell him that you had changed your mind about the matter?

"A. Well, I believe that he wrote to me; that I received a letter from Richard, stating that it would take more than we had figured on buying some of them out, and I didn't have quite enough money at that time, and I believe that I wrote him to delay the matter, or stop until I came up; at least that is what I meant, that to wait until I came and seen him.

"Q. But you wrote and told him not to take the matter up at that time, didn't you?

"A. Well, I think I did write to him. Of course, I meant to wait until I came and advanced him the money and get me to back it up.

"Q. I am not asking you what you meant, I am asking you what you wrote Richard Yates, and it is true, when he wrote you and told you that it would take more money to buy the interest of these heirs than you had figured or anticipated, you wrote and told him to let the matter alone, and not to take it up at that time, didn't you?

"A. Yes; right at that time. I thought he was going ahead, and I wanted to come up and make arrangements with him.

"Q. Now, I didn't ask you what you thought; I am asking you what you wrote Richard Yates. You wrote him just what I have stated to you above in these questions, didn't you?

"A. Yes; I remember writing him that. Of course, when I wrote him I didn't mean for him to lay the matter down.

"Q. Do you mean to say that you would write a man and tell him not to do a thing, and you would then expect him, in the face of that writing, to go on contrary to your instructions and do the thing? Is that what you mean?

"A. No, sir; of course, when I wrote him I didn't have the money right then, and couldn't get off, and decided I would get him to delay it until I came up, and I didn't know how much it would take and everything.

"Q. But you didn't mean you intended to do nothing after you wrote him to stop and let the matter alone, did you?"

"A. Well, I am not sure; I guess I wrote him that; I remember that I was trying to get ready in a few weeks to come up, and I wanted him to wait.

"Q. Did you write him your construction and what you meant and had in your mind that you wanted him to do, which was contrary to the writing which you were sending him?"

"A. I know I wrote him two or three letters; I am not sure how many letters I wrote him.

"Q. You intended him to obey your writing, didn't you?"

"A. Yes; what I meant, for him to stop right then for a while that I was in a hurry to do the work.

"Q. He did stop, and didn't undertake any further to get the deeds for you, did he, after you wrote him that?"

"A. I thought he would wait until I got back to proceed with his work.

"Q. You didn't write him and tell him to stop and then expect him to go on, did you?"

"A. I didn't expect for him to go on until I come back.

"Q. He did write you that it would take more money than you expected to put up to buy the interest, didn't he?"

"A. As well as I remember, he wrote me that.

"Q. And it was in response to that letter that you wrote and told him to not go further with the matter?"

"A. Yes, sir; right then.

"Q. And then when you saw Richard Yates next he had bought this to you, hadn't he, and had taken his deed for it?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And when you talked to him he told you that upon receiving your letter he turn the deed back to Mr. Stinson, which Mr. Stinson had given him at your instance to get the Yateses to sign?"

"A. No, sir; I don't remember of him telling me that.

"Q. You found out that was true, didn't you?"

"A. Well, I found out that he returned the deed back to Mr. Stinson, because one of the heirs was left out that was why he turned it back. * * *

"Q. I am not asking you how you felt about the matter, but I am asking you what you done. When Richard Yates next saw you, after he had taken the deed in his own name, and after you had wrote him to stop, he told you that he had had the title looked into, and found that it was different to what you thought it was, didn't he?"

"A. After he got the deed in his own name, he told me that.

"Q. He told you that he found that your grandfather had willed the Watkins Branch land to his daughters, didn't he?"

"A. Well, we had so much conversation about it, I am not sure about it.

"Q. He also told you that a number of the heirs of Richard Yates contended that their father never did dispose of his interest in the Bear Tree Hollow land, didn't he?"

"A. Yes; I remember him saying that, but if they had the deed were burned up.

"Q. Anyway, he told you that different ones of these heirs which he had seen had contended that their father had not sold his interest in the Bear Tree land, but that he owned it at his death, and that it would take more money to buy their interest than to make a mere release deed to him, didn't he?"

"A. Well, I remember him saying that he couldn't turn us and get the deed for what he had to pay the other heirs. The Yates heirs that he had talked to wouldn't sign it for the money that we agreed for.

"Q. Didn't he write you in that letter to Pond Creek and tell you in that letter that the heirs of Richard Yates, Sr., had informed him that their father had not disposed of his interest in that land, and for that reason that they would have to have more money if they sold their interest than you had agreed?"

"A. Well, I believe he did write me as to one or two of the heirs might have to have more money."

The following from J. H. Stinson's, the other appellant's, deposition, will show the positions taken by him on the same subject:

"Q. What did you do with reference to securing a release deed from the heirs of Richard Yates, Sr., if anything?"

"A. I had a talk with John Matney about it; we talked two or three times about it, I expect; and one day John Matney come into my office, and said he had been talking to Richard Yates, and that Richard Yates had agreed to get parties to sign the deed, and said he was in town, and I told him to go out and bring him in my office, and he went out, and he and Mr. Yates come into the office.

"Q. What was said, if anything, by Richard Yates, relative to obtaining the release deed?"

"A. I explained to Mr. Yates what Mr. Matney had said, that he was willing to get this release deed for us, and that I had a conversation with John Matney, and had agreed to get the deed, if we wanted him to, and I asked him what he thought about it, and he said that he felt like he wouldn't have any trouble to do it, and John Matney spoke up at the time, and said that Richard was related to the parties, he would probably do the work better than we could, and he said also that he believed that he could do it better than we could, and said that he was willing to do it, and that he thought they would sign the deed without any trouble.

"Q. What arrangements, if any, did you make with Richard Yates relative to obtaining this release deed?"

"A. He agreed to go and get the parties to sign it, and, as I understood it, he and Mr. Matney had agreed on $10 for his services, and I told him that I was willing to pay him any amount and pay him any additional expenses that he was out and any amount that was right for his services, and if he was out anything we would pay him that additional, and he said that was all right, and we agreed on so much, and I believe it was $10 an heir, except the John R. Yates heirs. John R. Yates was one of Richard Yates' heirs, who had died leaving some several heirs, and we were to pay them $2 each. Richard Yates being one of them, and he agreed to take $2 for his interest, and I took the list of the names of the heirs to prepare the deed from, and prepared the deed and mailed it to him, and I was going away at the time, and when I come back home I received the deed back; he had either left it there at the house or sent it; anyway the deed was at the house when I got back, and stating that there were two or three of the heirs' names left out. I don't know whether Richard had failed to give them to me in the memorandum, or whether it was an oversight in preparing the deed. I don't remember, and I was not well at that time, not able to do anything much, had gone away for a little while, and I come back, and another time that I come back, I don't remember just how long, I prepared another deed, and I saw Richard and named it to him, and he said that I needn't give it to him, that he had already taken the deed, and that he had gotten Dolphus Smith to prepare a deed, and he had taken in his own name. I think he told me that Dolphus prepared it; I think that is what he said. I was at one other time on the street somewheres, and I met Richard, and he said something or other about some money, and I was starting for some place or other, and I said I haven't got any money with me, and I told him that if he would put the money up and pay them that I would give him a check for it, and would pay him for the use of his money, and he agreed with me that he would do it, and that is the only time that he ever called on me for money.

"Q. Did he ever intimate to you that he was obtaining the deed in his own name?

"A. He did not.

"Q. When you saw him on the occasion that he told you that he had already taken the deed to himself, did he say why he had done this?

"A. I don't believe he did; if he did, I don't remember.

"Q. What did he say at that time about making you and Mr. J. H. Matney a release deed for the land?

"A. He first said he wouldn't make it, and I talked to him awhile, and he said he thought it was his, and he had the deed for a one-half interest in it, and he would sell it to us. I told him that wouldn't be treating us right, and I didn't think that he was that kind of a man to do that way, and after talking some he talked like he would take $400 if we would give it to him, and I told him that I thought that was too much. * * *

"A. I had no such conversation with Richard Yates, except that I told him that when to take the deed, and asked me $400, and I told him I could set it up cheaper than that, and I would do it. That is the only time I had any conversation of that kind with Mr. Yates, and the conversation that you refer to that I had with him at Matney, or in the street of Grundy. I know I was going some where and met Mr. Yates and something was said about some money, and I told him I didn't have the money with me, and if he would advance the money I would give him a check for it, and he agreed to do so.

"Q. How much was he to advance?

"A. Whatever was necessary to get the deed, We had an agreement with them to pay them so much a piece.

"Q. How much a piece?

"A. The Yates heirs, Richard and his brothers and sisters, was to be paid $2 apiece, I mean the agreement we had with Richard Yates, and I understood that it was satisfactory with all of them, and my recollection is that the others was $10, and it was $10 for Richard

Yates' heirs, but there were probably six or seven of them we agreed to pay $2 apiece. * * *

"Q. You haven't paid one cent?

"A. I have not.

"Q. And you have never fixed any amount with Richard Yates to pay him?

"A. I offered to pay him what was right and reasonable for his services and to pay him all of his money back, and he refused to make us the deed at all, except just sell us his interest in it, but after discussing the matter with him a while agreed to make us the deed for $400."

Richard Yates, the appellee, testified, in substance, that he did have the conversation with the appellants as to which the latter testified, and that he did agree to act as agent for them in getting the Yates heirs to sign a deed or release deed conveying their interest in the 241-acre tract of land to appellants, but that he (the appellee) did not agree to put up the money for appellants. Then follows the following testimony of appellee:

"Q. You may state what was done by you and Mr. Matney and Mr. Stinson in reference to procuring this release deed.

"A. I saw some of the parties, nearly all of them, and they said they would release it, and I spoke to Mr. Stinson, and he prepared me a deed and left it in the mail box, and then I saw him at Matney on the same day, and he wanted me to put up the money and go and get it up, and I told him 'No,' I would not go.

"Q. Did you tell him you would not put up the money?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. After you saw Mr. Stinson at Matney did you see some of the Yates heirs immediately following that?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You can state what ones you saw?

"A. Uncle William Riley Smith and Aunt Marinda Smith.

"Q. You may state if Marinda Smith was one of the Yates heirs?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When did you see them in reference to the time you saw Mr. Stinson at Matney, and the time he informed you he left the deed in your mail box?

"A. The same evening.

"Q. I will ask you if they agreed they would execute the release deed?

"A. They asked me if I had the money, and I told them I did not, and they says, 'Will you stand good?' I said, 'I won't,' and then said, 'You need not present any deed to us until you present the money.'

"Q. At that time did you see the deed?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Immediately following that conversation with Mr. and Mrs. Smith on the same evening did you get the deed from the mail box?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you find when you received the deed in reference to the parties to the deed?

"A. Some of the heirs' names were left out of the deed.

"Q. What did you do then?

"A. I brung it back to Mr. Stinson's office and gave it to Mr. Lindsay, or gave it to Mr. Stinson on the road; I don't know which.

"Q. Did you inform Mr. Stinson or Mr. Matney either that the deed was not correctly written as to the parties?

"A. I informed Mr. Stinson. I met him on the road between here and where I live, and told him some of the heirs' names were left out.

"Q. At the time you returned the deed to Mr. Stinson, I will ask you if he said anything further to you in reference to getting the release deed?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. I will ask you if, after returning this deed to him, you understood and considered at any time you were to do anything further in reference to the matter.

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Did Mr. Stinson or any one for him or Mr. Matney pay to you one cent with which to obtain this title at any time?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. At the time you returned the deed to Mr. Stinson and at the time you say you considered the matter was at an end, so far as you were concerned, did you then know the status of this Yates title?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. I believe you say you are not clear to just whom you returned the deed to, either Mr. Stinson or Mr. Lindsay; am I correct?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I will ask you if the Mr. Lindsay you refer to was a law partner of Mr. Stinson's?

"A. I think so.

"Q. Was he working in Mr. Stinson's office?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. After you returned the deed to him you may state if you gave him information and instructions as to the names being left out of the deed or not.

"A. I don't remember whether I did or not.

"Q. However, you do remember, if I understood your evidence, that you saw Mr. Stinson and told him as to the condition of the deed; am I correct?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. After you had returned this deed and informed Mr. Stinson that the deed was not correct, and after you say you considered the whole matter at an end so far as you were concerned, I will ask you if you took any steps to ascertain the condition of this Yates title to the 241-acre tract.

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You may state what you did in reference to obtaining this information.

"A. I came to Grundy one day and got you (meaning Mr. Daugherty) to look the record up, and see if it was what it had been reported to me, and you did, and found it was different from what it had been reported to me. * * *

"Q. Upon finding that the correct status of the title to this tract was entirely different to what they had represented it to you to be, you may state whether or not your counsel advised you that in his opinion the legal title rested in the Yates heirs according to the information he had received from the records to an undivided one-half interest in this tract. * * *

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Following the opinion and advice of your counsel, you may state then what you did in reference to a purchase of the interest of the Yates heirs to this land.

"A. I went and bought it for myself. I found that I had an interest in it myself and saw that it was different.

"Q. I will ask you what Mr. Stinson and Mr. Matney proposed to pay, if anything, for the release deeds to this land.

"A. Matney told me, if I would go and see the parties and see what they would do, he said, 'I will make you a present of $10 and will pay you extra for your trouble, and will take the matter up with Mr. Stinson,' and Mr. Stinson told me the same thing. * * *

"Q. You may state the total cost of obtaining the Yates branch of this title.

"A. It cost me $200. * * *

Cross-examination:

"By Mr. Pobst:

"Q. Mr. Yates, you first undertook to procure the release deed from the heirs of Richard Yates, Sr., for and on behalf of complainants in this suit, John H. Matney and J. H. Stinson, did you not?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When you started out to procure this deed and to see these heirs you were working for John H. Matney and J. H. Stinson, were you not?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you ever tell John H. Matney and J. H. Stinson that you had decided to quit working for them and procure the deed for yourself?

"A. No, sir; not before I brought the deed back to them, I did not.

"Q. Did you ever tell them before you got your deed from the heirs?

"A. No, sir."

The testimony of Wm. Riley Smith, although a witness for appellants, on the subject of requiring the money to be paid him before he executed the deed to appellants, etc., is as follows:

"A. Well, he [appellant] come here before that time. He come here first and said he wanted to know what we would take for it, and said he was buying it for Stinson and Matney, and we told him we would take $12 for our interest, and he come back after that, maybe six months afterwards, and fetched the deeds from Stinson for us to sign, and I asked him if he had the money, and he said that he did not have it, and said that they would send, said that Stinson said he would pay for it, and I told him, 'I will make the deed if you have the money,' and he said he did not have it, and I said, 'We are not going to make it,' and we didn't, and it was two or three months after that he passed out by the gap and said, 'I have taken a notion to buy that myself,' and said, 'Will you make me a deed?' and I said, 'We will sell to anybody that will pay us the money.'" (Italics supplied.)

Floyd Matney, another witness for the appellants, testified as follows with respect to statements made by appellant at the time the latter obtained the deed from the witness:

"Q. I wish you would state what Mr. Yates said. What did Dick say to you relative to his name appearing in the deed as a grantee?

"A. Well, Dick, when he come over there with the deed, and the magistrate, I just thought he was coming to take it up for John Stinson, but we got into a talk, and he asked me if I would care to sign the deed, that he was taking it up in his own name, and he would let them have it, as he had been trying to get John Stinson to put him up the money, that they would sign the deed, and that, as they hadn't done it, and Dolphus Smith was about to take it up, was thinking about taking it up, and taking care of it, that he would let them have it, and could do it all just as easier as he could to get his interest, and he was putting his own money in it, and all he wanted was a reasonable profit for the use of his money.

"Q. Did he represent to you that he was going to obtain the release deed for John Matney and J. H. Stinson? * * *

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Well, now, I will ask you to state exactly what he said about letting Stinson and Matney have the land?

"A. Well, he said he would let them have it; pay him back his money and a reasonable profit for his trouble; that he would let him have it.

"Q. Why did he say he was taking the deed in his own name?

"A. To be safe with his money."

The evidence of the existence of the elder patent, of date December 1, 1858, to E. F. Harman and Peter L. Surdam, and other pertinent matters are referred to in the opinion of the court.

H. Claude Pobst, of Grundy, for appellants.

A. A. Skeen, of Clintwood, and W. A. Daugherty, of Grundy, for appellee.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The chief question presented for our decision by the assignments of error is the following:

[1] 1. Did the appellants have the right to claim that the appellee held the conveyance from the Yates heirs in trust for appellants after appellee offered to convey the interests in the 241-acre tract thus acquired and also his own interest in such land derived by descent, if appellants would refund to him his actual outlay of $200 and pay him $200 for his services?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The law of the case was determined by the opinion and decision of this court on the former appeal as appears from the report of the case above referred to (121 Va. 506, 93 S. E. 694), and that holding need not be set forth here, except to say that it was based on the assumption of the correctness of the allegations of the pleadings of appellants, among which was the allegation that they had offered to pay appellant for his services and to reimburse him in full for all cost and expense which he had incurred in connection with the matter.

We are therefore now concerned solely with the facts of the case.

There is no controversy about the fact that at some time, over three months before appellee thought of or undertook to obtain the conveyance from the Yates heirs to himself, the appellee did undertake to act as agent for appellants in getting the Yates heirs to execute the deed to appellants. And, while there is some controversy as to what compensation the appellant Matney first agreed to pay the appellee for his services, the preponderance of the evidence clearly shows that before appellee undertook to act as agent in the matter both of appellants agreed to pay him a reasonable compensation for his services. Nor can there be any doubt, as we think, that the sum of $200 was but a reasonable compensation for appellant's services under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence.

The circumstances last referred to, as established, as we think by the preponderance of the evidence, are as follows: By the terms of the agency agreement entered into between appellee and appellants in the appellant Stinson's office, the purchase price to be paid to the respective Yates heirs was strictly limited to certain specific sums. Appellee was not authorized to obligate the appellants for anything more. Indeed, it was not then anticipated that any of the Yates heirs would demand any greater payment. It clearly appears that at that time the appellee did not agree to advance for appellants any of this purchase money. Both Matney and Yates in substance concede this in their testimony. The agency of the appellee was a mere ministerial one, not coupled with any interest. He could not go on with the contemplated purchase from the Yates heirs any longer than the appellants wished him to do so. The whole matter was executory. They had the right to abandon the undertaking at any time by not consenting to be bound for, or by not putting up the purchase money when called upon to do so. Stinson does testify that on a subsequent occasion, when the appellee "said something or other about some money," he (Stinson) requested appellee to put up the money, and that appellee agreed to do it. Appellee in his testimony positively denies that he made such an agreement, and says, in substance, that he affirmatively stated to Stinson when the latter made that proposition that he (the appellee) would not go on with the agency undertaking any further. At this time appellee had found that it would cost more money to obtain the conveyance from the Yates heirs than had been anticipated as aforesaid. Therefore the money Stinson says appellee mentioned as aforesaid must have been the greater prices which appellee had found would have to be paid. Now, if it had been then agreed between appellee and Stinson, as Stinson says was the case, that appellee undertook to go ahead and put up the money upon Stinson's authorization that he should so do, and upon Stinson's personal promise to repay him the loan, there was no occasion for appellee to have had the correspondence with Matney on the subject shown in evidence, which in effect, asked that appellants put up the purchase money. Matney admits in his testimony that this correspondence occurred. This is conduct ante motam litem, which is a most convincing character of evidence; and, as we think, turns the scale in weighing the conflicting evidence, consisting of the statements of appellee and Stinson aforesaid, so that there is a preponderance of evidence in favor of the correctness of the testimony of appellee on this subject. We therefore conclude that the testimony of Stinson aforesaid on this subject must be discarded, and that the established fact is that appellee at no time agreed to supply any of the purchase money. The testimony of Stinson on the subject being discarded, we must and do also conclude the fact to be that, after appellee informed appellants that it would take more money than had been anticipated to acquire the Yates heirs' deed, neither Stinson nor Matney authorized appellee to pay such enhanced price. Matney admits in his testimony that he was noncommittal on the subject, to say the least. As the matter stood thereafter, following the letter of Matney to appellee asking the latter "to delay the matter or stop until I (Matney) came up," neither Stinson nor Matney were obligated to refund to appellee one cent of the price necessary to be paid if he went on with the purchase of the Yates heirs. As aforesaid, appellee had no authority to go on with the purchase, or make appellants debtors to him without the authority from them to do so. In this situation the appellee found that some one else was contemplating making this purchase if he did not. In that emergency he decided to act and take the risk of having the appellants fail to ratify his action in going on with the purchase. This he did when he furnished the purchase money and took the deed to himself. He thus risked the loss both of the money paid out and the value of his time occupied about the matter, if his agency should be repudiated by appellants and the Yates heirs' title should prove to be inferior to the elder title under the lost deed claimed by appellants.

Further, while the evidence for appellee would not perhaps be considered as sufficiently specific to establish that his outlay in cost and expenses incurred in obtaining the conveyance from the Yates heirs aggregated the sum of $200, making up the sum of $400, if that had been made an issue in the case, this should be said: The appellants did not base their refusal to accept appellee's offer presently to be mentioned on the ground that such outlay did not amount to $200, and hence did not make that an issue in the case.

And, aside from the question of whether the agency aforesaid was or was not terminated by the failure of appellants to put up the purchase money found necessary to acquire the Yates heirs' deed, or to authorize appellee to pay that price, the following is the fact admitted by both of appellants in their testimony, namely: After appellee had obtained the deed from the Yates heirs to himself, he informed appellants of this and offered to convey the Yates heirs' interests thus acquired over to the appellants, if the latter would reimburse the appellee his expenditures aforesaid, which he claimed aggregated $200, and would pay him the additional sum of $200 for his services aforesaid in procuring the deed, which services consisted not alone of personal services about the matter, but also of the service of putting up and risking, as aforesaid, the loss of the purchase money paid out by him. This the appellants positively declined to do, not because they denied that the expenditures aggregated the amount of $200, but because they were unwilling to pay appellee $200 for his services.

The decision of the question under consideration turns, then, upon the decision of whether the sum of $200 was a reasonable compensation to appellee or an unreasonable sum. We have no hesitancy in holding that it was no more than a reasonable compensation under the circumstances, and that when appellants refused to pay it they released the appellee from his trust relationship to them growing out of his former agency, and that appellee thereafter, and at the time the suit was instituted and the decree was entered, had the right to hold as his own the conveyance aforesaid from the Yates heirs.

The remaining questions presented to us for decision by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

[2] 2. Did the court below err in taking no action with respect to the alleged Stuart title, and in not requiring the appellee to convey to appellants a half interest in the Stuart title sought to be set up by appellee in his answer as the superior title, on payment by appellants, to appellee of half of the purchase money paid by the latter for the Stuart title?

This question must be answered in the negative.

There were various positions on the subject of the Stuart title taken in the cause by appellants: First, they denied that there was any evidence in the cause that the alleged elder patent on which this claim of title by appellee is based had any existence; secondly, they claimed that if the first position was untenable there was a broken link in the chain of this title from the patent to appellee by reason of a certain tax deed being void for certain reasons which need not be here set out; and, thirdly, they claimed that if both the first and second positions were untenable, the appellee should be held to have purchased the Stuart title for the joint benefit of himself and appellants and be compelled to convey a half interest in such title to appellants on payment by them to appellee of half the purchase money the latter paid for the Stuart title.

The appellee took issue with the appellants upon all of these positions, and these several matters were argued at length in the petition, in the briefs, and orally by counsel for the respective parties, and numerous authorities have been cited on the different questions raised; but, in view of the objection made by the appellants themselves that there is no evidence in the cause of the existence of the elder patent in question, and of our view that this position is well taken, we cannot in this case enter upon any consideration of these various questions, other than the single one of whether there is any evidence in the cause of the existence of such patent.

Confining ourselves, therefore, to this single matter, as bearing upon the question next above stated and now under consideration, we find the situation to be this:

The only evidence in the record of this cause of the existence of the alleged elder patent mentioned is what purports to be a copy from a patent book in the clerk's office of Buchanan county, certified by the deputy clerk of that county in the following form: "A copy teste: W. L. Dennis, Clerk, by J. W. Deskins, D. C."

The evidence in this cause was introduced, and indeed the decree under review was entered, prior to the Code of 1919, and hence, the subject under consideration is governed by the statute law as it then existed. Section 3393, Code 1919, had not then been enacted.

By section 3334, Code 1904, the following is provided:

"A copy of any record * * * in the clerk's office of any court * * * may be admitted as evidence in lieu of the original. * * *"

[3] The question is: Was an original grant from the commonwealth such as that in question, as the law then stood, authorized to be recorded in the clerk's office of any court, so as to become a "record" in such clerk's office?

It is contended for appellee that section 2367, Code 1904, gives such authority; but we think not. An examination of that section discloses that it has reference only to new grants, issued in pursuance of the preceding sections 2365 and 2366 of Code 1904, based on decrees of court in suits to supply lost or destroyed records or papers forming links in titles, which constitute a different character of grants from that of the grant in question before us.

Section 2350, Code 1904, provides that such a grant as that in question before us shall be recorded by the register of the land office in his office; and section 2352 provides that he shall keep a separate index for each county of all patents for lands lying in this state.

We are of opinion that, in accordance with the statute law as it stood at the time the question under consideration arose, the grant in question was not authorized to be recorded in the clerk's office of Buchanan county; that it was therefore not a "record" in such office; so that the certified copy aforesaid from such office cannot be regarded as evidence of the original. Hence there is no evidence in the cause before us of the existence of such a patent.

Therefore, aside from all other questions involved, we are of opinion that there was no error in the action of the court below in taking no action with respect to the alleged Stuart title. The numerous other questions with respect to the Stuart title raised by the parties in this cause were moot questions before the court below, and they are moot questions before us. Hence we do not pass, and must not be understood as passing, upon any of them.

[4] 3. But one other matter remains to be disposed of. The petition for appeal calls attention to the fact that no answer was filed by the appellee to the third amended bill, and it is contended that the court below erred in not taking that bill for confessed as against the appellee.

We think there was no error in the action of the court in this regard. The third amended bill was filed in the clerk's office without leave of court. No process issued thereon against the appellee. The cause was brought on for hearing upon it by agreement of parties, subject to the reserved right of appellee to move the court to reject the bill, which motion was afterwards made. The court never passed on that motion, so that the time never arrived where it was incumbent upon appellee to answer such bill. Meanwhile the answer of appellee filed in the cause put in issue all the material allegations of the third amended bill, as they were the same in substance as those of the original and first amended bills, and no objection was made by appellants to the admissibility of the testimony introduced in behalf of appellee bearing on such issues on the ground that such testimony was not within the issues in the cause; and appellants, indeed, introduced proof bearing upon the same issues.

The decree under review will be affirmed, without prejudice to either the appellants or appellee to assert and rely upon the existence or nonexistence of the elder patent aforesaid, and any rights they may claim respectively under or as against the Stuart title, or to take and have hereafter determined any positions they may choose respectively on the subject of the alleged right of appellants to require the appellee to convey to appellants a half interest in such title on payment by appellants to appellee of half of the purchase money paid by the latter for such title as freely as if this case had not been decided as it has.

STATE v. SNYDER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Statutes  $\S$ 161—Older of two statutes dealing with same subject so repugnant that both cannot coexist repealed by implication.

Repeal of one statute by another by implication is not favored, yet such method is allowable when the statutes deal with the same subject-matter and are so repugnant that both cannot coexist, and if so, the older must yield to the later, it being the last legislative declaration upon the subject.

2. Divorce  $\S$ 320—Statute prohibiting divorcee's remarrying within time prescribed by the statute and the decree repeals prior act exonerating from criminal liability.

Section 14, c. 73, Acts 1915 (section 14, c. 64, Code 1918; Code Supp. 1918,  $\S$  3648a), relating to the right of a divorcee to remarry within the time prescribed by the section and by the decree, except to the plaintiff in the proceeding, unless the decree is modified in that respect as therein provided in the section, impliedly repeals section 2, c. 149 (section 5306), Code, exonerating a divorcee from the criminal liability for the violation of the section immediately preceding the latter.

3. Divorce  $\S$ 320—Legislature may authorize decree prohibiting remarriage of party at fault within five years unless with leave.

The Legislature lawfully may authorize a provision in a divorce decree prohibiting the remarriage of the party at fault within five years from the date of the decree except to the plaintiff, unless after the expiration of one year from such date the court modifies the restraint upon the application of such party supported by proof that "by reason of his or her life and conduct since the date of the decree" he or she "is entitled to such relief."

4. Divorce  $\S$ 320—Divorcee remarrying within time prohibited by statute and decree is criminally liable as in the absence of divorce.

A remarriage of such person contrary to the prohibition, unless the decree is so modified, renders him or her "criminally liable the same as if no divorce had been granted."

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Divorce  $\S$ 320—Indictment for violation of law prohibiting remarriage of divorcee need not allege cohabitation.

In a prosecution of a divorcee under Code Supp. 1918, c. 64,  $\S$  14 (section 3648a), for remarrying within the time prohibited by statute and by decree, the indictment need not allege that the defendant has cohabited with the party whom she married within such time, since the statute is against the solemnization of the marriage within the forbidden period, and its violation is complete without cohabitation.

Certified from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Amanda Belle Snyder was indicted for a felony for marrying within the time in which she was forbidden to marry by a divorce decree under Code 1918, c. 64,  $\S$  14 (Code Supp. 1918,  $\S$  3648a). Defendant's demurrer to and motion to quash the indictment were overruled, and the court certified its action for review. Rulings on demurrer and motion to quash approved, and cause certified to circuit court.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., for plaintiff.

George & Wilcox, of Philippi, for defendant.

LYNCH, J. Marion L. Snyder and Amanda Belle Cross duly entered into the marital relation in Barbour county, this state, in the year 1910, and thereafter until 1920 remained husband and wife, when at the suit of the husband the circuit court of that county, at the 1920 September term, granted him a divorce from her and in the decree forbade her, as the party at fault, to remarry within five years from its date except to the plaintiff. This prohibition she disregarded or ignored, and within a few days after the date of the dissolution order intermarried with William Harvey in Barbour county, and this indictment charging her with having thereby committed a felony soon followed. The authority for the accusation, if any, is section 14, c. 73, Acts of 1915, now section 14, c. 64, Code 1918 (section 3648a, Code Supp. 1918):

"Neither party to a divorce suit shall again marry within six months from the date of a decree of divorce; but this provision shall not apply to, or prohibit the divorced parties from being remarried to each other at any time. The court may further prohibit the guilty party from marrying within a certain time, to be fixed in the decree, not to exceed five years from the date of the decree; and any marriage contracted by the parties, or either of them, except a remarriage by the divorced parties to each other, within the prohibited period, shall be void, and the party shall be criminally liable the same as if no divorce had been granted. The court may, at any time after the expiration of one year, modify the restraint imposed upon the guilty party, upon it being shown that such person, by reason of his or her life and conduct, since the date of the decree, is entitled to such relief."

[5] To the indictment and each of its two counts defendant demurred and moved to quash it. Each challenge to its sufficiency having been overruled, the court certified here its action thereon for review. The first point considered is the omission of an averment of cohabitation in this state by the parties to the subsequent marriage, a relation prohibited by the decree until after the expiration of five years unless the restraint be removed in the manner provided by the statute. There is in the section no hint of the necessity for such an averment. It is against the solemnization of the marriage, the uniting of a divorced husband or wife whose conduct made necessary and expedient recourse to the suit for relief, that the statute inveighs. So considered, the offense is complete when the prohibited ceremony is performed. Cohabitation is not an element of the criminal act when committed within this state, as in this instance it was. Had the defendant and Harvey entered into the marriage relation in another state in order to escape the consequences of the forbidden act, their return to and cohabitation in this state may have had some effect upon the guilt of the accused. But no such case is presented for decision.

[3, 4] The right and duty of the Legislature to provide just and reasonable regulations for marriage and divorce is imperative for the sake of morality and decency as matters of public concern and for the safety of those more immediately affected. No institution has a more direct influence or a more important relation in life than marriage. Civilization in large measure depends upon it, and governments are solicitous to preserve and safeguard its sanctity. They have also taken the utmost precaution to prescribe the causes and regulate the manner for the annulment of marriages. From an early period the English Parliament reserved to itself the right not merely to prescribe the causes warranting divorce from the bonds of matrimony, but to grant the annulment of marriages for such causes, as did also the legislative assemblies of the American colonies prior to the Revolution. Now the judiciary of the several states may grant divorces, subject, however, to such regulatory enactments as the state Legislatures may deem necessary or expedient for the protection of the public and the parties interested. It was for this purpose that section 14 became a part of the laws of this state. Its provisions are not unusual or extraordinary.

Illinois, Kansas, and Virginia have similar laws. Some of them authorize the inhibition of the marriage of the party whose disloyalty to the marriage vows warrants the dissolution of the marriage alliance during the lifetime of the party not so at fault, unless the provision in the decree is modified subsequently upon the application of the party so prohibited. These statutes the highest courts of the states named have upheld as valid and enforceable against the transgressor though with some relaxation where the rights of the innocent issues of the marriage were involved or the marriage was solemnized in a state other than the one that enacted the statute. See Olsen v. People, 219 Ill. 40, 76 N. E. 89; Hobbs v. Hobbs, 279 Ill. 163, 116 N. E. 629; Durland v. Durland, 67 Kan. 734, 74 Pac. 274, 63 L. R. A. 959.

In Musick v. Musick, 88 Va. 12, 13 S. E. 302, the Supreme Court of Virginia held valid an act conferring upon the courts of the state authority to prohibit the marriage of the guilty party at any time while the decree remained in full force and effect. In all such legislation provisions appear for the relaxation or modification of the inhibition upon the application of the party restrained supported by proof sufficient to show reformation on his or her part, as does section 14 of chapter 64, Code 1918.

[1, 2] The main, if not the most serious objection to the indictment, is the character of the charge against the accused. For her the argument is that according to section 2 of chapter 149 (sec. 5306) of the Code she cannot be proceeded against as for a bigamous marriage entered into after the date of the divorce decree, and that she can be prosecuted, if at all, for no offense other than a misdemeanor. That section considered alone does tend to support her contention. But does not section 14 of chapter 64 repeal, at least by implication, section 2 of chapter 149? The first two sections of that chapter appear with slight alterations in language in the Code of 1860 and subsequent Codes, especially since 1882. If the law in this state is as she contends, the marriage between her and Harvey is not bigamous, or perhaps, more properly, not polygamous. Section 2 of chapter 149 is an old statute; section 14 of chapter 73, Acts 1915, now section 14 of chapter 64 of the Code, a much later one, and contains the usual repealing clause. They deal with the same subject, the effect to be given to section 1 (section 5305) of chapter 149 when the party indicted is a divorcee. The first or older section exonerates her from criminal liability; the later one in effect repeals the other, and fixes liability upon her. They treat of the effect of a divorce. Their provisions are repugnant, each to the other, and their inconsistency is too palpable to admit of their coexistence as the law applicable to the facts averred in the indictment. If they cannot stand together, one must fall. In such case the later law must prevail as the last expression of the legislative will on the subject. This is true though the repeal of the prior statute is by implication, a method of repeal not favored, but sanctioned only where the repugnancy is obvious. See 12 Enc. Dig. for Virginia and West Virginia, p. 780.

There seems to be no valid objection to the second count, at least as urged in argument. Our opinion, then, is to approve the rulings upon the demurrer and motion to quash, and to certify the result of our investigation to the circuit court of Barbour county.

DE PUE v. STEBER et al. (No. 4125.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Witnesses  $\S$ 159(7)—In administrator's action to recover property claimed as a gift, defendant is incompetent to testify as to transactions with deceased.

In an action by the administrator of a deceased person, for the recovery of specific personal property, against one claiming it by gift inter vivos from the intestate, the alleged donee is not competent to testify to the alleged gift, nor to any conversation or declaration of either of them, respecting the same, on the occasion thereof or afterwards; the gift, if any, being a personal transaction, and the conversations personal communications, between him and a deceased person.

2. Witnesses  $\S$ 140(14)—In administrator's action for property claimed as gift by defendant, party executing forthcoming bond is incompetent to testify to deceased donor's admissions.

A person who, in such an action commenced in a justice's court and carried by appeal into a circuit court, executed a counter bond with condition to have the property forthcoming to answer the judgment in the action, is incompetent, by reason of interest, to testify to declarations or admissions of the alleged gift by the donor; they being personal communications between him and a deceased person.

3. Evidence  $\S$ 123(7), 273(5)—In action to recover property from deceased donor, donee's statements as to gifts held not admissible as res gestae.

A declaration by the alleged donee, to the effect that the property had been given to him as claimed, made on the day of the alleged gift, and very soon afterwards, but not at the place thereof, is not admissible, it being no part of the res gestae; but his declarations of ownership of the property while in his possession are admissible.

4. Evidence  $\S$ 268, 269(2), 271(17)—Self-serving declarations of deceased donor and while intoxicated not proof of character of transaction, but admissible to show state of mind.

Self-serving declarations of a deceased person from whom a gift is claimed, made soon after he relinquished his possession of the property and while intoxicated and suffering from delirium tremens, are not admissible, or rather cannot be used, for proof of the character of the transaction between him and the alleged donee, but are admissible as bearing upon his state of mind at the time thereof.

5. Evidence  $\S$ 269(2)—Declaration of deceased donor against donee's interest, after transaction and recovery of mental vigor, held inadmissible.

Declarations of such donor against the interests of the donee, made after the transaction and after restoration of his full mental vigor, are not admissible at all.

6. Evidence  $\S$ 269(2)—In administrator's action for property claimed as gift, evidence of unwillingness that property go to relatives held admissible.

In such case, declarations of the donor, indicative of unfriendliness on his part toward his brothers and sisters and his unwillingness that they should have any of his property, though not shown to have been made in anticipation of impending death and therefore not strongly probative, are admissible.

7. Trial  $\S$ 85—General objection to evidence good in part properly overruled.

A general objection to evidence available for some purposes in the trial, but not for others, is properly overruled.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

8. Witnesses  $\S$ 139(12)—In action to recover alleged gift, defendant witness held not disqualified because he was the father of the defendant donee.

In an administrator's action against a father and his minor son to recover a diamond ring claimed by defendants to have been given by the decedent to such son, defendant father was not disqualified as a witness to personal communications between himself and the decedent respecting the alleged gift by reason of his relationship to his son.

Error to Circuit Court, Roane County.

Action by H. W. De Pue, as administrator of the estate of Fred M. De Pue, deceased, against Flem Steber and another, in detinue before a justice of the peace, in which a judgment was rendered for the plaintiff and an appeal taken to the circuit court where, on second trial, judgment was for the defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

S. P. Bell, of Spencer, for plaintiff in error.

Geo. F. Cunningham, of Spencer, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The complaint on this writ of error goes to a judgment for the defendant in an action of detinue for the recovery of a diamond ring, commenced before a justice of the peace, in whose court the plaintiff prevailed, and tried a second time on appeal, in the circuit court of Roane county, in which the defendants prevailed.

The real defendant is Frank Steber, a youth of 14 or 15 years and the son of the defendant, Flem Steber. His claim of title is based upon an alleged gift of the ring to him by Fred M. De Pue. Apparently, the father with whom the boy resides has advised and encouraged him to assume the attitude he has taken and supports him in his effort to maintain it. It seems to be uncontroverted that on February 26, 1919, De Pue delivered the ring to the boy in his father's barber shop. One of the issues involves the mental condition of the alleged donor, at that time, and another the purpose of the delivery. De Pue's heavy drinking some days before the alleged gift brought on delirium tremens with its hallucinations, according to the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, and this mental and nervous condition continued for some time thereafter. Exposure incident to his conduct brought on pneumonia, of which he died March 26, 1919. One of the plaintiff's theories is that the delivery was made under the influence of an hallucination incident to the affliction and in a period of mental derangement and irresponsibility, and the other is that of a mere temporary deposit for safe-keeping.

The case went to the jury without instructions and the assignments of error relate for the most part to the competency of witnesses and the admissibility of evidence.

[1] For determination of the issues raised upon these theories, the plaintiff introduced much evidence pertaining to the mental condition of the alleged donor, immediately before and after the transaction in question, all of which was clearly admissible. Testimony by which he set up a number of self-serving declarations of the alleged donor was objected to, and admission thereof is assigned as error. On the other hand, the plaintiff objected to the testimony of Flem Steber and Frank Steber, relating to personal transactions and communications between him and them, concerning the alleged gift, on the ground of disqualification by reason of interest in the controversy. Certain testimony of the boy's mother to declarations made by him, was admitted over an objection of the plaintiff, on the ground that it constituted a part of the res gestæ. Evidence of a declaration of the decedent, indicative of a state of unfriendliness between him and members of his family, was also admitted over an objection by the plaintiff.

Inadmissibility of part of the testimony of Frank Steber is admitted in the brief filed on his behalf. That the gift of the ring from De Pue to Frank Steber, if made, and all of the conduct of both on that occasion, were personal transactions between them and excluded by the rule disqualifying witnesses on the ground of interest, is perfectly obvious; Frank Steber being interested in the result of the trial, and De Pue being dead. It is equally manifest that anything said by either of them, on that occasion, relating to the ring and a gift thereof, was a personal transaction within the meaning of the law, to which Steber could not testify under the circumstances.

[2, 3] Flem Steber was not disqualified as a witness to personal communications between himself and the decedent, respecting the matter in controversy, by reason of his relationship to Frank Steber. Cooper v. Cooper, 65 W. Va. 712, 717, 64 S. E. 927. The record discloses, however, that he together with another person executed a counter bond in the penalty of $200, for the purpose of having the property left in the hands of himself and Frank Steber, pending the determination of the action, and with condition to have the same forthcoming to answer the judgment against them, if any. The record, as sent up from the justice's court, included this bond. The statute, section 168, c. 50, of the Code, requires a justice, in case of an appeal, to certify a complete transcript from his docket, of all the proceedings before him, and to transmit the same, together with the appeal bond, the pleadings, depositions, and all original papers in the cause, to the clerk of the circuit court of the county. By its recitals, this bond shows that the Flem Steber executing it is identical with the Flem Steber who is a party defendant along with Frank Steber. It is hardly necessary to say that the question of competency of a witness is always one for the court. Even though the jury may not have been able to notice the bond, the court could resort to it, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not Steber was interested in the result of the action. By the execution of this bond, he became a person interested in the result. In an action upon that bond, a judgment for the plaintiff in this action would be conclusive upon him, and that is the test of the liability of a surety or other person, not having or claiming an interest in himself. 1 Greenleaf, Ev. § 390; Miller v. Montgomery, 78 N. Y. 282. Under this rule, a surety in a guardian's bond is incompetent to testify against the ward, in respect of transactions and communications had by him with a deceased person. Crawford v. Parker, Adm'r., 96 Ga. 156, 23 S. E. 196. Guarantors of a tenant are incompetent to testify against the personal representative of a deceased lessor. Grommes v. St. Paul Trust Co., 147 Ill. 634, 35 N. E. 820, 37 Am. St. Rep. 243.

[3] Admissibility of the mother's testimony to a declaration made by Frank Steber on the day of the alleged gift and shortly thereafter, depends upon whether or not the declaration was a part of the res gestæ. The transaction between De Pue and Frank Steber took place in Flem Steber's barber shop, when Flem was absent from the shop; he having gone to his evening meal. On his return he found De Pue and Frank in the shop. On his arrival, De Pue took the chair to be shaved and Frank left. After his departure, Flem says De Pue called for Frank and, being informed of his absence, stated that he had given him a small diamond ring. The mother testified that, on that evening, Frank came running upstairs with the ring and said, "Look here, Mother, what I have got." Thereupon she said, "What is that?" And he replied, "A diamond ring," and said, "Fred De Pue gave it to me." That this declaration was made after completion of the transaction is obvious. The boy had left the scene thereof. Nothing connected the declaration with the transaction, except the boy's possession of the ring and possibly an excited state of mind. His mental condition is not the subject of investigation. The fact to be determined is whether or not a gift of the ring had been made. The boy's feelings immediately afterwards constituted a mere incident or consequence of the transaction. That the declaration was a mere narrative of a past event is clear beyond doubt. Under the rule adopted by this court, in Hawker v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 825, and the precedents therein cited, this declaration is clearly excluded on the ground of narration of a past event and remoteness in time.

The declaration admitted in Thomas' Adm'r v. Lewis, 89 Va. 1, 57, 15 S. E. 389, 18 L. R. A. 170, 37 Am. St. Rep. 848, could not have been admitted by this court, as a part of the res gestæ, consistently with the rules and principles announced in our case above referred to, and it was not admitted in that case upon the sole ground that it was a part of the res gestæ. The declaration was made the next morning after the gift, many hours after the transaction. The opinion does not indicate how or why it constituted a part of the res gestæ. It was no doubt admissible to repel inferences against the donee, arising from silence imputed to her, respecting the alleged gift, by the testimony of witnesses of the opposite party, and that is one of the grounds upon which admission thereof was approved. The rule announced by this court in Roane Lumber Co. v. Lovett Adm'r, 72 W. Va. 328, 78 S. E. 102, may tend to show the correctness of that ruling.

Her testimony to the effect that the boy then claimed to be the owner of the ring and put it among his other possessions was admissible by way of explanation of his possession. Martin v. Martin, 174 Ill. 371, 51 N. E. 691, 66 Am. St. Rep. 290. She could testify that he claimed it as his own, but not that De Pue had given it to him.

[8] No ground is perceived upon which testimony to De Pue's declaration of unfriendliness to his brothers and sisters could be excluded. It seems to be relevant as having some bearing upon the motive he may have had in parting with his ring, but its probative value is diminished or limited by lack of proof of a gift in anticipation of death. The weight of evidence is not the test of its admissibility, however.

[4, 5, 7] Though De Pue's declaration to the effect that he had given his money away and his ring to Frank Steber, for safe-keeping, under the belief that robbers were pursuing him, made shortly after the alleged gift, and while his mind was affected by intoxication and delirium tremens, as testified to by numerous witnesses, are self-serving in their nature and effect, they are nevertheless admissible for the purpose of proving his mental condition and state of mind. Lane v. Moore, 151 Mass. 87, 23 N. E. 828, 21 Am. St. Rep. 430; Shaller v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Potter v. Baldwin, 133 Mass. 427; Lewis v. Mason, 109 Mass. 169; May v. Bradlee, 127 Mass. 414; Pickins v. Davis, 134 Mass. 252, 45 Am. Rep. 422. They are not admissible, however, or rather cannot be used, to prove directly the fact of the gift, or the character of the transaction, the vital issues in the case. Lane v. Moore, cited. As they are admissible only for certain and limited purposes, a general objection to them was unavailing. State v. Hood, 63 W. Va. 182, 59 S. E. 971, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 448, 129 Am. St. Rep. 964; Bluefield v. McLaugherty, 64 W. Va. 538, 543, 63 S. E. 363. In admitting them the court, if requested, and possibly without request, should have advised the jury, by instruction or otherwise, that they were not to be considered as evidence of a deposit of the ring merely for safe-keeping, nor against the theory of an absolute gift, but only as bearing upon the alleged donor's state of mind, including his intention. Declarations of that kind made when he was not so affected are not admissible at all. 6 Ency. Ev. 213, citing well-considered decisions sustaining the text.

For the errors in the rulings as to evidence, herein indicated, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WINNING v. SILVER HILL OIL CO. et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 20, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 524(1)— Foreign executor cannot proceed on petition and published notice to authorize transfer of property from lawful custody in this state to another state.

An executor of the will of a person domiciled in a state other than this, at the time of his death, appointed by a court of such other state, in which the will was probated, but not shown to have been appointed in this state, seeking recovery of gas well rentals arising from a lease of an undivided interest of an infant devisee under the will, in a tract of land belonging to the estate of the testator, made on his behalf by his guardian duly authorized to execute it, from such guardian, and an adjudication of his right to future rentals under said lease, cannot proceed merely by petition and upon published notice, for such relief, under the provisions of sections 3, 4, and 6 of chapter 84 (secs. 3981, 3982, 3984) of the Code, authorizing transfers of property and estates from custody in this state to proper custody in other states, by such procedure, nor any of them.

2. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 524(1)— Foreign executor may sue for transfer of property from personal representatives but not for any other purpose.

Although a foreign executor is authorized by said section 6 to sue in equity for the transfer of property of his testator in the hands of a personal representative in this state, he is not thereby authorized to maintain a suit in this state for any other purpose.

3. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 524(1)—
Foreign personal representative can only sue in this state when empowered by statute.

Unless empowered so to do by a statute, a foreign personal representative cannot sue in the courts of this state.

4. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 524(1)—
Nonresident suing in this state as foreign executor or trustee must comply with our practice statute requirements.

Though a person acting in the dual capacity of executor and trustee of an estate may sue in the courts of this state as trustee, he must comply with the requirements of our practice in order to institute and maintain his suit.

5. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 524(3)—
Executor suing as trustee to recover property must follow statute as to naming necessary parties defendant.

A paper filed by a foreign executor against a resident guardian of a nonresident infant and a lessee, as a petition for transfer to the executor in his capacity as trustee of his testator's estate of funds in the hands of the guardian arising from gas well rentals as aforesaid, and for adjudication of his right to rentals to accrue from the lease in the future, upon the theory of superior title in the executor and trustee, which, although praying relief against the guardian and lessee, does not in any way name either of them as a defendant, nor pray that either of them be made such, nor that either of them be required to answer it, cannot be treated as a sufficient bill in equity as to them.

6. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 524(3)—
Bill held defective for not making infant party.

To a bill having for its purpose the relief above indicated the infant is a necessary party, and, if the paper were otherwise sufficient as a bill, it would be defective for its failure to make him a party.

7. Appearance  $\S$ 20—Demurrer of guardian and lessee to paper regarded as a bill held not a waiver of process.

The appearance and demurrer of the guardian and lessee to such paper regarded as a bill does not amount to a waiver of process, and, no process having issued upon it, there is a total lack of jurisdiction of the persons of the parties interested adversely to the petitioner.

Certified from Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Action by Ross J. Winning, as executor of the estate of Edward D. Winning, deceased, against the Silver Hill Oil Company and others. Demurrer to petition by executor sustained, and cause certified. Order affirmed.

A. C. Chapman, of New Martinsville, for plaintiff.

Thos. H. Cornett, of New Martinsville, for defendants.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decision certified for review in this cause involves an inquiry as to the right of an executor appointed in the state of Ohio, under a will probated in that state, and who is not shown to have qualified as executor in this state, nor given any bond in the state in which he was appointed, to have awarded and transferred to him certain property, rentals arising from an oil and gas lease, some of which have already accrued and been paid to the guardian of a nonresident infant, who is a devisee and legatee under the will, and to obtain an adjudication of his right to future rentals. That inquiry has been raised and submitted by an order of the court below sustaining a demurrer to the petition filed by the executor for such award or transfer and adjudication.

The will designated two persons for executors, a son of the testator and a friend, the latter of whom is dead. It also dispenses with the requirement of any bond.

Dated February 27, 1908, probated in Jefferson county, Ohio, May 15, 1909, and recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of Wetzel county, W. Va., August 11, 1910, the will first provides for payment of the debts and expenses of the last sickness and burial of the testator. The second item reads as follows:

"It is my wish that the residue of my estate after settling my indebtedness shall be held by my executors hereinafter named for the term of six years after my decease and that they shall have full authority to use revenues derived from the estate as their judgment may determine to be for the interest of the heirs; and if any effort is made by any one claiming to have an interest in the estate, to interfere with the provisions of this item or any other provision of this will, then such interest or interests shall be forfeited to the other heirs."

Subject to this provision, the third item disposes of the testator's estate as the law would have disposed of it in the absence of a will. The fourth item charges one of the interests with the sum of $350 in favor of some of the other beneficiaries.

The application for the transfer of the sum in question was resisted and has thus far been defeated by James B. Clark, guardian for Gerald W. Townsend, an infant and resident of the state of Illinois, and the Silver Hill Oil Company, a corporation. Townsend was a minor at the date of the filing of the petition, but he attained his majority before the decision in question was rendered. The object of the petition was to require the guardian of Townsend to pay over to the petitioner a certain sum of money, which had come into his hands from gas well rentals on a tract of land in which Townsend owned an undivided eighth interest by virtue of the will, and to obtain an adjudication of the right of the petitioner to future rentals accruing on the lease.

[1] The estate of Edward D. Winning, the testator, included a tract of land situated in Wetzel county and containing 450 acres. By an agreement made October 10, 1918, all of the devisees of his will, except Gerald W. Townsend, joined in a lease of said tract of land to the Silver Hill Oil Company, for oil and gas purposes. At about the same time Townsend's guardian appointed in Wetzel county, instituted and prosecuted to a final order a summary proceeding to obtain authority to lease his undivided interest in the land to the same corporation, and, after having obtained such authority, he executed the lease, and this action on his part was ratified and confirmed by the court. This lease, as well as the one executed by Townsend's co-owners, provided for the usual one-eighth of the oil as royalty, and an annual cash rental for each producing gas well, the first one $300 per year, payable in four equal installments, and the other $37.50, payable in like manner. At the date of the filing of the petition now under consideration there were three producing gas wells on the property, and some rentals had been paid to the guardian under the lease of Townsend's interests, effected as aforesaid.

The ostensible and avowed purpose of the petition is effectuation of a transfer of funds, under the provisions of sections 3, 4, and 6 of chapter 84 (secs. 3981, 3982, 3984) of the Code, is clearly not within any of those provisions, because it discloses a state of facts to which their terms are not applicable. The third and fourth sections contemplate the transfer of funds or property in the hands of a guardian or committee appointed in this state belonging to a minor or insane person residing out of it, and funds of an infant, insane person, or cestui que trust invested, or required to be invested, under the direction of a court of this state. They also contemplate the filing of a petition by a guardian, committee, or trustee lawfully appointed and qualified in the state or county of the residence of said infant, insane person, or cestui que trust. This petition was not filed by any person falling within these designations. The petitioner is an executor of a will, appointed in Jefferson county, Ohio, and the infant in question resides in the state of Illinois. These two provisions relate to transfers of funds and property in definite, specific, and limited cases. Under no rule of construction now recalled can their operation be extended to other cases. Section 6 is broader and more general in its terms, but it does not contemplate a transfer of funds in the hands of a guardian appointed in this state. It provides for transfer of personal estate in this state vested in a trustee resident herein, or who acts by virtue of a deed, will, or other instrument, recorded or probated in this state, and assets of a decedent, domiciled at the time of his death in another state, in the hands of an administrator or executor appointed in this state. Clark, the guardian proceeded against, is not a trustee within the meaning of said section 6, because he is a guardian actually and technically, and falls within the express terms of sections 3 and 4, and not a trustee, nor a personal representative. Being an executor, and possibly a trustee, the petitioner falls within the terms of section 6, providing for transfer and delivery of estate or assets, or any part thereof, to a non-resident trustee, administrator, or executor appointed by some court of record in another state. But even here he may not be within further terms apparently requiring the trustee, administrator, or executor to have been appointed by some court of record in the state in which the beneficiaries reside. If he is a trustee under the will probated in the state and county in which the testator was domiciled at the time of his death, he may be within the contemplation of the statute, upon the presumption that the beneficiaries of the trust reside in that state, and it may not be material that one of them resides in a third state, Illinois. As to this we decide nothing, however, since we are of the opinion that, for other reasons already indicated and yet to be elaborated, the case attempted to be made out in the petition is not within the provisions of section 6.

[2] Manifestly the attitude of the petitioner is hostile to the claims of the infant named in the petition and his guardian. He claims a title or right of possession superior to theirs by virtue of a provision of the will. The petition does not present the usual case of a guardian or committee appointed in another state coming into this state with an admission of the title of the infant or insane person and a mere demand for a transfer of the custody of the ward's property from this state to proper custody in another state. It asserts right in the executor, by virtue of the second item or clause of the will, to keep the estate of the testator intact and undivided, notwithstanding the expiration of the six-year period therein described, because all of the debts of the estate have not been paid, and it is not in condition for distribution, and has not been distributed or divided among the devisees. At the same time it discloses claims of superior right in the nonresident infant, Gerald W. Townsend, and his guardian. It charges the fact that the funds in the hands of the latter belong to the estate, which he, acting as guardian of Townsend, refuses to deliver up to the petitioner. No doubt this refusal is based upon the theory of lack of right in the petitioner to the possession and custody of the fund. If Clark were a trustee or a personal representative of the same testator that the petitioner represents, the procedure adopted might be within the contemplation of said section 6; but the averments of the petition negative the existence of any fiduciary or trust relation. It is not predicated upon the theory of any such relation, express or implied, between the petitioner and the guardian; nor is the petition that of a nonresident executor against an administrator or executor in this state, for Clark is neither an administrator nor an executor, nor did the funds come to his hands in that capacity. He has never been appointed as the administrator or executor of E. D. Winning, nor does he profess to act in that capacity. He was duly appointed guardian for Townsend, in which capacity, and no other, he professes to act. This status is admitted by the petitioner.

[3, 4] The suggestion in argument that the petition may be treated as a bill, notwithstanding its form and designation, is wholly untenable, for several reasons. Under the provisions of section 6, the party entitled to relief may proceed either by petition or by a bill in equity; but in either case he must seek either enforcement of a trust or a transfer of property from a resident personal representative to a nonresident personal representative. Neither a bill in equity nor a petition is authorized by this section in any other kind of a case. Of course, under general equity jurisprudence, a bill may be filed in other cases, and it may be that a sufficient bill could be predicated upon the facts disclosed in the petition. But a foreign executor cannot maintain a suit in this state, unless authorized so to do by this statute or some other. Oney v. Ferguson, 41 W. Va. 568, 23 S. E. 710; Andrews v. Avory et al., 14 Grat. (55 Va.) 229, 239, 73 Am. Dec. 355. A statute, section 4 of chapter 85 (sec. 3991), Code, seems to imply that a nonresident, under the circumstances disclosed, may be appointed an executor in this state; but the petitioner is not shown to have been so appointed. If appointed, however, he would not sue under section 6 of chapter 84. He would sue independently of that statute. But, if he is more than a foreign executor, if the will makes him also a trustee, he could sue without having been appointed as an executor in this state. Whether he is a trustee is a debatable question upon which adverse parties are entitled to be heard.

[5] A bill, however, must have parties and bring before the court as parties all persons who have any interest in the subject-matter. The petition does not name any person as a party to it, nor pray that any person be made such a party. If the prayer for relief against J. B. Clark, as guardian, and the Silver Hill Oil Company, as lessee, could be regarded as a sufficient designation of them as parties, it would still be insufficient for omission of the ward, Gerald W. Townsend, who is vitally interested in the subject-matter. He is the real claimant of the rentals in question arising out of the lease executed on his behalf. Even though the paper contains a prayer for specific relief against the guardian and the lessee and a prayer for general relief, it cannot be treated or regarded as a bill in equity to which they are made parties. The requisites of a good bill as to parties are very clearly and learnedly stated by Judge Brannon in Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. 468. As defined by general equity practice unmodified by statute, they go far beyond the form and substance of this paper. It contains no prayer for process against anybody, nor does it name anybody as a defendant. Under the Virginia practice, it seems to have been necessary to name some person as defendant and require him to answer the bill. This paper makes no such demand upon the parties against whom relief is asked. Our statute (section 37, c. 125 [sec. 4791] of the Code) prescribes a simple form of bill and dispenses with some of the requirements as defined in ancient practice. Under it the parties may be named in the caption and the naming of a defendant therein suffices. The instrument need not contain any prayer that a person no named may be made a defendant and required to answer the bill. As to parties, a bill must follow the chancery practice in use before the enactment of this section, or the form prescribed by it. Cook v. Dorsey, cited. This paper does neither; wherefore it is insufficient to make anybody a party to it.

[8, 7] It is hardly necessary to observe further that nobody can be a party to a bill, even though sufficiently named in it, without process thereon against him, unless it be waived by an appearance. There is no pretense of any process against the infant whose rights are assailed by the bill. By their appearance to it and demurrer the guardian and lessee did not waive its insufficiency of designation of themselves as parties. Cook v. Dorsey, cited.

For the reasons stated, the demurrer was properly sustained, and this conclusion will be certified to the court below.

TROBIE v. RITER-CONLEY CO.
(No. 4298.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trial  $\S$ 359(1)—Special verdict will not overthrow general verdict unless findings are irreconcilably inconsistent.

A special verdict, made up of interrogatories and the answers of the jury thereto, will not overthrow a general verdict, unless such special findings are irreconcilably inconsistent with such general verdict, and clearly exclude every conclusion that will harmonize the special findings with the general verdict.

2. Master and servant  $\S$ 90, 297(2)—Special finding held not in conflict with general verdict; care required of master defined.

A special finding by a jury that the master, in the performance of certain work, has exercised that care which his foreman in charge of the work considers sufficient for his own protection, as well as for that of the other employes, is not in conflict with a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The due care required of the master is that care which a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the performance of the particular work, and not what any particular man pointed out by the defendant believes to be ordinary care.

3. Master and servant  $\S$ 278(4)—Negligence in doing work in charge of foreman question for jury.

The question whether or not the master has exercised due care towards his servants in the doing of a particular work in which they are engaged is ordinarily for the jury, and the fact that the jury may believe that the defendant's foreman in charge of the work exercised such care as he considered to be proper under the circumstances does not preclude a finding that the master was guilty of negligence in the performance of his duty in that regard.

4. Appeal and error  $\S$ 837(7)—Where the general charges pleaded were reduced to specific fact issues by evidence, evidence may be considered when interpreting an interrogatory.

While ordinarily, in the interpretation of a special verdict, made up of interrogatories and the jury's answers thereto, the court may look only to the pleadings, the general verdict, the special interrogatories, and the answers thereto, still where the pleadings are general in their nature, and the parties by the evidence introduced in the case have reduced these general charges to a specific and definite issue of fact, the court may, in interpreting an interrogatory, look to the evidence to determine exactly what the issue was between the parties upon the trial before the jury.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by Andrew Trobie against the Riter-Conley Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hubbard & Hubbard and Erskine, Palmer & Curl, all of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error.

J. Bernard Handlan, G. Alan Garden, and P. J. McGinley, all of Wheeling, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. This writ of error brings up for review a judgment of the circuit court of Ohio county in favor of the plaintiff for damages for a personal injury received by him while in defendant's employ.

The defendant, a contracting company, was engaged in making repairs to a furnace of the Wheeling Steel & Iron Company, and as part of the work it was necessary to remove from the furnace certain refuse matter which had accumulated at the bottom thereof. It appears that this matter had formed a solid mass, and before it could be removed it had to be broken up with charges of dynamite, and then the pieces raised out of the furnace and conveyed away. This matter is called in the record a salamander. At the time the accident happened to the plaintiff the salamander had been broken up and considerable thereof had been removed, and the defendant was engaged in removing the remainder. In doing this work blocks were fastened up in the furnace, and the pieces of the salamander being removed were raised by this means to the level of the ground surrounding the furnace, and then another rope, called an outhaul, was attached to the cable by which the salamander was suspended, and by means of blocks used in connection with the outhaul rope the salamander was pulled horizontally to a point without the furnace, and there dropped on the ground to be further removed by other means. On the occasion of the accident resulting in plaintiff's injury the piece of salamander being removed had been raised vertically to the desired height, and the outhaul rope had been attached to the appliances, which had theretofore engaged the salamander, by means of a large iron hook fastened in a block through which the outhaul rope operated, and the power had been applied at the other end of the outhaul rope, and the salamander had been pulled out about three feet from the vertical position, when the hook which fastened the outhaul apparatus to the cables supporting the salamander suddenly broke, and the block to which this hook was attached, being thus suddenly released from the strain upon it, flew with great violence against the plaintiff, striking him on the left side of the face, knocking out his left eye, and otherwise severely injuring him.

The plaintiff brought this suit, charging in his declaration that the defendant was negligent: First, in that it did not use ordinary care, diligence, and skill in doing the work; second, in that it did not provide reasonably safe, proper, and fit machinery and appliances; third, in that it did not reasonably and seasonably inspect the machinery, appliances, and instrumentalities; fourth, because it did not maintain the machinery and appliances in a fit and suitable condition for doing the work; fifth, because it subjected the machinery and appliances to a greater strain than they were suitable to withstand and resist; sixth, because it selected incompetent servants and employees for carrying on this work. Upon a trial a general verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,000, and the jury answered five certain interrogatories submitted to them, said interrogatories and the answers thereto being as follows:

"(1) Was the injury proximately caused by the breaking of the hook? Answer: Yes. (2) Did the foreman Drummond have reason to expect the breaking of the hook? Answer: No. (3) At the time of the accident was the plaintiff in as safe a position as the foreman Drummond? Answer: No. (4) Did the foreman take the same care to provide for the safety of the plaintiff as for his own safety? Answer: Yes. (5) Were the plaintiff's injuries proximately caused by reason of any incompetency on the part of the man at the niggerhead handling the outhauling rope? Answer: No."

The defendant moved the court to render judgment in its favor upon the special verdict, consisting of the interrogatories and the answers thereto, upon the ground that such answers were entirely inconsistent with the general verdict, and decided the issues involved in its favor; and, if this motion should be overruled, then that the verdict of the jury be set aside upon the ground that the court had misdirected the jury on motion of the plaintiff. The circuit court successively overruled each of these motions, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the general verdict.

[1] Upon this writ of error the defendant assigned as error the action of the court in refusing to render judgment in its favor upon the special verdict, and also the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict upon the ground of misdirection of the jury. Upon the hearing it has withdrawn the latter assignment of error, and desires to stand solely upon the contention that it is entitled to a judgment in its favor upon the special findings. It contends that the answers to the interrogatories decide every issue raised in the case in its favor, and are in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict. If this contention is correct, of course it is entitled to a judgment upon the special verdict, notwithstanding the general verdict.

[2, 3] The defendant insists that in considering the question whether or not the answers to the interrogatories are in conflict with the general verdict nothing but the pleadings, the special findings, and the general verdict may be looked to; and cites the case of Peninsular Land Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co., 35 W. Va. 666, 14 S. E. 237, to support this contention. The judge, delivering the opinion in that case, did make use of the language quoted by counsel, but it may not be susceptible of as literal interpretation as counsel would give it. However, suppose we consider the answers to the interrogatories in connection only with the declaration and the general verdict. The effect of the general verdict, of course, is to find that the defendant was guilty of negligence in some one or all of the particulars averred in the declaration, and that this negligence was the efficient cause of the plaintiff's injury. Do the answers to the interrogatories negative this view?

The first interrogatory is, "Was the injury proximately caused by the breaking of the hook?" to which the jury answered, "Yes." Of course, it is perfectly patent that this question and answer determined nothing of importance in this case. It is clear that when the jury stated that the breaking of the hook proximately caused the injury it meant no more than that the plaintiff's injury was occasioned by the hook breaking, which permitted the block to fly and hit him in the face. It did not and could not mean that the hook was the efficient cause of the injury. This language is not used in the question in the sense in which it is ordinarily used in the law of negligence. Every count in the declaration alleges that the plaintiff's injury was produced from a blow received by him from the block which was released by the breaking of the hook. The pertinent inquiry was, what caused the hook to break, and no special interrogatory propounds this question to the jury.

But the defendant urges that the answer to the second interrogatory is conclusive of every issue in its favor when read in connection with the answer to the first of such interrogatories. The second interrogatory is, "Did the foreman Drummond have reason to expect the breaking of the hook?" and the answer thereto is, "No." Looking to the pleadings alone, we cannot see just what relevancy the expectations of the foreman Drummond might have. The pleadings do not refer to him, nor does it appear therefrom how his conduct and expectations might in any way control the case in favor of the defendant. It may be assumed from the interrogatory that he was foreman of the defendant on the work, but whether in the full charge of it or not does not appear, except from the evidence, which counsel say we cannot look to. It must be borne in mind that the declaration charges negligence in several different particulars. It might be, so far as the pleadings are concerned, that the duty of an inspection of the appliances did not devolve upon foreman Drummond, or that the duty of controlling certain parts of the work did not devolve upon him, or that the duty of providing reasonably efficient means for doing the work did not devolve upon him; and, if his duties as a foreman did not include any or all of these things, then, of course, he would have a right to assume that they had been properly performed by the defendant, and would have no reason to contemplate an accident therefrom, unless he had actual knowledge that the party charged with the performance of them, or some of them, had been derelict in his duty. To understand the effect of this interrogatory it is necessary to look to the evidence. When we do this we find that foreman Drummond, referred to in the interrogatory, was in sole and exclusive charge of this work. He was charged with the duty or employing the men and seeing that the work was properly done, and proper appliances used for the doing of it, and these appliances properly and seasonably inspected. But even then, is the answer to the interrogatory inconsistent with the general verdict? We find, both from the pleadings and the evidence, that one of the principal grounds upon which the action is based is the alleged failure of the defendant to properly inspect the hook which broke prior to the accident. We also find that another basis for the action is that due care was not being used in the doing of the work, which lack of due care resulted in the breaking of the hook and the consequent injury to the plaintiff. We find upon further examination that there was a defect in this hook at the point where it broke, which some of the witnesses testify was observable from an examination of the hook before it broke, and even the witness which the defendant introduced for the purpose of showing that the defect was a latent one and undiscoverable, upon being shown the hook, testified that he was not able to say that a careful inspection of it before it broke would not have discovered the defect. Now Drummond says he did inspect all of the machinery on the 28th day of every month, except such of it as was actually in use at the time, and which could not be easily inspected, and that he also made some kind of an inspection or examination of each piece of machinery and each appliance at the time it was put in use, and that nothing was discovered wrong with this hook. This accident occurred on the 11th of December, so that the last general inspection before this time would have been on the 28th of November. Whether this particular hook was inspected at that time does not appear. Many of the appliances were at that time actually in use, and this hook may have been so in use at that time, and not have received any inspection then. Whether it was inspected at that time or not, it is apparent that there was a defect in it, and from the evidence the jury could very well find, in fact we may say that the weight of the evidence is to the effect, that a careful inspection of the hook would have disclosed the defect prior to the accident. The material question then is, was the hook subjected to that reasonable inspection which the law requires? The answer to the interrogatory finds that Drummond did not have reason to expect the hook to break, and it is argued that it necessarily follows from this answer that the hook had received the reasonable inspection required by the law. This does not follow at all. The most that can be said for this answer is that in Drummond's opinion he had submitted the hook to reasonable inspection, and from that inspection he had no reason to expect the breaking of the hook. But to make this conclusive of the issue involved would make Drummond's opinion of what was a reasonable inspection binding upon the jury. This is not the law. The answer to the interrogatory does not preclude the jury from finding that the hook was not reasonably inspected prior to the accident. All that can be said for this answer is that it finds that Drummond submitted the hook to such inspection as he thought was reasonable, but, when we take this in connection with the general verdict, the jury could have found, and may have found, that this inspection was not a reasonable and proper one.

Again, there is a contention that proper care was not exercised in doing the work, and this allegation is supported by evidence to show that the hook was fastened to the steel cable supporting the load by the tip end of the hook, thus throwing a very much greater strain upon the hook at the point at which it broke than would have been upon it had the hook been properly fastened to the cable. The jury may very well have found that this was not a reasonably careful way to do this work. Drummond did not know that the hook was attached to the rope in this manner, and, of course, not knowing it, he would have no reason to expect it to break from that cause. But, aside from the evidence, the answer would mean no more than that the work was being properly done in his opinion. It is quite apparent from what we have said that this interrogatory is entirely too narrow to cover either the case made by the pleadings or that made by the proof introduced in support of them, and that there is therefore no irreconcilable conflict between this special finding and the general verdict.

Interrogatory No. 3 is, "At the time of the accident was the plaintiff in as safe a position as the foreman Drummond?" to which the jury answered, "No." The fourth interrogatory is, "Did the foreman take the same care to provide for the safety of the plaintiff as for his own safety?" to which the jury gave an affirmative answer. The answers to these interrogatories conclude nothing. They are simply an attempt to substitute the care exercised by Drummond, the defendant's foreman, in doing this work for the care required by law. The test of due care is not what any particular man may think is due care, but what a reasonably prudent man believes to be due care under the particular circumstances, and these interrogatories assume, if they are to have any force in this case at all, that Drummond is the reasonably prudent man by whose conduct due care must be measured in the doing of the work. The very gist of the action is that the defendant, by its representative Drummond, was negligent, and for the court to assume that whatever Drummond did was done in the exercise of due care would be to deny the plaintiff's right to recover. This measure of due or ordinary care which is required to be exercised by the master must be determined in each particular case by the surrounding facts, and is such care as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise in the doing of the work under the conditions shown to have existed. Defendant by these interrogatories attempts to set Drummond up as this ordinarily prudent man. The ordinarily prudent man by whose conduct due care is to be measured in a particular case must be created by the jury trying the case where there is a question to go to the jury on this issue. Each member of the jury, of course, considers himself that ordinarily prudent man, and in their deliberations they evolve an artificial, composite personage made up or compounded of their respective ideas of what constitutes an ordinarily prudent person. Of course, in different cases before different juries, this composite person will vary because the composite opinion of any 12 men will not ordinarily be the same as such composite opinion of another 12. But experience teaches that this is perhaps the only practicable way to arrive at a standard from which to work. It has served a beneficent purpose thus far in the administration of the law, and we do not now conceive of any better standard by which to determine what is due care under a particular state of facts.

[4] The fifth and last interrogatory is, "Were the plaintiff's injuries proximately caused by reason of any incompetency on the part of the man at the niggerhead handling the outhauling rope?" to which the jury gave a negative answer. Looking to the pleadings alone, this interrogatory and this answer conclude no issue in the case. The pleadings show that the defendant employed a number of servants in doing this work, and that it was negligent in the selection of incompetent servants for the purpose, by reason of which negligence the hook broke and produced the injury complained of. This interrogatory limits the finding of the jury to one particular servant. So far as the pleadings are concerned, the jury may have found that all of the other servants employed by the defendant were incompetent, and that the defendant was negligent in their employment. The issue made by the evidence, however, is, so far as the employment of incompetent servants is concerned, confined to the particular man referred to in the interrogatory, so that, when we interpret this interrogatory in the light of the issue made by the evidence, it does conclude the question it was intended to settle, that is, that the defendant was not negligent in the employment of its servants, out, under the rule which the defendant lays down for our guidance in construing these interrogatories and the answers thereto, this special finding means nothing. We think, however, that the rule is a little too narrow. Where general allegations of negligence are made in the pleading, and these are met by a plea of not guilty, in construing the special finding of the jury upon the issue thus made we see no reason why, if the parties have narrowed the issue to a particular and distinct act of negligence, the court may not look to the evidence for the purpose of determining just what the issue was that the jury was called upon to decide. In reviewing the special interrogatories and the answers thereto, we have interpreted them in the light of the pleadings alone, and feel that they are not in conflict with the general verdict, and we have also considered them in the light of the evidence introduced in support of the issues, with a like result. The defendant, therefore, was not entitled to have a judgment in its favor upon the spe-dial verdict. Inasmuch as this is the only error now relied upon, the conclusion follows that the judgment complained of will be affirmed,

HASTINGS v. GUMP et al. (No. 4299.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Judgment  $\S$  184—Notice of motion for judgment serves both as process and pleading.

A notice of motion for judgment, given pursuant to sections 1-8, c. 121 (sections 4721-4728), of the Code, serves the double purpose of process and pleading.

2. Judgment  $\S$  184 — Notice of motion for judgment must state necessary facts.

The rule to view with indulgence such notice as a pleading will not excuse the pleader from stating facts necessary to show a good cause of action against defendant.

3. Bills and notes  $\S$  396—To render endorser liable requires presentment and notice in the manner specified.

To render an endorser liable on a negotiable note, it must be presented at the particular time and place specified therein and timely notice of its dishonor given the endorser, unless it is alleged and proven that he in some way waived such notice.

4. Bills and notes  $\S$  469—Notice of judgment against endorser failing to allege presentment, etc., is insufficient.

If such notice for judgment against an endorser fails to allege presentment thereof and notice of dishonor or waiver of such notice by him, the cause of action is not sufficiently pleaded, and a demurrer thereto or motion to quash on grounds going to the right of recovery should be sustained.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by Jerry J. Hastings against James F. Gump and others. Defendant Gump's motion to quash a notice for judgment against him as indorser on a note overruled, and he brings error. Judgment reversed, and motion to quash treated as a demurrer to the pleading, and the case remanded, with leave to plaintiff to amend.

T. S. Riley, of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error.

Neely & Lively, of Fairmont, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. The first question presented is whether the court below erred in overruling Gump's motion to quash the notice for judgment against him as endorser upon the note of N. F. Clark, payable to and endorsed by him to Hastings, for $925.12.

The ground of Gump's motion to quash went to the right of plaintiff to recover and not to the sufficiency of the notice as process to answer the complaint, in that it was not alleged that the note was on the day of maturity presented for payment at the Exchange Bank of Mannington, W. Va., and notice of its dishonor given him, or waiver by him of such notice, so as render him liable as endorser.

[1, 2] In our practice the notice of such motion, given pursuant to the provisions of sections 1-8, chapter 121 (sections 4721-4728) of the Code, serves the double purpose of process and declaration or pleading. Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Fields, 110 Va. 827, 67 S. E. 842. As process in this case the notice is not challenged; its substance is, and it is claimed it does not state a good cause of action against Gump, endorser on the note. It is contended, however, that the statute, intended to give a speedy and summary remedy, is to be viewed with indulgence, and that strict rules of pleading should not be applied. While this is true, the rule can not be carried to the extent of exempting the pleader from stating the facts necessary to show a good cause of action against the defendant. Shepherd v. Brown, 30 W. Va. 13, 21, 3 S. E. 186; Anderson v. Prince and others, 60 W. Va. 557, 55 S. E. 656, and cases cited; Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Fields, supra.

[3, 4] To render an endorser liable on such a note, the statute, sections 1-197, chapter 98A (sections 4172-4368) Code, requires presentment and notice of dishonor. Thompson v. Curry, 79 W. Va. 771, 91 S. E. 801; Russmell v. White Oak Stave Co., 80 W. Va. 400, 92 S. E. 672, L. R. A. 1917F, 453; Deming National Bank v. Baker, 83 W. Va. 429, 98 S. E. 438.

In the case at bar the notice does sufficiently connect the defendant Gump with the note, as endorser, and conditionally liable thereon. But his liability was only conditional, and depended on the due and proper presentment of the note at the time and place of payment, and notice to him of the dishonor thereof, or waiver of notice, which are not alleged, and the cause of action against him is inadequately pleaded. Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Fields, supra. It was so held also in Galbraith v. Shepard, 43 Wash. 698, 86 Pac. 1113.

We reverse the judgment; and the motion to quash, treated as a demurrer to the imperfect pleading, is sustained, and the case remanded, with leave to plaintiff to amend the pleading if so advised, with costs to plaintiff in error in this court.

NATIONAL METAL EDGE BOX CO. v. THE HUB. (No. 4189.)*(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Sept. 27, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Trial  $\S$ 359(1)—Special jury findings must be inconsistent with verdict to be controlling.

Special findings of a jury must be inconsistent with the verdict in order to be controlling, and such inconsistency must appear after excluding every reasonable conclusion that would authorize the verdict.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$ 837(7)—Under the condition of the record, held that the evidence will be considered to determine relevancy of special findings.

In assumpsit, where the declaration contains the common counts only, with bill of particulars filed, and defendant pleads the general issue without filing particular grounds of defense, and there is a verdict for plaintiff, accompanied by special findings relative to some controversy not fully ascertainable from the pleadings, the court will inspect and consider the evidence in order to ascertain the relevancy of such special findings, and to throw light upon their consistency or inconsistency with the verdict.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$ 837(7)—Evidence considered to determine whether there was a real conflict between special findings and verdict for plaintiff.

Where the verdict is for plaintiff in an action of assumpsit for pasteboard boxes sold and delivered, on which certain printing in brown ink was ordered, accompanied by a special finding that the printing was not done by plaintiff in a workmanlike manner for the purposes intended, such special finding is not necessarily in irreconcilable conflict with the verdict, as it does not preclude a waiver of inferior workmanship in the printing by the defendant; and where the pleadings do not specifically raise this issue, the court will consider the evidence in order to interpret the special finding, and ascertain if there be any real conflict with the verdict.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by the National Metal Edge Box Company against The Hub. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

James W. Ewing, G. Alan Garden, and J. Bernard Handlan, all of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error.

A. E. Bryant, of Wheeling, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. Judgment for plaintiff having been rendered on a verdict accompanied by answers to special interrogatories, defendant prosecutes this writ of error.

Plaintiff received an order from defendant for 11,000 pasteboard boxes to be used for the purpose of containing clothing and other merchandise in which defendant's customers could carry away purchases made by them. The order was for three sizes to be made of gray granite jute board (same material as defendant had for several years purchased from plaintiff) with certain printing, "printed top and bottom as had (formerly printed) with exception printed with brown ink in place of blue." The total price for this order amounted to $394.40, the amount for which this action was afterwards instituted. Defendant, for six or seven years prior to this order given in 1913, had been purchasing similar boxes from plaintiff, with the same printing thereon in blue, but having changed its other advertising matter to brown, desired the printing on these boxes to be of like color—hence the notation on the order, "printed with brown ink in place of blue." It is over this change in the color of the printing that this litigation arises. Upon the receipt of the first shipment of 6,150 boxes, defendant, The Hub, promptly wired plaintiff, the Box Company:

"Let us know what disposition you want us to make of boxes just received, they are printed in red in place of brown as ordered and we cannot use same. Answer at once."

This telegram was followed by a letter of the same import to the effect that the boxes were printed in red instead of brown as ordered; that the boxes would not be used for that reason, and asking for instructions to be given the transportation company to which the boxes had been returned. The box company immediately replied that it had followed the instructions contained in the order, and had used a printing ink known as Brown No. 2110x, prepared by Johnson & Co., ink manufacturers and dealers; that upon inquiry at their factory they found that 2,000 more of the boxes had been prepared and printed with the same ink, but that if The Hub wanted the remainder of the order printed in any other color of ink, the same would be promptly filled, and asking The Hub to reconsider and use those already sent, and those already cut and printed and at the factory. Considerable correspondence followed, The Hub insisting that the color of the printing was not what was wanted, and the box company insisting that the printing was in brown ink as ordered. Finally The Hub refused to take or pay for any of the boxes, placed the same order elsewhere at a less price, and invited litigation to test liability. The defendant, The Hub, in all this correspondence, placed the refusal solely upon the reason that the color was not what was ordered. No claim was made by it that the material used in the boxes or workmanship in the printing was not satisfactory. The claim of inferior material and unwork-manlike manner of printing was not made or attempted to be asserted until after the first trial in 1914, when the jury failed to agree. Action of assumpsit was promptly instituted, the declaration containing the common counts only, defendant asked for bill of particulars, which was furnished, the general issue of non assumpsit was pleaded, and the case went to trial in 1914, and the jury disagreed. The following year another trial was had on the same pleadings, and the jury disagreed. The following year this trial was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $190. Interrogatories were asked by the plaintiff and given to the jury and answered as follows:

"Question 1: Did the plaintiff, in furnishing the quality of material used in the boxes, substantially comply with the terms and conditions of the order?"

"Answer: Yes.

"Fred F. Cowl, Foreman.

"Question 2; Did the plaintiff, in printing the boxes in question, print them in a workmanlike manner for the purposes intended?"

"Answer: No.

"Fred F. Cowl, Foreman.

"Question 3: Did the plaintiff, in printing the boxes in question, use the ink whose color is classed as brown?"

"Answer: Yes.

"Fred F. Cowl, Foreman."

[1] Defendant moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the ground that the answer to question 2, being in the negative, was inconsistent with the general verdict and was controlling. The motion was overruled, and defendant excepted. Other motions, including one for new trial, were overruled and exceptions taken. Exceptions were also taken to the action of the court in giving and refusing to give instructions. These are all assigned as error, but none of them is pressed here in argument except assignment No. 4, relating to the refusal of the court to enter judgment for defendant, notwithstanding the general verdict, because of the answer to question 2, which is asserted to be controlling; and, under the well-known rule of this court, only that assignment of error will be considered; the others not being briefed or insisted upon in argument.

It may be stated here that the main controversy seems to have been over the color of the printing, quite a number of expert witnesses having been examined on each side, some testifying that the color was red, others maroon, and others brown. Samples of the printing were exhibited to the jury, which found that the ink used was of a color classed as brown. The order for the boxes required the printing to be "with brown ink in place of blue."

Defendant insists that in considering its fourth assignment of error this court should follow the dicta found in the opinion of Judge Holt in the case of Peninsular Land Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co., 35 W. Va. 666, 14 S. E. 237, which reads:

"Upon motion for judgment no question is entertained as to their inconsistency with the evidence, nor is the evidence considered, but only the pleadings, special findings, and general verdict."

It will be seen that Judge Holt took his epitome of the rules and proceedings, where special findings are sought, from Thompson on Trials, who bases his text upon certain decisions of the Indiana Supreme Court. It may be instructive to examine these decisions. They indicate that the evidence will not be reviewed, but, if from inspection of the pleadings, the special findings, and the verdict, it may be seen that any antagonism between the special findings and the verdict could have been removed by any legitimate evidence admissible under the issue, then the verdict will be upheld, and the apparent inconsistency repelled. They seem to consider evidence given, which might have been given. The tendency is to uphold the verdict upon any reasonable theory, or view that will harmonize the special finding therewith. We cannot see why the evidence cannot be inspected and considered if light may be given thereby, especially where the pleadings are general, and it is not clear therefrom what cause induced the special inquiry.

Murray v. Phillips, 59 Ind. 58, holds that where the special findings are not inconsistent with the general verdict then a motion for judgment on the special findings will not be sustained on the ground that the special findings are not in accord with the evidence. It is apparent that there would be no necessity or propriety in going to the evidence for any purpose; the special finding being in accord with the general verdict.

In Cox v. Ratcliffe, 105 Ind. 374, 5 N. E. 5, a suit for possession of land, the special findings were to the effect that plaintiff had legal title to the land, but that there was an agreement between the parties that defendant should have a reconveyance of the land if he paid to plaintiff the money he had paid out and expended. The general verdict was for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for judgment on the special findings, "and documentary evidence in the cause," which motion the court denied, holding that the special findings were not necessarily inconsistent with the general verdict. The defendant might have been lawfully entitled to the possession notwithstanding plaintiff's legal title as shown by the documentary evidence.

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Smith, 98 Ind. 42, the court held that in reviewing a ruling on motion for judgment upon answers to interrogatories notwithstanding the general verdict, the evidence could not be inspected, but in order that the answers must control and override the verdict, there must be between them an antagonism which could not be removed by any evidence admissible under the issue. While the court would not inspect the evidence, it would presume that evidence had gone to the jury sufficient to override any antagonism, if the antagonism was such as could have been removed by evidence. The court presumes that done which might have been done.

In Pittsburgh Clin. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Martin, 82 Ind. 476, it was held:

"In considering a motion for judgment on special findings, notwithstanding a general verdict, no reference can be had to the evidence given, but if by any conceivable evidence admissible under the issues the special findings can be reconciled with the general verdict, the motion should be denied."

The court further said (82 Ind. 480):

"The general verdict prevails over the special findings, if there could have been, under the issues, proof of supposable facts, not inconsistent with those specially found, sufficient to reconcile the general verdict with the special findings"—citing various authorities.

In Peninsular Land Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co., supra, the refusal of the lower court to permit certain interrogatories to go to the jury was under review, and Judge Holt held that, even if the questions had been answered in favor of the defendant, their apparent antagonism to the verdict could have been reconciled by evidence properly admitted under the issues. The suit was on an insurance policy, and interrogatories were asked and refused, which, if submitted and answered in the affirmative (favorably to defendant) would have found that notice of the loss was not given by the assured forthwith, and due diligence was not exercised in giving notice of loss; and that no reason existed for the delay in giving such notice. Notice of loss under the policy was vital to recovery. And the court said:

"But may not the general verdict say the giving of any notice or a more timely notice was waived by the defendant, if there was any evidence tending to show such waiver, and thus render such special finding immaterial?"

Another group of questions if given and answered most favorably to defendant was to the effect that the assured had not given a particular account of the loss within 30 days, nor a particular account within a reasonable time thereafter, and that there was no reason for such delay. Judge Holt held that such findings would not necessarily be inconsistent with the verdict, if there was any tendency of any evidence, reasonably and fairly considered, to show a waiver of these policy requirements. The issue on this group of questions was made up by plaintiff's pleading, wherein it specially replied and relied upon a waiver. Then the judge reviewed the testimony and found no evidence of a waiver, and concluded that this group of interrogatories should have been given, the pleadings having made an issue, a vital issue, of the matters covered by these interrogatories. In the very case where the dicta above quoted is found, the judge considered the evidence to see if the proposed interrogatories were pertinent.

[2] Is it necessary to look to the evidence in the case at bar? Can we say that the answer to interrogatory No. 2 is irreconcilably inconsistent with the verdict, and therefore controlling? We must remember that special findings only override the verdict when both cannot stand, and the antagonism must be apparent on the face of the record, beyond the possibility of being removed by any evidence legitimately admissible under the issue, before judgment can be rendered non obstante veredicto. 2 Thompson on Trials (2d Ed.) & 2691. In view of this salutary principle, can we say that this special finding that the plaintiff did not print the boxes in a workmanlike manner for the purposes intended is necessarily inconsistent with and controlling of the verdict under the issue? Could there have been a waiver by the defendant, either express or implied, of this deficiency in the workmanship in the printing? Let us consider this question of waiver.

"Strict compliance with the terms of a contract on the part of one party may be waived by the other either expressly or by acts or declarations indicating a relinquishment of the provisions of the contract." And "Where a party makes specific objections to the sufficiency of performance he is held to waive any other objections he may have." O. J., vol. 13, p. 694, title "Waiver of Defects."

[3] Any party to a contract for whose benefit anything thereunder is to be done may dispense with any part of it or circumstance in the mode of performance. 6 R. C. L. § 358. We think it well settled that a waiver of the benefit of any part of a contract may be made. Then if such waiver could have been shown, would the fact that the printing was not done in a workmanlike manner, as found by answer to interrogatory No. 2, be controlling of the verdict? It would not be, if we follow the rule laid down by the Indiana courts. The interrogatory could have been properly refused.

"Such judgment [on special findings] is enterable only when the special findings and the general verdict cannot be reconciled with each other, under any supposable facts provable under the issues." 15 R. C. L. p. 609, § 49.

Special findings will not control the verdict unless invincibly opposed to it. No presumptions will be allowed in their favor. 2 Thompson on Trials, § 2693. The Indiana rule would make it not necessary to look at the evidence. But the action is in assumption on the common counts with bill of particulars, to which defendant pleaded the general issue, which does not give any intimation of any special ground of defense, and the question of the workmanship in the printing is not sharply drawn by the pleadings; and we think, under such pleadings, that the evidence ought to be looked to in order to ascertain the relevancy and effect of such finding. We are not in accord with the holding of the Indiana court, especially where the pleadings are so general as to make it necessary to intelligently ascertain the issue or contention which inspired the interrogatory. And when we look to the evidence, as was done by Judge Holt in Peninsular Land Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co., supra, in order to ascertain if certain interrogatories should have been given, we find ample proof that defendant, in the inception, when the first shipment of boxes was delivered, made no objection to the workmanship in the printing, but repeatedly stated, as sole cause for refusal, that the printing was in red, and not in brown, as it intended to order, and the record shows that no claim or defense of defective workmanship was made until after the first trial in 1914, when the jury failed to agree. It was clearly a defense afterwards thought of to defeat recovery.

"Where a party gives a reason for his conduct and decision, touching anything involved in a controversy, he cannot, after litigation has begun, change his ground, and put his conduct upon another different consideration." Hixson Map Co. v. Nebraska Post Co., 5 Neb. Unoff. 388, 98 N. W. 872, citing Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258, 24 L. Ed. 693; Frenzer v. Dufrene, 58 Neb. 432, 78 N. W. 719; Ballou v. Sherwood, 32 Neb. 666, 49 N. W. 790, 50 N. W. 1131.

The same principle is announced in Bradley v. Cole, 6 Hun (N. Y.) 660; Olcese v. Mobile Fruit & Trading Co., 211 Ill. 539, 71 N. E. 1084. Moreover, similar boxes and similar printing (except in blue) had been furnished to defendant by plaintiff for about seven years prior to this delivery, without objection or question as to quality or printing, and the plaintiff was, under this order, which specifically stated "same as had," only required to deliver the boxes reasonably fit for the purposes for which they were to be used. So, it is a reasonable conclusion, warranted by the evidence, that although the jury, in response to the interrogatory, found that the workmanship in printing the boxes was not up to standard, yet the jury could find that plaintiff was not required to make them conform to any particular standard, or that defendant had waived this defect and his defense based thereon, and consequently the verdict should be for plaintiff. It is significant to note that, although the first shipment of 6,150 boxes and the 2,000 boxes made, printed and not delivered on account of refusal to accept, amounted to $283.20, the jury found in the sum of $190, which is $93.20 less than they might have found. Some reason existed for this reduction of the agreed purchase price. Hence, in the light of the evidence upon this issue of good workmanship, we cannot say that the reply to interrogatories is irreconcilable with the general verdict. The special finding must exclude every reasonable conclusion that will authorize a recovery on the verdict.

Further evidencing that the reply to interrogatory No. 2 is not irreconcilable with the verdict is the fact that by instruction No. 2, given to the jury on behalf of the defendant, the court told the jury that if plaintiff "did not print the boxes ordered by The Hub in brown ink, or did not print the same on granite gray jute board, or did not do such printing in a workmanlike manner, the defendant was justified in refusing the shipment when it was received, and is not obliged or bound to pay for the same." Evidently the jury found that plaintiff had done the printing in a workmanlike manner, sufficient under the circumstances, and for the purposes for which they were printed, or considered that defendant had waived that defect, if any, and found for plaintiff, and yet could consistently say with their verdict that the printing was not done in a workmanlike manner.

But it is insisted that because the court did not require specification of defense under section 46, chapter 130, Code (sec. 4903), and because plaintiff did not object to the evidence of defendant's witnesses on the question of good workmanship, when tendered, it made an issue and ought to be bound thereby. The answer to this contention is that plaintiff had, by its evidence to support its account for goods sold and delivered, showed that defendant had refused to accept the goods for the sole reason that the printing was red instead of brown, and as a legal consequence had thereby waived its after-discovered defense of bad workmanship. Until it was shown that defendant had not waived this defense, the question of inferior workmanship in the printing was immaterial, and any controversy or issue thereon was false, confusing, and improperly raised. It often occurs in the hurry and confusion of jury trials that irrelevant and improper evidence goes to the jury without objection, or without being perceived by the court. The defendant originated this false issue, but the jury, while responding to it, did not lose sight of the true issue, and rendered its verdict accordingly.

We hold that the special finding of the jury is not inconsistent and irreconcilable with the verdict, under the pleadings and evidence, and affirm the judgment entered on the 13th of May, 1920.

Affirmed.

(Nos. 4116, 4116-A.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 27, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Equity ⇨181—Notwithstanding return of commissioner's report and readiness for hearing, defendant in default may file answer.

Notwithstanding the return of a commissioner's report in a chancery cause and readiness of the cause for hearing thereon, a defendant in default may file his answer to the bill.

2. Equity ⇨371—Where answer is limited to collateral branch, proceeding may go to decree in main cause and matter in answer be continued.

If an answer so filed is not defensive of the main cause of action and is limited in its defense to a collateral branch thereof, susceptible of postponement without interference with or delay of a decree in the main cause, such decree may be entered and the matter arising upon the answer continued for a later hearing thereof.

3. Equity ⇨208—Answer to bill to enforce judgment lien impeaching claim of attorney's lien, held not a cross-bill requiring or authorizing special reply.

An answer to allegations in a bill for enforcement of a judgment lien, impeaching an asserted claim of an attorney's lien on such judgment and denying the existence thereof, responsive to such allegations and contradictory thereof, is not a cross-bill nor an answer in the nature thereof, requiring or authorizing a special reply thereto.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1039(11)—Decree passed on full hearing of evidence before commissioner will not be reversed for lack of a general replication.

A decree based upon a full and fair hearing upon evidence taken before a commissioner upon a proper reference will not be reversed for lack of a general replication to an answer.

5. Attorney and client ⇨182(2)—Attorney obtaining decree has lien on fund arising from its enforcement by another attorney.

An attorney by whom a judgment or decree has been obtained has an attorney's lien upon a fund arising from the enforcement of the lien of such judgment or decree against the land of the debtor, in a suit prosecuted for the plaintiff, by another attorney.

6. Infants ⇨116—Attorney may have lien upon decree for fee although creditor is an infant.

It is immaterial in such case that the creditor is an infant suing by his next friend.

7. Infants ⇨116—Attorney paying costs and expenses is subrogated to right of next friend to reimbursement, if acting in good faith.

A next friend incurring costs and expenses in the prosecution of a suit is entitled to reimbursement from the infant, and, in equity, the attorney paying such costs and expenses is subrogated to the right of the next friend against the infant, and may have a decree against the fund, for his services and such costs and expenses, provided the next friend has acted in good faith and with reasonable caution, in efforts to protect the interests of the infant.

8. Attorney and client ⇨186—Attorney's failure to obtain specific relief sought and taking alternative relief do not preclude his lien for fee.

Failure of an attorney to obtain the relief specifically sought in a suit in equity and necessity of his taking alternative relief, under the prayer for general relief, do not preclude right in him to a lien on the decree actually obtained.

9. Attorney and client ⇨184—An attorney has a prior lien on fund arising from enforcement of decree procured by a subsequently employed attorney unless expressly or impliedly assenting otherwise.

An attorney by whom a judgment or decree was obtained for his client has a lien upon a fund arising from enforcement of such judgment or decree against the land of the debtor, by another attorney employed by his client, prior and superior to the lien thereon of such subsequently employed attorney, unless he has expressly or impliedly assented to such subsequent employment or, in some way, relinquished his right further to represent his client in the matter, or, by negligence or other misconduct warranting his discharge, has lost it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Suit for enforcement of the lien of a decree by Tina V. Brown and others against Rule Edna Erwin and others, and from a decree in favor of the plaintiffs the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. W. Chapman, of West Union, for appellants.

J. V. Blair, J. V. Blair, Jr., and J. Ramsey, all of West Union, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. The subject-matter of the controversy brought up by this appeal is a claim of a lien for attorney's fees and expenses, upon a fund brought into the hands of the court below, through a sale of real estate by one of its special commissioners. Originally, it was a claim of a lien upon a decree obtained by one attorney, having the dignity, force, and effect of a judgment, and now upon a fund realized upon the decree by a sale of the property upon which it was a lien, in a subsequent suit prosecuted by another attorney, for some of the original plaintiffs, who also claims a lien upon part of it for his services.

This cause is predicated upon the result of the decision in Hansford v. Tate, 61 W. Va. 207, 56 S. E. 372, prosecuted for the plaintiffs by J. V. Blair, as attorney, and closely follows it in order. Its primary object, annulment of a judicial sale, on the ground of fraud in the procurement thereof, having failed in respect of the right of the purchaser and the decrees in the suit in which the sale had been made, Freeman v. Hansford, having been set aside only in so far as vacation thereof did not affect the title of the purchaser, Tate, a right to have restitution of the proceeds of the sale arose in favor of the plaintiffs, which the trial court and this court both recognized. That cause was disposed of in this court, January 15, 1907, but no further steps therein are here shown to have been taken until July 16, 1908. On that date, a personal decree was entered therein, in favor of the plaintiffs, against A. S. Hansford and Joseph Freeman; but, as it was disclosed that Hansford had received all of the money obtained by the sale of the land, it was provided that nothing should be collected from Freeman until after exhaustion of all of Hansford's property. This being a final decree, as to the liability of Hansford and Freeman, there were no doubt preliminary proceedings between the date of the remand of the cause and the entry thereof, which have not been brought up.

In the meantime, March 11, 1908, two of the plaintiffs, Tina V. Brown and Essie M. McDonald, are alleged to have entered into a contract with L. W. Chapman, an attorney, by which they employed him to collect any money due them from Freeman, Hansford, Harvey Smith, next friend in the suit against Tate and others, and J. V. Blair, an attorney in that suit, and obligated themselves to pay him one-half of any sum recovered. These two of the six original plaintiffs, all of whom were infants, thus separated themselves from the other four. At the date of this contract, Tina V. Brown had become of age and married one W. A. Brown. Essie M. McDonald, though still under age, was also married. In her deposition, taken before the commissioner to whom this cause was first referred, Tina V. Brown swore her husband had made this contract and signed her name to it without her knowledge or consent. He was also put into this suit as the next friend of Essie M. McDonald.

The object of this suit was enforcement of the lien of the decree for $1,730 against Freeman and Hansford, obtained by Blair for the Hansford children in their suit against Tate, Freeman, Hansford, and others, by way of restitution of the proceeds of the sale of their land, in the suit brought by Freeman against Hansford, as for enforcement of a vendor's lien, in pursuance of a fraudulent agreement between Hansford and Freeman. Tina V. Brown and Essie M. McDonald, the latter suing by her next friend, W. A. Brown, are the plaintiffs, and all the other beneficiaries of that decree, as well as Freeman, Hansford, Blair, and the Carter Oil Company are defendants. Upon sufficient allegations, the bill asserted a lien of the decree upon two small tracts of land owned by Hansford and sought enforcement thereof. In connection with this relief, it assailed Blair's claim of a lien upon that decree, charging that Blair had been employed by Harvey Smith as the next friend of the plaintiffs in the suit in which the decree was obtained, and had agreed to look to him for his fees and compensation, and had also assumed payment of the costs.

On a date not disclosed by the record, Blair interposed a demurrer to the bill. No other defense seems to have been made until after the cause was referred to a commissioner, for ascertainment and report of the facts usually requisite for a decree in such causes. The commissioner reported the lien of the decree upon said tracts of land and upon certain town lots in Harrison county, W. Va.; Blair having had abstracts thereof recorded in both Doddridge and Harrison counties. He also divided the lien among the six owners thereof, giving each $380.87, and allowed Chapman a lien against each of the interests of Tina V. Brown and Essie M. McDonald, for the sum of $190.43, as attorney's fees, by virtue of his alleged contract with them.

An order entered July 17, 1914, recited adjudication of Blair's lien, a second reference of the cause to another commissioner to ascertain the amount thereof, and omission of actual entry of such order, and directed the same to be entered nunc pro tunc, as of the last day of the March term, 1914. By the same order, the court sustained an objection to the filing of a special reply to Blair's answer, tendered by the plaintiffs, and rejected the same.

The commissioner's report was filed in the clerk's office of the court November 25, 1913. According to a recital in an order entered in the cause, J. V. Blair filed his answer to the bill December 1, 1913. After it was filed, the cause came on to be heard upon the report of the commissioner, and Blair then excepted to the report; but his exception was overruled and the report confirmed. By the same order, however, the matters arising upon his answer and petition were continued for consideration and determination after the sale of the real estate, so as to bring the fund into court. A decree of sale was then entered, in which Chapman was made the special commissioner to execute it.

Before the commissioner's report made on the second reference was returned, the real estate of Hansford was sold, the sale confirmed, and a deed made. The amount realized from the sale was $744. Though there is no order filing it, there appears in the printed record a petition of L. W. Chapman, claiming a lien in his favor, on this fund, for attorney's fees. He bases this claim upon the contract alleged to have been made between him and his clients. In this petition, he also attacks the lien claimed by Blair. The printed record discloses a paper signed by Chapman in his individual capacity and as special commissioner, purporting to be his answer to the answer filed by Blair. In that paper, he again sets up his claim and denies the validity of the claim of Blair and also attempts to interpose the statute of limitations to the latter claim. This petition seems to have been filed by the final decree, which says the cause came on to be heard upon it and other papers. Another paper printed in the record and not filed by any order purports to be an answer of Tina V. Brown, L. D. Griffin, administrator of Essie M. McDonald, who died pending this suit, and L. W. Chapman as special commissioner and in his own right, to the petition of Harvey Smith filed in this cause, for an allowance to him, for services rendered as next friend of the infant plaintiffs, in their suit against Tate and others.

[1, 2] The first, second, and third assignments of error are based upon the tardiness of Blair in the filing of his answer and his failure to make his defense before the commissioner and the effect of the confirmation of the first commissioner's report. Neither of them is tenable. A defendant may file his answer at any time before final decree. Code, c. 125, § 53; Ash v. Lynch, 72 W. Va. 238, 78 S. E. 365; Waggy v. Waggy, 77 W. Va. 144, 87 S. E. 178. This right in a defendant to delay the filing of his answer cannot be exercised in such manner as to postpone the hearing of a cause that has been matured in all respects by the plaintiff. In other words, if the plaintiff's case is fully made up in respect of proof as well as pleadings, so as to give him clear right to relief, the defendant cannot postpone the hearing to take his proof, by the filing of an answer as to which he is in default. Reference of a cause to a commissioner to report facts upon which a decree can be based is only a preliminary step in the preparation of the cause for hearing. It is not perceived how it can stand upon any footing different in legal status and effect from other preliminary proceedings. Hence it did not preclude right in Blair to file his answer. The continuance of the issue made by the answer, respecting the claim of a lien for attorney's fees, did not delay procedure in the main cause, the object of which was sale of Hansford's real estate, to bring the fund, on which the other liens are claimed into court. There was an immediate decree of sale and it was executed, pending the controversy over attorney's liens. This delay occurred in a purely collateral branch of the cause. Nor did the second reference to ascertain the amount of the Blair lien in any way delay the main cause. Confirmation of the first commissioner's report allowing Chapman a lien upon two of the interests was not an adjudication in his favor, beyond the power of the court to alter. The order of confirmation was interlocutory, and therefore subject to change and correction. There was no decree of payment or allowance in his favor, upon the report, after confirmation thereof.

[3] As the special replication to Blair's answer, tendered by the plaintiffs and rejected by the court, does not appear in the record as made up here, it is impossible, of course, to say whether it was good or bad. However, it may be safely said that the answer was not such as called for a special replication. In other words, it was not a cross-bill nor an answer setting up new matter and praying affirmative relief thereon. It was a purely defensive pleading. When the plaintiffs instituted this suit, the decree upon which it is predicated was before them and exhibited with their bill. That decree showed, by a recital therein, that Blair's claim of a lien for attorney's fees and expenses had already been asserted by motion in the original cause, based upon the record therein; and an attorney's charging lien is usually asserted in a summary and informal manner. Schmertz v. Hammond, 51 W. Va. 409, 41 S. E. 184; Renick v. Ludington, 16 W. Va. 378; 6 C. J. 794. Blair had his claim of a lien noted right in the decree and the cause was retained upon the docket for inquiry and adjudication respecting it. The bill in this cause made him a defendant, resisted his claim, and admitted that he had obtained the decree. His answer, therefore, introduced no new cause of action, nor any new matter, save the specification of the items of his demand. It denied allegations of the bill and particularly those relied upon to defeat his lien.

[4] The complaint of rejection of answers, petitions, and exhibits tendered by the appellants, is not sustained by any order of rejection, except in the instance of the special replication, and it is not here. As to the merits of the several claims and contentions, there was a full hearing before the commissioner, on the second reference. The decree does not rest upon any technical ground.

As has already been demonstrated, the decree in Blair's favor stands upon sufficient pleadings. The plaintiffs assailed his lien by allegations of their bill and he answered it. No further pleadings or parties were necessary.

[5] Barring something exceptional in the situation of the parties or the circumstances of the case, Blair's claim is clearly valid, even though not confessed by the lack of a general replication to his answer as suggested. If sufficiently denied, it has been proved. It falls exactly within the principles declared and applied in Fisher v. Mylius, 62 W. Va. 19, 57 S. E. 276. In that case, as in this, the lien was acquired by the plaintiff, through the services of one attorney, and enforced against the real estate of the debtor by the aid of another. Nevertheless, the lien on the fund in favor of the original attorney was sustained.

[6, 7] The contention of nonliability of the fund to a lien for attorney's fees, on the ground of the infancy of the clients, at the date of the rendition of the services, is altogether untenable. In the institution and the prosecution of the suit, they acted by their next friend who, of course, incurred personal liability for expenses, attorney's fees, and costs, but he was entitled to reimbursement for all such amounts as against them. In a court of equity, he can stand in the shoes of the next friend. In this instance, he paid all of the expenses, including costs; wherefore he is entitled to be subrogated to the right of the next friend and charge the interests of the plaintiffs in the fund, as their next friend could have done. In such cases, a court of equity always places the liability where it ultimately belongs. That a next friend is entitled to reimbursement from his ward cannot be successfully controverted. Voorhees v. Polhemus, 36 N. J. Eq. 456; Whitaker v. Marlair, 1 Cox, Ch. 285; Pearce v. Pearce, 9 Ves. 548. Nor does unsuccessful determination of a suit brought by him preclude his right to reimbursement for costs and expenses, if he has acted in good faith and with reasonable caution, in an effort to protect the interests of the infant. Voorhees v. Polhemus, cited; Taner v. Ivis, 2 Ves. Sr. 466; Cross v. Cross, 8 Beav. 455.

[8] Failure of the attorney representing the plaintiffs in the original suit, to obtain the relief specifically prayed for, vacation of the sale and recovery of the title, constitutes no impediment to his assertion of a lien upon the fund recovered in lieu of the land. It stands in the place of the land. Moreover, recovery thereof was within the prayer of the bill for general relief. In their enforcement of the decree for money, his clients have accepted the benefit of his services and cannot be permitted to reject the burden that, on legal as well as equitable principles, accompanies it. The answer admits contingency of the fee, owing to poverty of the clients and the hazard of expenses, but it does not admit nor show that the compensation was to be contingent upon recovery of the land. On the contrary, it sets up an agreement for compensation out of the property or proceeds thereof, and the decree was for its proceeds.

The statute of limitations, if sufficiently pleaded, and applicable, does not bar the lien. It was asserted, July 16, 1908, immediately on the termination of the service, and, with the exception of one item of $9, within five years from the date of payment of the costs and expenses. A reasonable and fair inference from all the facts and circumstances is that payment of this item and others, before recovery of the money sued for, was not contemplated by the parties. It was to be paid primarily out of the recovery, if any.

For the reasons stated, the demurrer to the answer, treated as an exception, was properly overruled.

[9] Nor was there any error in the allowance of priority to Blair's lien. Chapman prosecuted the suit that brought the actual money into court, it is true, but he was not acting for Blair in the rendition of that service. Blair obtains incidental benefit of the service, but he takes it involuntarily. It was service he would have performed himself, if permitted to do so. He had laid the basis for this suit and evidently was ready to go on with it when Chapman interposed his services, in preclusion of further proceedings by Blair. In doing so, he assailed and endeavored to defeat Blair's lien. Therefore the case does not fall within the rule of apportionment, applied in Fisher v. Mylius, cited. Chapman claims from his clients whose effort, if any, to avoid Blair's claim, is inequitable. Claiming under them, he is in no better position than they are. Being a party to their conduct in the premises, he falls within the rule inhibiting collusive settlements and other indirect methods of avoidance of attorneys' charging liens, asserted in Burkhart v. Scott, 69 W. Va. 694, 72 S. E. 784.

Seeing no error in the decree complained of, we will affirm it.

BROADWELL v. SMITH et al. (No. 2343.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trusts ¶35(1)—Plaintiff in execution, purchasing in behalf of defendant, a trustee.

It has been held: "A plaintiff in execution, who, at the instance of the defendant in execution in possession of land under a deed, bids off the land at a sheriff's sale, under a parol agreement with the defendant that he will buy in the land and take the sheriff's conveyance to himself for the benefit of the defendant, and allow the defendant to redeem the land upon the payment of the judgment (the value of the land exceeding the amount of the judgment), and who, while the bidding is in progress, discourages bidding by others by stating that he is bidding in behalf of the defendant, holds as trustee for the latter such title as he derives from the sheriff, and, on being paid or tendered in due time the amount of the judgment, with interest, may be compelled by decree to convey the premises to the defendant in execution by release or quitclaim deed." Also: "Whether the contract be such as is provable by parol, or is required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, it must be certain and unequivocal in all its essential terms, either within itself or by reference to some other agreement or matter, or it cannot be specifically enforced. The certainty required must extend to all the particulars essential to the enforcement of the contract." Dowling v. Doyle, 149 Ga. 727, 102 S. E. 27.

2. Vendor and purchaser ¶18(2, 3)—Time of essence of option agreement and renewal to be supported by valuable consideration.

Where the owner of land upon a valuable consideration grants an option to another to buy the land within a stated time, time is of the essence of the contract; and in order to raise a binding promise on the part of the optionor to sell, the optionee must make an election and offer to perform within the time stipulated in the option contract. Hughes v. Holliday, 149 Ga. 147, 99 S. E. 301. A subsequent agreement by the optionor to extend the time, whether made before or after the time limited for exercise of the original option, must be supported by a valuable consideration, as such agreement is in effect a new option. 27 R. C. L. 843, § 40, and cases cited.

3. Vendor and purchaser ¶18(2)—Time of essence of option agreement, and extension requires new consideration.

The basis of the plaintiff's case as alleged in the petition was a parol agreement by the attorney at law of the plaintiff in fi. fa. with the defendant in fi. fa., duly ratified by the plaintiff in fi. fa., that the latter should buy in the property for the benefit of the former and should give 12 months from the date of the sale, in which the property might be redeemed by the payment of the amount of the debt due the plaintiff in fi. fa., and that a few days before expiration of the term specified in the option agreement the plaintiff in fi. fa. verbally agreed with the defendant in fi. fa. to extend the time for exercise of the option to a specified date. On the trial no evidence was introduced tending to show acceptance of the option and offer to perform its conditions by the defendant in fi. fa. within the 12 months as therein specified. An effort was made to show acceptance and offer to perform the conditions of the option within the time specified in the alleged extended option. There was no evidence of any new consideration for the extended option. Referring to extension of the option, there was evidence that the option stated "a certain time" in which the optionee might redeem, but the evidence relied on to show the particular time in which to redeem was too vague and indefinite to form a basis for holding that the tender and offer to redeem was within the time so stipulated. Accordingly the judge did not err, under application of the principles of law announced in the preceding notes to the pleadings and evidence, in granting a nonsuit.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; W. E. H. Searcy, Judge.

Action by R. G. Broadwell against R. I. Smith, administratrix, and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. F. Gober, of Atlanta, and H. B. Moss and Mozley & Gann, all of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

Clay & Blair, Anderson & Roberts, and J. Z. Foster, all of Marietta, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., absent.

GEORGIA PERUVIAN OCHRE CO. v. CHEROKEE OCHRE CO. et al.
(No. 2163.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Boundaries ¶26—Party held entitled to proceed in equity to settle boundary dispute.

The petition as amended set forth a cause of action, and the court erred in dismissing the same on general demurrer.

2. Petition—Special demurrers.

The petition was not subject to any of the special demurrers urged.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Pleading ¶204(2)—Demurrer overruled if any part is sustainable.

A demurrer to a whole bill should be overruled if any part thereof is sustainable.

4. Pleading ¶193(2)—Petition for equitable relief not demurrable on ground of adequate remedy at law.

Since the passage of the Uniform Procedure Act of 1887 (Civ. Code 1910, § 5406) a petition praying for only ordinary equitable re-

Relief is not demurrable on ground that plaintiff has a complete and adequate remedy at law.

5. Boundaries ⚡26—Superinduced equity must exist to give equity jurisdiction of boundary dispute.

Generally a superinduced equity must exist between the plaintiff and the defendant to give equity jurisdiction of a boundary dispute, and an equity in favor of the plaintiff against other persons is not sufficient.

6. Boundaries ⚡26—Prevention of multiplicity ground of equitable jurisdiction.

The prevention of a multiplicity of suits is a ground of equitable jurisdiction which will give court of equity jurisdiction in a boundary dispute, in view of Civ. Code 1910, § 4538.

7. Boundaries ⚡26—Plaintiff held not to have adequate remedy at law in boundary dispute.

Where there was a boundary dispute between plaintiff and defendant owners of land, both tracts of which were leased to a mining company, which was paying plaintiff a royalty of $1 a ton and defendant a royalty of 35 cents a ton, and $1 for each ton of ore taken from the disputed territory was placed in bank to plaintiff's credit, but could not be withdrawn by him until the boundary dispute was settled, held, that plaintiff did not have an adequate remedy at law as against the mining company and defendant, and properly proceeded in equity to have the boundaries settled, and an accounting on the part of the mining company, and to recover the deposit in the bank.

8. Boundaries ⚡30—All interested in event properly made parties to bill in equity.

All persons who are directly or consequentially interested in the event of the suit are properly made parties to a bill in equity so as to prevent a multiplicity of suits by or against parties, at once or successively affected by the original case, and where plaintiff and defendant landowners had a boundary dispute, and where a mining company, leasing both properties and paying plaintiff a royalty of $1 per ton and defendant a royalty of 35 cents a ton, placed $1 a ton in bank to credit of plaintiff for ore taken from disputed strip, but not withdrawable by plaintiff until the boundary dispute was settled, the mining company was properly made an adverse party defendant by plaintiff in an action in equity to settle the boundary dispute, recover judgment for the deposit in the bank, and to have an accounting from the mining company.

9. Action ⚡50(10)—All of defendants need not be interested in all matters in suit.

A bill is not multifarious because all of defendants are not interested in all of the matters contained in the suit; it being sufficient if each party has an interest in some matter in the suit which is common to all, and that they be connected with the others.

10. Mines and minerals ⚡47—Surface and mineral owners own separate estates.

Where the ownership of the surface is in one person and the ownership of the minerals in another person, they each own a separate and distinct estate from the other.

11. Boundaries ⚡30—Surface owners of adjoining property not necessary parties in boundary controversy between mineral owners.

Surface owners of adjoining tracts of land are proper, but not indispensable, parties in a boundary dispute between owners of minerals in the respective tracts.

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Action by the Georgia Peruvian Ochre Company against the Cherokee Ochre Company and another. From a judgment dismissing its petition, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Georgia Peruvian Ochre Company filed a petition in Bartow superior court, naming the Cherokee Ochre Company and Thompson, Weinman & Co. as defendants. The petition as amended set forth substantially the following allegations: The plaintiff is the owner of the minerals upon land lot No. 531, and the Cherokee Ochre Company is the owner of the minerals upon land lot No. 478, the latter lot being adjacent to and immediately north of lot 531, and both being in the fourth district and third section of Bartow county. Thompson, Weinman & Co. hold a lease from the plaintiff which gives to them the right to extract the barytes ores from lot 531 at a royalty of $1 per ton. Thompson, Weinman & Co. also hold a lease from the other defendant, the Cherokee Ochre Company, which gives to them the right to extract the barytes ores from lot 478 (the adjoining lot immediately north of lot 531) at a royalty of 35 cents per ton. A dispute has arisen between the plaintiff and the Cherokee Ochre Company as to the location of the line which separates the two lots. The plaintiff and the Cherokee Ochre Company employed separate surveyors to run the true line, the plaintiff's surveyor locating the line north of the line located by the surveyor employed by the Cherokee Ochre Company, the two lines being 54 feet apart on the east and 76 feet apart on the west sides. The plaintiff contends for the northern and the Cherokee Ochre Company for the southern line as the true dividing boundary. The petition sets forth the bearings, monuments, and distances of the two lines, and these are also shown on the map made by plaintiff's surveyor, which is attached as an exhibit to the petition. Thompson, Weinman & Co. are extracting barytes from the disputed area. In the lease between plaintiff and Thompson, Weinman & Co. it is provided that in the event any barytes is mined by the lessee near a boundary line of the leased premises, and a dispute arises with any adjacent landowner as to the location of such a line, the lessee shall furnish to the lessor monthly reports of the barytes taken and shipped by them from the disputed area, and deposit the royalties thereon to the credit of the lessor in a named bank, "there to remain on deposit until it is determined to whom such royalties belong." In pursuance of this provision of their lease from plaintiff, Thompson, Weinman & Co. have deposited in a bank in Cartersville, to the credit of the plaintiff, the sum of $1,767, representing the royalties at the rate of $1 per ton on ore mined by Thompson, Weinman & Co. in the contested area to the date of the filing of the suit. This deposit, under the terms of the contract, is not subject to check by the plaintiff, but is to remain in bank "until it is determined to whom the same belongs." The Cherokee Ochre Company claims this sum of money, and royalties on all barytes that may be mined by Thompson, Weinman & Co. in the tract in question. Plaintiff and the Cherokee Ochre Company have been unable to agree upon the ownership of this sum of money, because of their disagreement as to the location of the true dividing line between their respective lots. The interests of Thompson, Weinman & Co. are adverse to those of the plaintiff, in that, if it should be determined by the court that the line contended for by the Cherokee Ochre Company is the true line, Thompson, Weinman & Co. will be called upon to pay to the Cherokee Ochre Company a royalty of only 35 cents per ton of barytes mined from the contested strip of land, instead of $1 per ton to the plaintiff as stipulated in the separate leases held by Thompson, Weinman & Co. from the respective owners of the minerals in the two lots. The amendment to the petition merely alleges that the case is a proper one for decision by an auditor, and asks that an auditor be appointed and the case submitted to him. The prayers of the petition are: (1) For a decree establishing the line as contended by the plaintiff; (2) that plaintiff recover the sum of money on deposit with the Cartersville bank, and all undeposited royalties that may have accrued on barytes mined by the lessees within the disputed area, and that plaintiff be declared to be entitled to the royalties on all barytes that may in the future be extracted from said area; (3) that an accounting be had from Thompson, Weinman & Co. as to all ores mined within the area up to the time of the trial; (4) that the court ascertain the true line, in the event it should be found that neither of those contended for is correct, and enter a decree accordingly; (5) in the event it should be ascertained that the true line is between the two disputed lines, that the court apportion the royalties between plaintiff and the Cherokee Ochre Company in accordance with the quantities of barytes mined above or below the true line and within the area in question; that to this end Thompson, Weinman & Co. be ordered to account for the tonnage mined by them from the different parcels of the disputed tract; that plaintiff recover from its lessees, at the stipulated rate, any undeposited royalties that may have accrued on barytes extracted south of the said intermediate line and within the said tract; (6) for general relief, and for process.

The defendants filed separate, but identical, demurrers, which were renewed, to the petition as amended. The grounds of the demurrer in substance were: (1) No cause of action is alleged; (2) plaintiff has an adequate and complete remedy at law, by processioning or ejectment; (3) the petition is multifarious, and sets up separate and distinct causes of action against separate and distinct persons; (4) there is a misjoinder of parties defendant, and a nonjoinder of the owners of the surface interests in the two lots; (5) the determination of the boundary line between the two lots will not alter the rights or duties of Thompson, Weinman & Co.; (6) it does not appear from the petition that the Cherokee Ochre Company has made any demand on plaintiff for any portion or all the fund alleged to be deposited in the Cartersville bank to the credit of the plaintiff, and that plaintiff "is in possession, through deposit," of the royalties taken from the tract in dispute; (7) the petition is vague and indefinite (in the respects pointed out in the demurrers); (8) there is no allegation as to the location of any intermediate line, and defendants cannot properly prepare to give evidence to the jury as to the true line, or anticipate what evidence relative to such possible line the plaintiff will produce at the trial; (9) there is no allegation showing any act or omission on the part of either of the defendants constituting a violation of any right of the plaintiff. The court by separate orders sustained each of the demurrers filed, and dismissed the petition. The plaintiff excepted.

Neel & Neel, of Cartersville, for plaintiff in error.

G. H. Aubrey and J. T. Norris, both of Cartersville, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. [1-3] "A demurrer * * * to the whole bill should be overruled if any part thereof be sustainable." Hudson v. Hudson, 119 Ga. 637, 46 S. E. 874. But it is insisted that the petition does not allege any act or omission on the part of either of the defendants constituting a violation of any right of the plaintiff, and that no judgment is prayed against either of the defendants, in that a declaratory judgment only is prayed. It appears that the lessee has deposited in bank to the credit of the plaintiff the sum of $1,767, representing the royalties at the rate of $1 per ton on ore mined by the lessee in the contested area to the date of the filing of the suit. The money thus deposited cannot be withdrawn by the plaintiff, is not subject to its check, and the plaintiff is losing the use of the money and the interest thereon. Under plaintiff's contract with its lessee the money on deposit is to remain in bank "until it is determined to whom the royalties belong." While the owner of lot No. 478 is not actively asserting any claim to the fund, it does assert that the ore was taken from its land, and that the money is its money. In the second prayer of the petition the plaintiff specifically prays for the recovery of the sum of money on deposit with the bank; and this must be construed as a prayer for judgment against the lessee, binding upon the Cherokee Ochre Company as the owner of the mineral interest in lot No. 478.

[4-7] Since the passage of the Uniform Procedure act of 1887 (Civil Code of 1910, § 5406) a petition praying for only ordinary equitable relief is not demurrable on the ground that the plaintiff has a complete and adequate remedy at law. Teasley v. Bradley, 110 Ga. 497 (4), 35 S. E. 782, 78 Am. St. Rep. 113. But we do not agree that the plaintiff has a complete and adequate remedy at law.

"Where the boundaries between two adjacent parcels of land, even when held by their respective owners under purely legal titles, have become confused or obscure, equity has, from an early period, exercised a jurisdiction to settle them. * * * Courts of equity will not interpose to ascertain boundaries, unless, in addition to a naked confusion of the controverted boundaries, there is suggested some peculiar equity which has arisen from the contract, situation, or relations of the parties." 4 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 1384.

See, also, 9 C. J. 266 et seq., and numerous cases cited in notes.

While generally a superinduced equity must exist between the plaintiff and the defendant, and an equity in favor of the plaintiff against other persons will not give jurisdiction (Steed v. Baker, 13 Grat. 380), sufficient equitable grounds exist, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, to give jurisdiction to the court of equity. The prevention of a multiplicity of suits is recognized as a ground of equitable jurisdiction in cases of this character. 9 C. J. 268, and cases cited in note 87; 4 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 1385, and cases cited in note 2. Our Civil Code (section 4538) provides:

"Equity will not take cognizance of a plain legal right, where an adequate and complete remedy is provided by law; but a mere privilege to a party to sue at law, or the existence of a common-law remedy not as complete or effectual as the equitable relief, shall not deprive equity of jurisdiction."

In Scott v. Scott, 33 Ga. 102, it was held:

"A demurrer to a bill on the ground that the complainant has a complete remedy at law ought not to be sustained, unless it appears that the complainant has a remedy at law that will secure his whole rights in a perfect manner, at the present time, and in the future."

[8, 9] In the circumstances of this case, as set up in the petition, the case is peculiarly one for equity. It does not follow that the settlement of the disputed boundary by an action at law—either by processioning or by ejectment—will secure the plaintiff's "whole rights in a perfect manner."

"All persons who are directly or consequentially interested in the event of the suit are properly made parties to a bill in equity, so as to prevent a multiplicity of suits by or against parties at once or successively affected by the original case." Blaisdell v. Bohr, 68 Ga. 56 (3).

The plaintiff prays not merely for the location of the true boundary line, for judgment for the money already deposited in bank, but for an accounting in the event an account should be necessary. Not only is the lessee a necessary party to the suit, if full, complete, and adequate relief is to be granted plaintiff, but the lessee is a proper party defendant. If the ore belongs to the plaintiff, the lessee is liable at the rate of $1 per ton; if the ore belongs to the Cherokee Ochre Company, the lessee is liable at the rate of 35 cents per ton. The lessee is therefore interested adversely to the plaintiff in the result of the suit.

"A bill is not multifarious because all of the defendants are not interested in all of the matters contained in the suit. It is sufficient if each party has an interest in some matter in the suit which is common to all, and that they are connected with the others." Brown v. Wilcox, 147 Ga. 546 (4), 94 S. E. 993.

It follows from what has been said that the petition was not subject to demurrer on the grounds that it set forth no cause of action, that plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law, that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant, or that the petition was multifarious.

[10, 11] Only one other ground of the special demurrer requires consideration. So far as the allegations of the petition disclose, the surface interest in both lots may be owned by the same party or by the respective owners of the mineral interests in the lots. If the surface owner be a person other than the persons owning the mineral interests, he has no interest in the mineral estate. Where the ownership of the surface is in one person and the ownership of the minerals in another person on the same tract, they each own a separate and distinct estate from the other. 1 Jones, Real Property, § 537. It is agreed that, if the surface interest in lot 531 is in one person and the surface interest in lot 478 is in another person, then and in that event the surface owners are proper parties to the action; but they are not indispensable parties. The surface owners are not directly interested in the minerals, and their interests would not be directly affected by a settlement of the dispute between the owners of the mineral interests. At least, so far as disclosed by the petition, the interest of the surface owners would not necessarily be affected by the granting of the relief sought in the action; and, considering the allegations of the petition, the surface owners are not necessary parties to the action. We conclude, therefore, that the court erred in dismissing the petition upon demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

ANDERSON v. AMERICAN NAT. BANK OF
MACON et al. (No. 2176.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Work and labor  $\Leftrightarrow$  30(2)—Whether there was an implied agreement by banks to pay plaintiff as member of liquidating committee held for jury.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County;
H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Action by W. T. Anderson against the American National Bank of Macon, Ga., and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hall, Grice & Bloch, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Jones, Park & Johnston and R. O. Jordan, all of Macon, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. This case was formerly before this court, when a judgment on demurrer to the original petition was reviewed. Anderson v. American National Bank of Macon, 149 Ga. 798, 102 S. E. 534. The petition contained two counts, and it was held that only the first count alleged a cause of action. Subsequently the case was tried on that count, and at the conclusion of evidence introduced by both sides the court directed a verdict for the defendants. The exception is to that judgment.

In so far as it related to count 1, the statement of the case made by this court was as follows:

"Commercial National Bank of Macon, being embarrassed financially, on August 1, 1914, decided to liquidate and wind up its banking business. To that end it entered into a contract with American National Bank of Macon, a copy of which is set forth in the opinion of the Court of Appeals, which opinion is brought here for review by a writ of certiorari, and it is unnecessary to set out this lengthy contract again. (For the sake of brevity the two banks will hereinafter be called the American Bank and the Commercial Bank.) Under that contract all the assets of the Commercial Bank were transferred and assigned to the American Bank, the transferee assuming the obligations of the other bank and agreeing to reduce the assets to cash. It was stipulated in the contract that the expense of realizing on the assets transferred and liquidating the business should be paid out of the proceeds of the assets transferred, that a sum equal to the liability assumed should be deducted from the proceeds, and that the American Bank should account to the stockholders of the Commercial Bank for any overplus that might remain. W. T. Anderson brought suit jointly against the American Bank and the Commercial Bank, for the recovery of an amount alleged to be due him for services rendered both banks as a member of the liquidating committee of the Commercial Bank in assisting the American Bank to reduce to cash assets which had been transferred and taken over by the American Bank under this contract. * * * In the first count, after stating the existence and execution of the contract between the two banks and making reference to a copy thereof attached, it is alleged that on the 1st day of August, 1914, all the assets of the Commercial Bank had been transferred to the American Bank, and that on the 11th day of August, 1914, contemporaneously with the agreement between the two banks, the stockholders of the Commercial National Bank, at the request of the American National Bank, adopted a resolution appointing plaintiff as one of the committee to assist the American National Bank in reducing to cash the assets which originally belonged to the Commercial National Bank, * * * but which had been transferred and taken over by the American National Bank; that petitioner did, from the 11th day of August, 1914, until the 27th day of September, 1917, in compliance with the provisions in said resolution, proceed to assist in liquidating the assets of the Commercial Bank; that he conferred from time to time with the American Bank as to notes, securities, and other choses in action which were transferred under the agreement, giving to this work his time and attention; that the reasonable value of plaintiff's services as set forth in the petition is $5,000 per annum; that under the agreement between the two banks all the assets of the Commercial Bank were assigned to and taken over by the American Bank; that the other bank on that date ceased to do a banking business; that the value of the assets transferred is approximately $1,000,000; that by reason of the facts set forth the American Bank is liable to the plaintiff as a creditor of the said Commercial Bank for the debt due to plaintiff as aforesaid by the Commercial Bank. * * * The prayers were for a judgment for the amount sued for, and for process."

Relatively to this count, it was said in the opinion:

"Under the allegations of the petition, the plaintiff rendered valuable services in the necessary work of liquidating the assets of the Commercial Bank. In the performance of the duties undertaken by him he rendered services to the American Bank, conferring with them as to notes, securities, and other choses in action which had been transferred by the Commercial Bank. These services were accepted by the American Bank. He had been named in a resolution appointing him as one of a committee to assist the American Bank in reducing the assets to cash. Services like these can properly be regarded and treated as a part of the expense incurred in realizing on the assets, which they were authorized to deduct from the proceeds of the assets. The contract under which these assets were transferred by the Commercial Bank to the American Bank contains the express provision that the latter bank accepted the appointment as liquidating agent of the other bank, and should proceed with all due diligence in the course of liquidation to collect and reduce to cash all of the assets, and that the actual expenses incurred by the American Bank in realizing on said assets should be deducted from the proceeds produced by realizing on said assets. The allegation that these services were of value to the American Bank is to be taken as true in passing upon the demurrer. The question as to whether the plaintiff could have sued on a quantum meruit against the American Bank alone for the value of his services is not involved, as the plaintiff has seen fit to sue both of them and to rely upon the contract and upon the value of the services rendered. We are of the opinion that the suit as brought is maintainable. The obligation of the American Bank to the Commercial Bank rests upon the express terms of this contract, and under the provisions of that contract the services of the plaintiff in the case were rendered and were accepted by the liquidating agent.

"It is insisted by counsel for the American Bank that, even if there was an undertaking entered into by that bank to pay for such services as those claimed to have been rendered, it was a promise and undertaking to the Commercial Bank, and that a party for whose benefit the promise was made could not maintain a suit at law, that he would be compelled to bring a suit in equity to obtain the benefit of the promise, and that the present action is one at law. Authorities are cited to support that contention. The proper reply to that contention seems to us to be that the present suit has all the necessary elements of an equitable petition to entitle the plaintiff to the only judgment which could be rendered; that is, a judgment for the value of his services. It is true that the prayers are merely for judgment and for process. What else would have been asked in the most formal equitable petition? The petition shows clearly the relation of the defendants to one another in this transaction, and shows the facts that were the basis of the plaintiff's right under the contract, treating it as one between the two banks. We think, therefore, that the general demurrer to the petition was properly overruled by the trial judge. And while his reason for doing so was placed upon the ground about which we differ, nevertheless the entire petition should not have been dismissed."

On the subsequent trial of the case the contract between the two banks was proved; and there was parol evidence tending to sustain the allegations of the petition, as to services rendered by the plaintiff to the banks, and as to the acceptance of such services by both banks and the value thereof. The plaintiff testified that his inducements to render the services sued for were two resolutions adopted by the Commercial Bank, August 11, 1914, and a proposal made to him by Mr. Taylor, the president of the American Bank. The minutes of the stockholders of the Commercial Bank were introduced, which showed that the proposal from Mr. Taylor was that the stockholders of the Commercial Bank should "appoint a committee to work with him, to actively handle with him the affairs of the Commercial National in liquidating its assets," and that, upon such proposal being reported at a stockholders' meeting by the plaintiff, the stockholders passed the following resolution:

"Whereas, the stockholders have passed a resolution appointing the American National Bank of Macon, Ga., liquidating agent of this bank as requested by the Comptroller of the United States:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved that this meeting appoint L. O. Benton, J. L. Lewis, Leon S. Dure, W. T. Anderson, and John J. McKay a special committee of five, who shall serve as a special stockholders' committee, representing the stockholders, whose duty it shall be to serve with the board of directors, and who shall be consulted before any final action is taken by the board of directors on all matters relating to the said liquidation by the said American National Bank. Compensation to be later determined by the board of directors."

The minutes of the directors of the Commercial Bank, dated August 12, 1914, were also introduced. A resolution showed:

"That the directors having heard the resolution of the stockholders, that they hereby instruct the committee of five, as follows: W. T. Anderson, Leon S. Dure, John F. Lewis, L. O. Benton, and John J. McKay—to proceed at once to conserve the interest of the stockholders in every way that they can."

The minutes of the stockholders of the Commercial Bank, dated September 30, 1914, were also introduced, which showed the following resolution:

"The committee of five stockholders of the Commercial National Bank of Macon, consisting of Leon S. Dure, W. T. Anderson, John F.

Lewis, John J. McKay, and L. O. Benton, be appointed to act with the directors of the said Commercial National Bank and with the American National Bank of Macon in liquidating the assets of said Commercial National Bank, and that the directors of said bank take no final action in the matter of liquidation, without consulting with said committee."

The further resolution at the same meeting provided:

"That a special committee of three stockholders be appointed by the chairman to investigate the duties of the stockholders' committee of five, and report at the January meeting to said stockholders their recommendations as to proper compensation."

The trial judge was of the opinion, that the resolutions above quoted did not sustain the allegations of the petition, and that the services rendered by him were rendered at the instance and request of the stockholders of the Commercial Bank, and, on the basis of such opinion, directed a verdict for the defendants. In rendering his decision the court stated:

"Upon a careful reading of the minutes of the stockholders of the Commercial National Bank and of the resolutions passed at the meetings of the stockholders, I have concluded that a fair and reasonable construction of these writings does not sustain the proposition that there ever was a contract between the two banks who are defendants in this case, authorizing the American National Bank to use the services of the plaintiff in reducing to cash the assets of the Commercial Bank. The resolution referred to in paragraph 3a of the declaration clearly does not so authorize, as the terms of the resolution, now in evidence, clearly does not, though this is the resolution upon which this suit as originally brought was predicated. The motion made and carried in the meeting of September 30th, taken and construed under all the circumstances, does not, upon a careful reading of all the minutes, justify, in my opinion, the inference that there was any intention to increase or add to the duties of the plaintiff as a member of the committee of five, or the committee itself, in regard to any of its duties material to this case, or contemplates any new or changed contract, or mutual relations of the two banks, with reference to this committee, or to each other. The Supreme Court places its opinion and ruling upon the allegation of paragraph 3a of the declaration. The relations of the two banks to one another in this transaction afforded the basis of the plaintiff's rights under the contract, treating it as one between the two banks. In the absence of an agreement or contract between the banks with reference to the position of this committee, it would seem to follow that the suit is not maintainable. The contract claimed in this case rests altogether on writings which are in evidence, and the court must construe these writings. I do not think they show such relations between the banks as afford a basis for this suit."

In reaching his decision the trial court unduly restricted the effect of the evidence. The action was upon a contract that was express as to the services to be rendered but implied so far as concerns the compensation. There was evidence tending to show a request for such services by both corporations, but no evidence of an agreement as to the amount of compensation to be paid. The resolutions by the corporation were material only in so far as they tended to show authority in plaintiff to render the services. They were sufficient for that purpose. There was evidence that both corporations accepted the services of the plaintiff in the collection of the assets of the Commercial Bank, and that such services were of some value. Giving effect to all such evidence, the jury would have been authorized to hold that either or both banks were bound, under the former decision of this court, to pay the reasonable value of plaintiff's services. The trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendants.

Judgment reversed.

GEORGIA RY. & POWER CO. et al. v. TOWN OF DECATUR.

SAME v. MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF COLLEGE PARK.

(No. 2334, 2359.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Carriers  $\S$ 12(9)—Judgment  $\S$ 744—Former decision binding as to validity of contract as to rates; no change of rates except by Railroad Commission, and no power to change, where there is a valid and subsisting contract.

Upon request of counsel for plaintiff in error the decision of this court in the case of Georgia Railway & Power Co. v. Railroad Commission of Georgia, 149 Ga. 1, 98 S. E. 696, 5 A. L. R. 1, has been reviewed, and after consideration of the ruling there made, it appears that the requisite number of the judges now presiding are not in favor of reversing the decision so reviewed, and therefore the ruling there made stands unchanged. This ruling controls adversely to the plaintiff in error the issues presented here. But the court is further of the opinion that, independently of the ruling made in the case referred to, the Georgia Railway & Power Company was without authority to fix the rate which the plaintiffs in the court below sought to have enjoined, and that consequently the court did not err in granting the interlocutory injunction.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton and John B. Hutcheson, Judges.

Actions by the Mayor, etc., of College Park and by the Town of Decatur, respectively, against the Georgia Railway & Power Company. From judgments, granting injunctions, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. Prince Webster, Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, and Colquitt & Conyers, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

A. C. Broom, of Atlanta, for defendant in error College Park.

L. J. Steele, of Decatur, and Frank Harwell and Green, Tilson & McKinney, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error town of Decatur.

WRIGHT, J. The differences arising between the parties in the case under consideration are based more upon legal contentions than upon disputed facts.

On April 1, 1903, the Georgia Railway & Electric Company, through its legally constituted officials, signed an agreement ratifying the terms of an ordinance passed by the town of Decatur on March 3, 1903, which ordinance provided, among other things, that the street railway company was—

"to never charge more than five cents for one fare upon its main Decatur line, referred to as the rapid transit line, for one passenger and one trip upon its regular cars from the terminus of said line in the city of Atlanta to the terminus of same in the town of Decatur, or from the terminus of same in the town of Decatur to the terminus of the same in the city of Atlanta."

This written agreement came about as the result of compromise between the parties, growing out of litigation, through which the town of Decatur sought to enjoin the Georgia Railway & Electric Company from tearing up and removing the line of the Atlanta Railroad Company in the town of Decatur. The written agreement embodied the consent of the municipality to the removal and discontinuance of the line of the Atlanta Railroad Company, with the stipulation as to fare just quoted. Under this written agreement both parties acted without differences until some time in the year 1918, when the Georgia Railway & Power Company (the lessee of the Georgia Railway & Electric Company) petitioned the Railroad Commission to grant an increase of fare over their main Decatur line. This application was rejected by the Railroad Commission, which held that it was without jurisdiction to grant the increase of fare, under the proviso of the act of August 23, 1907, which prohibited them from interfering with existing rates where there was a valid, subsisting contract. On August 23, 1918, the Georgia Railway & Power Company sought a mandamus to compel the Railroad Commission to take jurisdiction and to act upon the application for an increased rate over the electric line in question. This application was based upon an attack on the validity of the contract between the town of Decatur and the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. This court upheld the judgment of the lower court denying the mandamus absolute, which was an adjudication that the Railroad Commission was without jurisdiction because of a valid, subsisting contract between the parties, to wit, the contract of April 1, 1903.

On October 5, 1920, the Georgia Railway & Power Company and the Georgia Railway & Electric Company notified the town of Decatur that on or after October 20, 1920, the fare on the main or north Decatur line would be seven cents and that they denied the legality and validity of the so-called contract provision limiting the fare to five cents (set out in the ordinance of the town of Decatur March 3, 1903, and an agreement of April 1, 1903, signed by the town of Decatur and the Georgia Railway & Electric Company). Just prior to the threatened raise in rates the town of Decatur brought the case now under review, denying the right of the power company and the electric company thus to abrogate the contract of April 1, 1903, setting forth in their petition in detail the facts above stated. The defendant companies in their answer and cross-bill denied the validity of the contract of April 1, 1903, upon numerous grounds, and prayed that it be declared null and void, and that all parties be enjoined and restrained from interfering with it in fixing the rate of seven cents, or any other just and nondiscriminatory rate, upon the Decatur line. After granting a temporary restraining order, the judge of the superior court, on December 4, 1920, continued the same of force, and granted the injunction as prayed in favor of plaintiffs and against the defendants. It is to this ruling of the court that exception is taken.

We are of the opinion that the presiding judge was right in granting the injunction as prayed. Under our law the rate of fare upon this and every electric railway company within the state must be fixed by the Railroad Commission, unless there is a valid, subsisting contract made prior to the act of August 23, 1907. The right to fix rates on electric railway companies' lines is contained in the amendatory act of August 23, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 72), which carries into effect the provision of the Constitution (article 4, § 2, par. 1). Under the act of August 23, 1907, it is provided:

"The powers and duties heretofore conferred by law upon the Railroad Commission are hereby extended and enlarged, so that its authority and control shall extend to street railroads and street railroad corporations, companies or persons owning, leasing or operating street railroads in this state: Provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed to impair any valid, subsisting contract now in existence between any municipality and any such company."

The effect of the constitutional provision and the legislative enactments carrying it into effect was clearly to cover the entire scheme of rate-fixing. If there existed on August 23, 1907, a valid, subsisting contract, which fixed the rate, it was conclusive, and neither the Railroad Commission nor either party to the contract can change or alter it. If there was a void contract for any of the numerous reasons urged by plaintiffs in error, then it was not a valid, subsisting contract, and the Railroad Commission only could and should fix a change in the rate.

In the instant case the power company is assuming to do what the Railroad Commission refused to do, and what this court has held they were right in not doing, to wit, declare the contract of April 1, 1903, void. Not only this, but the plaintiffs in error are asking this court to now declare the contract void and enjoin all parties from interfering with the power company in fixing a fare of seven cents, or any other just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory rate over the line in question. If this is a void contract, the Railroad Commission alone has the right to change the fare; if it is a valid, subsisting contract, the power company is bound by it. Plaintiffs in error are met at the very threshold with the question of their right to declare void this contract of 1903; but, should we grant to them the right to do so, they are met with what appears to be an unanswerable objection, that the power company has no right to alter, change, or fix a rate differing from the existing rate under which it has been operating their line of railroad since 1903. This power is reserved alone by the Constitution to the state, and by legislative enactment is placed in the hands of the Railroad Commission.

It is insisted that where the governmental authority fails to exercise its power to control, and where no contract exists, the company has the right to fix its own fares, provided they are just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory. Granting this to be true, it is plain that such condition does not exist. The state of Georgia, in the amendatory act of 1907 referred to, clearly exercised this authority to regulate; and it is no answer to say that an appeal has already been made to the Railroad Commission, and that it has refused for want of jurisdiction. The Railroad Commission disclaimed jurisdiction, not because they were without power to fix rates for electric railroad companies, but because in the case they had under review they were deprived of that right by the existence of a valid, subsisting contract. Whatever conclusion might be reached as to the validity of the contract of April 1, 1903, it would not affect the conclusion that the power company is without authority to change or fix rates on its electric lines, and this is exactly what it attempts to do, and what the trial court has enjoined it from doing in the instant case.

But the ruling of this court in the case of Georgia Railway & Power Company v. Railroad Commission, 149 Ga. 1, 98 S. E. 696, 5 A. L. R. 1, if unreversed, is conclusive on the issue involved in the instant case. In that case Justice Beck, rendering the decision, said:

"Under the provisos contained in the fifth section of the act approved August 23, 1907, embodied in Civil Code, § 2662, the Railroad Commission of this state is without authority to exercise the powers conferred and extended by that act, so as to determine or fix fares upon lines of street railroads within the limits of any town or city between which and the street railroad company operating such lines there was a valid, subsisting contract at the time of the passing of the act. There was such a contract between the city of College Park and the Georgia Railway & Power Company, and between that company and the town of Decatur as to one line running from Decatur to Atlanta. * * * Those contracts were in existence on the 23d day of August, 1907, and are still subsisting contracts. As we decided in the first part of this opinion, these contracts are not invalid, but are valid and subsisting contracts, and were valid and subsisting contracts on the 23d day of August, 1907."

This decision clearly settles the question that at the time of the execution of this contract both the Georgia Railway & Electric Company and the town of Decatur had authority to execute the contract of April 1, 1903.

Mr. Justice White, in the case of Southern Iowa Electric Co. v. City of Chariton, 255 U. S. 539, 41 Sup. Ct. 400, 65 L. Ed. —, decided April 11, 1921, held:

"Where, however, the public service corporations and the governmental agencies dealing with them have power to contract as to rates, and exert that power by fixing by contract rates to govern during a particular time, the enforcement of such rates is controlled by the obligation resulting from the contract, and therefore the question of whether such rates are confiscatory becomes immaterial"—citing Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport, 180 U. S. 587, 593, 21 Sup. Ct. 493, 45 L. Ed. 679, 686; Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co., 184 U. S. 368, 22 Sup. Ct. 410, 46 L. Ed. 592; Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 189 U. S. 434, 437, 23 Sup. Ct. 531, 47 L. Ed. 887; Cleveland v. Cleveland City R. Co., 194 U. S. 519, 24 Sup. Ct. 758, 48 L. Ed. 1103; Home Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 265, 273, 29 Sup. Ct. 50, 53 L. Ed. 176, 182; Minneapolis v. Minneapolis Street R. Co., 215 U. S. 417, 30 Sup. Ct. 118, 54 L. Ed.

We have been asked to review and reverse the decision in the case of Georgia Railway & Power Company v. Railroad Commission of Georgia, 149 Ga. 1, 98 S. E. 696, 5 A. L. R. 1; but, upon review the requisite number of the judges now presiding are not in favor of reversing the decision so reviewed, and therefore the ruling there made stands unchanged. And the court is further of the opinion that, independently of this ruling as to the case which we are asked to review, the Georgia Railway & Power Company was without authority to fix the rate which the plaintiffs in the court below sought to enjoin, and consequently the court did not err in granting the interlocutory injunction.

What is said as to the case of Georgia Railway & Power Company v. Town of Decatur is also controlling in the case of Georgia Railway & Power Company v. College Park.

Judgments affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

GILBERT and GEORGE, JJ., concur in the judgment affirming the grant of the interlocutory injunction, and specially as to the ruling that the contracts between the municipalities and the street railway company as to fares are valid, because bound by the decision in Georgia Railway & Power Co. v. Railroad Commission of Georgia, 149 Ga. 1, 98 S. E. 696, 5 A. L. R. 1.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. JONES.
(No. 2250.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading ¶248(12)—Amendment of pleading held to add new cause of action.

This was an action by an employee of a railway company as a common carrier by railroad to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the defendant's service. The petition contained no allegation showing whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover under the state law or the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665). Pending the action the plaintiff died. His widow, who was appointed administratrix upon his estate, was duly made a party plaintiff to the pending suit. Held, that an amendment by the personal representative of the deceased employee, alleging a cause of action under the federal Employers' Liability Act for damages for the pecuniary loss to the designated beneficiaries by the death of the employee, added a new and distinct cause of action, a cause of action not in existence while the employee lived, and its allowance was therefore contrary to state practice, in view of the Civil Code of 1910, § 5683, which declares that "no amendment adding a new and distinct cause of action * * * shall be allowed, unless expressly provided for by law."

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Pleading ¶248(12)—Personal representatives could amend petition for personal injuries.

Assuming that pending action by employee of railway company for personal injuries did not abate by the death of the employee, the declaration might have been amended by his personal representative by alleging that the employee at the time he received the injuries was engaged in interstate commerce, and damages could be claimed for the personal loss and suffering of the employee while he lived for the benefit of relatives, under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665).

3. States ¶4—States cannot take away substantive right given by Congress.

When an act of Congress in regard to a subject within its domain creates a right on condition, compliance with the condition is essential, and a state under the guise of procedure cannot take away or affect such right, but Congress has no power to regulate matters of procedure in state courts.

4. States ¶4—Congress adopts rules of procedure in state when creating right.

When Congress creates a right and confers jurisdiction on the courts of the state to enforce the right, it adopts the prevailing rules of procedure in the state.

Questions Certified by Court of Appeals.

Action by E. L. Jones, administratrix, against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified questions. Questions answered.

See, also, 24 Ga. App. 532, 101 S. E. 710.

Jordan & Moore, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Emmett Houser, of Ft. Valley, and T. S. Felder, of Macon, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. The Court of Appeals certified to this court the following questions:

"(1) Where a suit brought against a railroad company by an employee to recover damages for personal injuries received by him while employed by the defendant, in which there is no allegation showing whether he was entitled to recover under the state statute or the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), has, under the state statute, by his death, survived to his administratrix, and where the administratrix, who is his widow, has been properly made a party plaintiff to the suit, is the petition subject to amendment by the administratrix, as the personal representative of the deceased employee, where the amendment alleges a right of action under the federal Employers' Liability Act, surviving to the administratrix, as the personal representative of the deceased employee, for the benefit of the beneficiaries named in the act, and where it also alleges a right of action under the act in the administratrix, as the personal representative of the deceased employee, for the pecuniary loss resulting to the beneficiaries named in the act on account of his death?

"(2) Was such an amendment properly allowed over the following objections offered by the defendant (see page 23 of the record): (1) Because the suit brought by the deceased during his lifetime is not amendable by setting up therein or grafting thereon a suit for the right of action given by the statute (the federal Employers' Liability Act) for the pecuniary loss to the widow and children of the said deceased caused by his death; (2) because the amendment attempts to set up a new, separate, and independent cause of action; (3) because the cause of action attempted to be declared on by the said amendment did not exist at the time the original suit was brought by the deceased, and cannot be grafted on the original suit by amendment?"

[1, 2] We are advised by the Court of Appeals that this was an action by an employee of a railway company, as a common carrier, by railroad, to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the defendant's service. The petition contained no allegation showing whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover under the state statute or the federal Employers' Liability Act. Pending the action the plaintiff died. His widow, who was appointed as administratrix on his estate, was "properly made a party plaintiff to the suit." The questions make no direct reference to the former decision of the Court of Appeals in this case, when the judgment overruling the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition as amended was reviewed and affirmed by that court. Central of Georgia Railway Co. v. Jones, 24 Ga. App. 532, 101 S. E. 710. Nevertheless it was there ruled that—

"Whether the instant case was an action under the state law or under the federal 'Employer's Liability Act,' it did not abate upon the death of the plaintiff, but survived to his personal representative. (a) Under the state law it did not abate. Civil Code 1910, §§ 4421, 5617. (b) Under the federal Employers' Liability Act, as amended April 5, 1910, it did not abate. 36 Stat. 291 (8 Fed. Stat. Ann. [2d Ed.] 1378; U. S. Comp. Stat. § 8635); U. S. Rev. Stat. § 955 (6 Fed. Stat. Ann. [2d Ed.] 111, and cases cited; U. S. Comp. Stat. § 1592)."

The decision of the Court of Appeals in this case is of course the law of the case. Conceding, as we must, that the "right of action" given by the federal Employers' Liability Act to the employee suffering the injury survived to his personal representative for the benefit of the relatives named in the act, under the amendment of April 5, 1910 (36 Stat. 291), and assuming also that the pending action itself did not abate by the death of the employee, as held by the Court of Appeals in this case, we are of the opinion that the declaration might have been amended by the personal representative after she had been made a party to the pending suit, by alleging that the employee at the time he received the injuries complained of was engaged in interstate commerce, and that his injuries were received by the negligence of the defendant's servants so engaged, and claiming damages for the personal loss and suffering of the employee while he lived, for the benefit of the relatives named in the act. Upon this point the question is in principle controlled by the decision of this court in Gainesville Midland Railway v. Vandiver, 141 Ga. 350 (2), 80 S. E. 997, where it was ruled:

"In an action for damages against a railroad company for personal injuries to an employee, where the petition sets forth the relation between the injured person and the railroad company, and describes the circumstances under which the injury occurs, making out a case of negligence upon the part of the defendant, but contains no allegation that the defendant was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury, the petition is amendable by setting forth allegations to that effect."

See, also, Missouri, etc., Ry. v. Wulf, 226 U. S. 570, 576, 33 Sup. Ct. 135, 57 L. Ed. 355, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 134; S. A. L. Ry. v. Koennecke, 239 U. S. 352, 38 Sup. Ct. 126, 60 L. Ed. 324.

But the amendment also alleged a right of action, under the federal act, in the personal representative of the deceased employee, for the pecuniary loss resulting to the beneficiaries named in the act on account of the death of the employee. We must therefore determine whether the amendment as offered was subject to the objections urged. The first section of the original act (35 Stat. 65; 8 Fed. Stat. Ann. 1208) provides for—

"two distinct rights of action based upon altogether different principles, although primarily resting upon the same wrongful act or neglect. It invests the injured employee with a right to such damages as will compensate him for his personal loss and suffering—a right which arises only where his injuries are not immediately fatal. And where his injuries prove fatal, either immediately or subsequently (Michigan Central R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 68, 57 L. Ed. 421, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Clarke, 162 U. S. 230, 238, 38 L. Ed. 422, 424, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 579), it invests his personal representative, as a trustee for designated relatives, with a right to such damages as will compensate the latter for any pecuniary loss which they sustained by the death." St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Craft, 237 U. S. 648, 35 Sup. Ct. 704, 59 L. Ed. 1160.

The original act made no provision for the survival of the right of action to the injured person, and under the operation of the rule of the common law the right of action died with him. On April 5, 1910, the act was amended by adding the following section, as section 9:

"That any right of action given by this act to a person suffering injury shall survive to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, but in such cases there shall be only one recovery for the same injury." 36 Stat. 291; 8 Fed. Stat. Ann. 1378.

In Taylor v. Taylor, 232 U. S. 363, 34 Sup. Ct. 350, 58 L. Ed. 638, it was held that the amendment of April 5, 1910, made no change in section one of the original act. In so far as the amendment alleged a right of action in the personal representative of the deceased for the pecuniary loss resulting to the beneficiaries named in the act, on account of his death, a new and distinct cause of action was added, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. See Spradlin v. Ga. Ry., etc., Co., 139 Ga. 575, 77 S. E. 799; Dayhuff v. Brown, 150 Ga. 291, 103 S. E. 458. Civil Code 1910, § 5683, declares that—

"No amendment adding a new and distinct cause of action * * * shall be allowed unless expressly provided for by law."

It is said, however, that the meaning of section 9 of the federal act (brought into the act by the amendment of April 5, 1910) is that damages for the deceased's personal loss and suffering and for the pecuniary loss to the designated beneficiaries by the death not only may be recovered by the personal representative of the deceased in one action, but must be recovered in one action only, if at all. The ninth section of the act is so interpreted and construed in St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Craft, 237 U. S. 648, 35 Sup. Ct. 704, 59 L. Ed. 1160. In Mondou v. New York, etc., R. Co., 223 U. S. 1, 32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 44, it was held that Congress—

"may, in the execution of its power over interstate commerce, regulate the relations of common carriers by railroad and their employees while both are engaged in such commerce. * * * Those regulations [referring to the Employers' Liability Act] have superseded the laws of the several states in so far as the latter covered the same field. Rights arising under the regulations prescribed by the act may be enforced, as of right, in the courts of the states, when their jurisdiction, as fixed by local laws, is adequate to the occasion."

It is suggested that the policy declared by Congress supersedes the declared policy of the state not only in matter of substance, but in manner of procedure also, where, as in this instance, the act of Congress granting the right prescribes the mode of procedure. The language of Mr. Justice Van Devanter in Mondou v. New York, etc., R. Co., 223 U. S. 1, 32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 44 (construing section 6 of the federal act, also brought into original act by the amendment of April 5, 1910), is pertinent:

"We deem it well to observe that there is not here involved any attempt by Congress to enlarge or regulate the jurisdiction of state courts or to control or affect their modes of procedure, but only a question of the duty of such a court, when its ordinary jurisdiction as prescribed by local laws is appropriate to the occasion and is invoked in conformity with those laws, to take cognizance of an action to enforce a right of civil recovery arising under the act of Congress and susceptible of adjudication according to the prevailing rules of procedure."

[3] It is agreed that the federal act insures uniformity of substantive law in every court and in every state in which an action thereunder may be brought. Reed v. Ill. Cent. R. Co., 182 Ky. 455, 206 S. W. 794; Landrum v. W. & A. R. Co., 146 Ga. 88 (1), 90 S. E. 710. It is also agreed that, when an act of Congress in regard to a subject within the domain of Congress creates a right upon condition, compliance with the condition is essential, and that the state, under the guise of procedure, cannot take away or affect a substantive right created by Congress. The application of state rules of procedure and practice, under the peculiar facts of this case, will result in some inconvenience. Nevertheless we are of the opinion that no substantive right or defense under the federal act will be affected by a proper application of the rules of procedure prevailing in this state. We are clear, however, that Congress not only did not attempt to regulate matters of procedure in the state court, but that it had no power to do so. Small v. Slocumb, 112 Ga. 279, 37 S. E. 481, 53 L. R. A. 130, 81 Am. St. Rep. 50; and see, also, Ga. So., etc., Ry. Co. v. Smiley, 151 Ga. —, 108 S. E. 273.

[4] When Congress creates a right and confers jurisdiction on the courts of the state to enforce the right, it adopts the prevailing rules of procedure in the state. As was held in Mondou v. New York, etc., H. R. Co., supra:

The "systems of jurisprudence of the state and of the United States together form one system which constitutes the law of the land for the state."

Nothing directly decided in Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. Maerkl, 198 Fed. 1, 117 C. C. A. 237, is contrary to the conclusion here reached.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 7, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal and error  $\Rightarrow$  1002 — Verdict on conflicting evidence not reviewable.

A careful examination of the record in this case discloses no error of law. The judge's charge, when considered as a whole, fully eliminates any apparent merit in any exception thereto, and while the evidence on the issues of fact is in conflict, there is ample evidence to support the verdict.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by the Southern Fertilizer & Chemical Company against the Bryan Land & Timber Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Bryan Land & Timber Company, as principal, and J. R. Paschall, as indorser, were sued on two promissory notes, a verdict was rendered against them for the full amount of the notes, and their motion for a new trial was overruled. On the trial the defendants assumed the burden of proof, admitting that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount sued for, unless certain affirmative defenses were sustained. One of these defenses was by the defendant corporation, the maker of the notes. It set up, through the president and treasurer of the corporation, that the notes were without consideration, that they were given for the payment of chemical fertilizer to be used upon the lands of the defendant corporation in Bryan county, and that the fertilizer was not merchantable and reasonably suited to the uses intended, in that it was worthless, being full of injurious and deleterious substances, to wit, rubber, shoe heels, shoe bottoms, twenty-penny nails, and similar substances, on account of which condition the fertilizer was not only worthless, but the defendant corporation was greatly damaged in attempting to use the fertilizer; the damage being set out fully in the plea.

Paschall, in his answer, adopts as his own the Bryan Land & Timber Company's plea of failure of consideration, and in his plea sets out fully and at great length the damages resulting from the deleterious character of the fertilizer and the attempt to use it on the land of the principal. He says, in addition to this plea and on account of the facts set out, which he did not know at the time when he signed the notes as indorser, that his risk as indorser was increased beyond that contemplated when he indorsed the notes, and therefore he was discharged and released from any liability. There was evidence to support both the plea of the principal defendant and that of the indorser.

Besides denying the truth of the defendants' evidence, the plaintiff by voluminous testimony sought to show that the condition of the chemicals was fully known to the defendant corporation at the time of making and delivering the notes, and contended that the giving of the notes, therefore, constituted a waiver of any condition complained of. The plaintiff further set up that this condition was brought to the minds of the defendant corporation's officers, or some of them, by the agent of the plaintiff, and, after full consultation and negotiations an accord and satisfaction was effected between the plaintiff and the defendant corporation by the allowance of a credit on the notes of an amount agreed upon to cover such condition, and the acceptance of this credit as in full accord and satisfaction of the condition of the chemical fertilizer and the resulting damages. The defendants denied these allegations, and there was much evidence in support and denial of them.

Travis & Travis, of Savannah, for plaintiffs in error.

Seabrook & Kennedy, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The charge of the court has been carefully read and considered, and the writer of this opinion expresses the view, without reservation, that in his experience he has never considered a charge that more completely, fully, and correctly set out, and more clearly and distinctly covered all the rules of law applicable to the evidence in the case, than that delivered by the learned judge in the present instance. Many objections to excerpts from the charge are made in the motion for a new trial, but a careful examination of these exceptions, when they are considered in connection with the entire charge, shows beyond doubt, not only that they are entirely without merit, but that the charge as a whole fully conformed to the law claimed to be applicable to the facts by the plaintiff in error. It would answer no profitable purpose to take up and discuss each of these exceptions. We therefore conclude that no error of law was committed, the evidence was in conflict on the issues of fact involved, and this court is without juisdiction to set aside the verdict, which is approved by the trial judge.

Judgment affirmed.

1. New trial  $\S$  108(1)—Not granted for newly discovered evidence not likely to change the result.

The ground of the motion for new trial based upon what is alleged to be newly discovered evidence consisting of the contents of certain papers is without merit. This ground shows that the evidence is not "newly discovered," for it appears therefrom that for some time before the trial the movant's counsel knew of the existence of these papers. Besides, this evidence is both cumulative and impeaching, and not such as would likely cause a different verdict should the case be tried over.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$  1005(2)—Verdict approved by trial judge not reviewable.

There is evidence to authorize the verdict; and, the verdict having been approved by the trial judge, under the repeated and uniform rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court a reviewing court is powerless to interfere.

1. Demurrers properly overruled.

The judgment overruling the demurrers to the petition, general and special, was correct.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Action  $\S$  38(1)—Petition held not demurrable for misjoinder.

In action against building contractor and surety on his bond for breaches of building contract, the petition, although alleging repeated fraudulent acts on the part of the contractor in obtaining money from the plaintiff by false affidavits, and its appropriation otherwise than according to the terms of the contract, was not demurrable for misjoinder of causes of action, as the petition as a whole showed that it was for breach of contract, and the fact that some of the transactions complained of partook of the nature of both a tort and contract was immaterial, in view of Civ. Code 1910,  $\S$  4407, as to election to waive tort.

3. Principal and surety  $\S$  152—Surety may be sued with principal.

In view of Civ. Code 1910,  $\S$  5529, where building contractor's bond was joint and several, the principal and the surety could both have been sued in the same suit, or could have been sued separately.

4. Parties  $\S$  95(2)—Plaintiff's amendment, to join party entitled to proceeds of suit, held proper.

In suit against building contractor and surety on his bond, it was proper for plaintiff owner to amend by adding as plaintiff the name of a third party, on the ground that the surety bond had been assigned to her by the owner as security for money borrowed from her to make payments on the building contract, and for an order to be passed allowing the case to proceed in the name of both the owner individually and of the owner for the use of such third party, to the extent of her interest in the bond as represented by her advances.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Action by A. H. Stoddard against C. S. O'Connell and the American Surety Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring separate writs of error. Affirmed.

Stoddard sued O'Connell, as principal, and the American Surety Company of New York, as surety, on a building contract, and specifically alleged many breaches of it. The petition, in only one count, contains specifications of breaches of the building contract, and the whole scheme of the suit is to recover damages from O'Connell and the surety company for these various breaches on the part of O'Connell, in connection with the construction of the building described in the contract. The petition alleges repeated fraudulent acts on the part of O'Connell in obtaining money from the plaintiff by false affidavits, and its appropriation otherwise than according to the terms of the contract. The petition was originally in the name of Stoddard alone as plaintiff. Pending the hearing the petition was amended by adding as plaintiff the name of Mrs. Mabel Leigh, on the ground that the surety bond in question had been assigned to her by Stoddard as security for a large amount of money which he had borrowed from her to make payments on the erection of the building as described in the building contract made with O'Connell, and an order was passed allowing the case to proceed in the name of both Stoddard individually and Stoddard for the use of Mrs. Leigh to the extent of her interest in the bond as represented by her advances. The defendants both filed demurrers, general and special. The trial court overruled these demurrers, and the case is here for review on that judgment. Separate writs of error were sued out, and both present for the consideration of this court two questions arising on the judgment overruling the demurrers: First, it is insisted that there was a misjoinder of parties and causes of action, there being joined an action ex delicto against O'Connell and ex contractu against the surety company, O'Connell being directly charged in the petition with misappropriation of the funds intrusted to him in connection with the building contract, and the surety company being charged with the violation of its contract as surety on O'Connell's bond in connection with said building; second, it is insisted that the amendment making Mrs. Leigh a party plaintiff was improperly allowed.

Seabrook & Kennedy and Stephens, Barrow & Heyward, all of Savannah, for plaintiffs in error.

Wm. W. Gordon, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1,2] 1. There was no misjoinder of causes of action. The allegations of the petition showed that it was clearly an action for damages for the breach of the contract. It may be that the transactions complained of partake, some of them, of both a tort and contract; but this is immaterial. Civil Code (1910), § 4407. The allegations in the petition charging the wrongful conversion of the money which had been intrusted to the defendant by the plaintiff do not necessarily make the cause of action one arising ex delicto. True, the wrongful conversion alleged was tortious in the general sense that all torts are wrong; but it does not follow that an action ex contractu is joined to an action in tort because the money intrusted under the covenants of the contract has been wrongfully converted by the principal defendant to his own use. These are simply means by which the contract was violated. But an action setting out these violations is, nevertheless, properly construed as an action ex contractu arising from the breach of the covenants of the contract.

[3] 2. Neither was there any misjoinder of parties. The bond in question, made by the surety company, is, by its terms, joint and several. The obligation of the surety company was to make good the derelictions and defaults arising from the building contract; and the plaintiff in this case could have sued, in the same suit, both the principal and surety, or he could have sued them separately. Civil Code (1910), § 5529.

[4] 3. The amendment making Mrs. Mabel Leigh a party plaintiff, or allowing the suit to proceed in the name of Stoddard for the use of Mrs. Leigh, was proper under the allegations. The surety bond, according to the allegations of the petition, had been assigned to Mrs. Leigh by Stoddard to protect her for advances she had made to him in completing the building. What concern is it to the debtor, O'Connell, whether the bond has been assigned, or whether the assignee is made a party? Stoddard not only had the right to sue in his own name, but also had the right, under the allegations, to designate another person to take the proceeds of the suit. Gilmore v. Bangs, 55 Ga. 403; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Bedell, 88 Ga. 591, 15 S. E. 676; Fidelity Co. v. Nisbet, 119 Ga. 316, 46 S. E. 444; Gate City Cotton Mills v. Cherokee Mills, 128 Ga. 170, 57 S. E. 320. It is therefore the opinion of this court that the judgment of the lower court, overruling the general and special demurrers, should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Municipal corporations — § 819(8)—Evidence held to show notice before suit.

The petition contains the allegation that "before filing this suit he [petitioner] filed a petition with the mayor and council of the city of East Point, asking them to compensate him for his said injury as before alleged, but they failed and refused to do so." The evidence in support of the allegation is as follows: "Before filing this suit I filed a written petition with the mayor and council of East Point. I was down there when this was read to the mayor and council. My recollection is that it was about three months before I filed this suit. * * * Col. Clarke [petitioner's attorney] handed that notice to them. I saw him hand it to them." Held, this was sufficient to show a substantial compliance with section 910 of the Civil Code of 1910.

2. Bridges ↔35—Bridge held part of public street.

The evidence was amply sufficient to show that the bridge, the defective condition of which caused the plaintiff's injury, was a part of a public street of the defendant municipality. It had been used by the public for years as a sidewalk, and had been repeatedly worked, and the bridge repaired by the municipal authorities. Mayor, etc., of Americus v. Johnson, 2 Ga. App. 378, 58 S. E. 518.

3. Appeal and error ↔1004(3)—Verdict cannot be set aside as excessive unless inference of gross mistake or undue bias is justified.

The amount of the verdict is large and generous, but this court cannot hold, in view of the evidence and its approval by the trial court, that it is "so excessive as to justify the inference of gross mistake or undue bias." Civ. Code 1910, § 4899.

Attachment ↔180—Attachment lien held prior to unrecorded conditional sale contract.

An unrecorded contract retaining title in the vendor of personal property until full payment of the purchase money is not good as against "the interests of third parties acting in good faith and without notice." Civ. Code 1910, § 3320. It therefore follows that in a contest between the holder of an unrecorded retention of title note and a creditor of its maker under a lien created by the levy of an attachment, judgment in favor of the latter was properly rendered; and the judge of the superior court did not err in refusing to sanction a petition for a writ of certiorari. 1. Highways ↔192—Petition alleging injury in a collision due to discharge of steam on highway held to state cause of action.

2. Evidence held sufficient.

The evidence authorized the verdict.

Error from City Court of Waynesboro; Wm. H. Davis, Judge.

Action by A. B. Wallace, Jr., against the Southern Cotton Oil Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. O. Hatcher, of Waynesboro, for plaintiff in error.

E. V. Heath, of Waynesboro, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. Wallace sued Marchman and the Southern Cotton Oil Company for damage to his automobile, alleging, in part:

That the plant of the Southern Cotton Oil Company, at Waynesboro, was situated some distance from the public highway; that the corporation had "a pipe run from the trappers of its press and extending a distance of some 100 yards to the public road, the outlet for said pipe being in the ditch right on the side of the road"; that while he was driving his automobile along the public road he was forced to stop his car "just before he reached the outlet of said pipe, on account of an outburst of steam from said pipe; that the steam from said pipe formed a dense fog, so dense that petitioner could not see ahead of him at all; that petitioner, being unable to see, stopped his car completely as an extraordinary precaution; that plaintiff's car was in the middle of the road;" that while petitioner's car "was at a standstill, waiting for the outburst of steam to get out of the way, a two-ton truck owned by H. B. Marchman and driven by his employee, Johnson, who was using the same in the business of said March-man, came along said road from Waynesboro; that the said Johnson did not stop the truck, but came right on through the fog, although it was impossible for him to see or be seen, and his truck struck the car of petitioner directly in the front; that by said collision all of the front part of petitioner's car was completely ruined;" that "the use of said pipe seriously interfered with travel on said road, endangered the safety of all parties using said road, and amounted to gross negligence on the part of said defendant company in operating its plant;" that "the failure of Johnson, the driver of H. B. Marchman's truck, to stop his said truck when he saw the outburst of steam so dense he could not see what was ahead of him, amounted to gross negligence on the part of said Johnson as employee of H. D. Marchman."

Petitioner prayed for judgment for the amount of his damages.

The defendant demurred to the petition, and among the grounds of demurrer were the following:

"(1) Because the said petition sets forth no cause of action against this defendant; (2) because the defendant is sued jointly with H. D. Marchman in said cause, when the facts alleged show there was no concert of action between defendant and said Marchman and his servants, but, on the contrary, shows that the acts of negligence charged against defendant were totally disconnected and in no way related to each other; (3) because the act of negligence charged against this defendant neither naturally produced the injury to plaintiff, nor did it tend naturally to produce the act or damage charged against his codefendant."

The demurrer was overruled, the case proceeded to trial, and the trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff.

[1] 1. Under the ruling in Bonner v. Standard Oil Co., 22 Ga. App. 532, 96 S. E. 573, the petition set out a cause of action, and the court properly overruled the demurrer thereto.

[2] 2. The motion for a new trial contains no allegation that in the trial of the case any error of law was committed; there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict, the judge who tried the case approved their finding, and this court will not interfere.

Judgment affirmed.

HOGAN v. GILBERT. (No. 12164.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Oct. 7, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error  $\Rightarrow$  1061(3)—Overruling motion for nonsuit is harmless, where error later cured.

Whether or not an exception to the overruling of a motion for nonsuit, based upon the ground that there was a fatal variance between the allegata and probata, in that the evidence showed that the contract sued upon was made with a partnership rather than with the individual plaintiff, is such an exception as can be considered after testimony for the defendant was introduced, a verdict rendered against the defendant, and a motion for new trial made which presented the complaint that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it (as to which see cases cited in Gunn v. Willson Co., 20 Ga. App. 14, 16, 17, 92 S. E. 721, and see Citizens' Bank v. Shaw, 132 Ga. 771 (1), 773, 65 S. E. 81, Glausier v. Boston Naval Stores Co., 132 Ga. 549, 552, 64 S. E. 547, Findley v. Central of Ga. R. Co., 7 Ga. App. 180, 66 S. E. 485, and cases cited), it is nevertheless true that, where a motion for nonsuit is overruled, and the defendant thereafter introduces evidence by which the deficiency in the plaintiff's testimony is cured, the error, if any, in overruling the motion for nonsuit, is also cured. Ga. Ry. & Electric Co. v. Reeves, 123 Ga. 697 (7), 703, 51 S. E. 610; Southern R. Co. v. Morrison, 8 Ga. App. 647 (2), 648, 70 S. E. 91; Ala. Construction Co. v. Continental Car Co., 131 Ga. 365, 369, 62 S. E. 160. In the instant case, whatever uncertainty might have existed under the plaintiff's evidence upon the question as to whether the contract with the defendant was made with the plaintiff alone, as alleged in the petition, or with himself and his brother, was clarified by the defendant's own testimony that the contract was made and remained solely with the plaintiff.

2. Brokers  $\Rightarrow$  54, 63(1, 5)—Entitled to commission on procuring willing purchaser; owner's refusal to consummate deal leaves him liable for commissions; tender of price not generally necessary to entitle broker to commission when owner refuses to sell to purchaser procured.

It is the general rule that a real estate broker earns his commissions when, "during the agency, he finds a purchaser, ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offers to buy on the terms stipulated by the owner." Civ. Code 1910, § 3587; Smith v. Tatum, 140 Ga. 719, 79 S. E. 775; McMath Plantation Co. v. Allison, 107 S. E. 420. Still the owner may, by the express terms of his agreement with the broker, limit his liability by specifically providing that the commissions shall become earned, due, and payable only as the purchase price shall be actually paid. Such a provision would not, however, affect the broker's rights to commissions in a case where, during the agency, he finds a purchaser, ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offers to buy, on the terms stipulated, but where the owner himself refuses to consummate the trade. Penn v. Ware, 100 Ga. 563(1), 28 S. E. 238; Girardeau v. Gibson, 122 Ga. 313, 314, 50 S. E. 91. In such a case, where the owner, without legal excuse, refuses to effectuate the sale, he becomes liable for the commissions; and after such a refusal it is generally not necessary that the proposed purchaser shall have made to the owner an actual tender of the purchase price. Smith v. Tatum, supra; Winer v. Flournoy Realty Co., 107 S. E. 398(1).

3. Evidence —589—Party's evidence construed against him.

"The testimony of a party who offers himself as a witness in his own behalf is to be construed most strongly against him, when it is self-contradictory, vague, or equivocal." And unless there be other evidence tending to establish his right to recover, he is not entitled to a finding in his favor, if that version of his testimony the most unfavorable to him shows that the verdict should be against him." Steele v. Central of Ga. R. Co., 123 Ga. 237 (1), 51 S. E. 438; Southern Ry. Co. v. Hobbs, 121 Ga. 428(1), 49 S. E. 294; City of Thomasville v. Crowell, 22 Ga. App. 883, 384 (1, b), 96 S. E. 335. While the first portion of the defendant's testimony might be taken as indicating that he had a right to refuse to consummate the contract of sale with the vendee, for the reason that the vendee failed to comply with the agreed terms by making the cash payment required by the agreement procured by the broker and accepted in writing by the owner, yet in another part of his testimony he clearly admits that such was not the case, but states that the vendee offered to make full compliance with such obligation within the time contemplated. Testing the defendant's evidence by the rule stated, he failed to sustain his defense in justification of his refusal to sell, and the court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

JENKINS, P. J. The plaintiff, a real estate broker, sued the owner of certain land for commissions on account of having produced a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy the property listed, on the terms offered by the owner. The petition alleged that the contract for commissions was with the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground of a variance between plaintiff's testimony and his petition, because the plaintiff testified that, after the original employment of himself, he stated to the defendant that he would need his brother to assist in making a sale and wanted the brother to share in the commission, and that the defendant was to pay them 5 per cent. After the court had overruled the motion the defendant testified that he had the trade with the plaintiff, and the plaintiff "was to pay him 5 per cent. commission on the sale," that he made the contract with plaintiff to sell this land, that all the plaintiff did was afterwards to come to him and ask him "something about his brother helping him" (plaintiff, that defendant replied that "as far as he [defendant] was concerned," he "didn't care who" the plaintiff "got to help him sell the land," and that this was all that was said.

[1-3] The evidence was undisputed that the defendant refused to execute the contract of sale. The sole issue was whether or not he was justified in such refusal on account of any noncompliance by the purchaser with the terms of the contract. The preliminary written agreement for a purchase and sale, as signed by the owner and the purchaser procured by the broker, fails to state specifically when the actual contract of sale should be entered upon, the bond and purchase-money notes should be delivered, and the full first payment should be made. The written contract executed August 18, 1919, simply provided that the purchaser should pay $15,000 cash, give a note of $2,500 principal, due January 1, 1921, and 14 notes of $5,000 each, payable from January 1, 1922, to January 1, 1935, with 8 per cent. interest to be paid yearly, acknowledged the receipt of $2,000 earnest money, and provided that possession should change January 1, 1920. The defendant in his plea set up that the purchaser having failed to make the $15,000 cash payment and deliver the notes stated, he on October 20, 1919, notified the purchaser by letter that such terms must be performed by October 29, 1919, giving him 7 days to meet such conditions, which was a reasonable time, 60 days having previously passed since the contract, and that the purchaser wholly failed to perform within that period. The defendant introduced this letter, and testified:

"I agreed to accept the $2,000, and give Jobson 30 days in which to examine the title to the land, and the matter went on, and he never did say whether he approved of the title or not. I never did agree for him to pay $2,000, and give him until January 1st on the $13,000. I just merely extended him the 30 days in which to examine the titles to the place, and he was to let me know if he approved the title to the land, and he never did let me know. In this contract it is stipulated that $15,000 was to be paid cash; he did not pay me that much cash in accordance with the contract."

As already stated, the preliminary written agreement between the defendant and the purchaser procured by the broker did not provide as to the time when the terms of purchase should be performed by the purchaser. However, the defendant, immediately following his evidence just quoted, and in his own direct examination, admitted:

"This contract that was signed does not speak the truth; $15,000 was not to be paid cash; only $2,000 was to be paid cash, and $13,000 was to be paid on January 1st thereafter."

There was no contradiction of the testimony of the purchaser that he had tendered to the defendant the full cash amount due, and the agreed bond and notes before January 1, 1920. And the defendant further admitted that the purchaser "tendered me some money and notes and bond for title; I don't know how much money he had; this was on December 8th."

It is not necessary to add anything further to the headnotes.

Judgment affirmed.

FOLDS v. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO.
(No. 12130.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Oct. 7, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Insurance  $\S$ 136(1, 2, 4), 141(3)—Requirements as to delivery of policy and waiver of delivery stated; recitals held not to create presumption first premium had been paid.

While actual delivery of the policy is not essential to the validity of a consummated contract of life insurance, unless by the terms of the agreement it be expressly so required, and while it is true that, even where the agreement requires delivery of the policy as a condition precedent to liability, still, if the contract has been otherwise fully consummated, the receiving of the policy from the company by its agent, for unconditional delivery to the applicant, will be taken as equivalent to delivery to the latter, and while it is true that, even though the agreement may require that the delivery of the policy shall be made while the applicant is in good health, it still remains the rule that, where the contract has been otherwise fully consummated and the agent thus receives the policy from the company for unconditional delivery while the applicant remains in good health, the contract, in that event and under such circumstances, will be treated as delivered and as binding (New York Life Insurance Co. v. Babcock, 104 Ga. 67, 30 S. E. 273, 42 L. R. A. 88, 69 Am. St. Rep. 134), and even though it might seem that, where the agent has received from his company an otherwise consummated contract for unconditional delivery, save only that the occupation and condition of health of the applicant should have remained the same since examination, and the agent negligently fails and refuses to comply with such positive instructions, although at the time of its receipt by him the health and occupation of the applicant had not changed, the policy should be held to have been delivered and the contract held binding under the principle which treats as done that which ought to have been done, yet, where the application for a policy of life insurance and the policy itself both provide that the insurance shall not take effect unless the first premium be paid and the policy is delivered to and received by the applicant during his lifetime and while in good health, and that only certain named officers of the company can make, modify, or discharge contracts or waive any of the company's rights or requirements, and that none of these acts can be done by the agent taking the application, and where the policy is forwarded by the company to the agent, not for unconditional delivery to the applicant, but, under its written instruction to its agent, "for delivery and collection of premium, provided there has been no change in the occupation or condition of health since examination," and "under no circumstances are you to mail or deliver any policies on which requirements are called for until all such requirements have been fully complied with," such transmission of the policy to the agent, with such conditional and limited authority for delivery to the applicant, is not tantamount to a delivery to the latter, where it also appears that the applicant was not in good health when the policy was so received by the agent or at any subsequent time; nor do recitals contained in such an undelivered policy create a presumption that the first premium has been paid. Reese v. Fidelity Mutual Life Ass'n, 111 Ga. 482, 36 S. E. 637; Clark v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 129 Ga. 571, 59 S. E. 283; Brown v. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., 131 Ga. 38, 61 S. E. 1123; Williams v. Empire Life Ins. Co., 146 Ga. 246, 91 S. E. 44; Reliance Life Ins. Co. v. Hightower, 148 Ga. 843, 98 S. E. 469; McKenzie v. Northwestern Mutual Life Ins. Co., 26 Ga. App. 225, 105 S. E. 720.

2. Evidence  $\S$ 244(13), 317(1)—Insurance  $\S$ 668(3)—Hearsay conversation inadmissible; insurance company not bound by agent's declarations while not acting on behalf of his principal; applicant's good health at time of policy delivery held for the court.

The evidence in this case cannot be held to establish the fact that the policy was in any wise delivered by the agent to the applicant. The excluded letter from the agent to his company, even had it been otherwise admissible, was without probative value. The court properly excluded as hearsay the testimony of the plaintiff, whereby it was sought to put in evidence certain conversations with the agent. Nor could such declarations of the agent be held to bind the company, since they were made after the death of the applicant and not while acting on behalf of his principal nor within the scope of his agency. Moreover, under the undisputed facts and circumstances disclosed, it is immaterial whether there had been a delivery of the policy by the agent to the applicant. While it is ordinarily true that any question as to whether or not the plaintiff was in good health at the time a policy was delivered should be left for determination by the jury (Few v. Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias, 186 Ga. 181 [3], 71 S. E. 130), yet, where all the testimony relating thereto excludes every reasonable hypothesis but one, the question becomes one of law for adjudication by the court (Empire Life Ins. Co. v. Jones, 14 Ga. App. 647 [3], 82 S. E.

62; Life Ins. Co. of Va. v. Pate, 23 Ga. App. 232 [3], 235, 97 S. E. 874; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Bolton, 22 Ga. App. 566 [2], 570, 96 S. E. 442).

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Action by Annie Folds, administratrix, against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Annie Folds, as administratrix, sued the New York Life Insurance Company on an insurance policy upon the life of her deceased husband. The application for insurance, which was made a part of the policy, provided:

"That the insurance hereby applied for shall not take effect unless the first premium is paid and the policy is delivered to and received by me during my lifetime and good health," and "that only the president, a vice president, a second vice president, a secretary, or the treasurer of the company can make, modify, or discharge contracts, or waive any of the company's rights or requirements, and that none of these acts can be done by the agent taking this application."

The policy contained also the following provisions:

"The policy and the application therefor, copy of which is attached hereto, constitute the entire contract. * * * No agent is authorized to waive forfeitures or to make, modify, or discharge contracts, or to extend the time for paying a premium."

From the plaintiff's evidence it appears that the policy was written up and dated December 28, 1918, and, after being forwarded from the home office in New York to the Atlanta office of the company it was mailed on January 2, 1919, to the company's agent who had solicited the policy, H. G. Smith, Newborn, Ga. The policy as forwarded to this agent was accompanied by a letter to him, stating that it was sent "for delivery and collection of premium, provided there has been no change in the occupation or condition of health since examination," and that "under no circumstances are you to mail or deliver any policies on which requirements are called for until all such requirements have been fully complied with." On the trial the plaintiff testified:

"He was taken sick on Sunday, the 29th day of December. He took his bed that day—stayed in bed some. His physical symptoms were that he had a cold. I don't know about fever; I didn't have any thermometer to tell; he wasn't any too hot. He went to bed on Sunday and I called Dr. Wilson. He prescribed for him. The prescription was quinine and soda. That is all. He said he thought he had influenza. He passed a very good night Sunday night. Not any opiates or anesthetics at all were given him. Dr. Wilson came on Monday; he made one visit Monday. He was in bed part of the time Tuesday. He made one visit Tuesday. He didn't leave any more medicine Tuesday. He came Wednesday. Mr. Folds was sitting up by the fire when he came. He did not prescribe anything for him Wednesday. He came Thursday night. Mr. Folds had gotten a little worse Thursday night. I don't remember whether he was in bed when the doctor got there Thursday night. The doctor called Friday also, and he continued to get worse. He died Saturday, the 4th of January. He was buried on Sunday. From the 29th of December, 1918, until the 4th day of January, 1919, he was confined to his house, didn't attend to any business—he stayed around home. I said he died of pneumonia. I don't know whether the influenza went into pneumonia or not. I have nursed pneumonia. My husband's case was similar to this—similar symptoms."

It appears that the policy remained in the hands of the company's agent, who afterwards became temporary administrator of the applicant's estate; that after the death of the applicant the agent, while temporary administrator, exhibited to the plaintiff at her home certain papers that the deceased had in the bank of which the agent was cashier, among which was the policy in question. The plaintiff testified that after looking at the papers she requested Smith to keep them for her, and that the policy remained in his possession until afterwards returned by him to the company.

On the trial the policy was produced by the company under a notice given to it by the plaintiff. Other than the recital in the policy there was no evidence that the first premium had ever been paid. The plaintiff offered in evidence a letter from the agent Smith to the defendant, addressed to its office in Atlanta, and dated February 4, 1919, stating that on account of his having been appointed temporary administrator of Folds' estate, his (Smith's) attorney would not consent to his return of the policy sued on. The letter was offered for the purpose of showing that Smith had received and delivered the policy to the applicant. This letter, on objection, was excluded by the court. The court excluded also certain testimony of J. O. Stanton, a witness for plaintiff, as follows:

"I asked him whether the policy had come, and he said he had it—the policy on Will Folds' life—he told me it had come. He didn't say how much. He said he had it and hadn't delivered it. He said Mr. Folds had a box at the bank. He didn't state anything else. He said he had the policy, and Mr. Folds had a box in his bank. I had not seen Mr. Folds—I just heard he was sick."

The following testimony of the plaintiff was also excluded:

"Mr. Smith said he wanted to see me about being administrator. I told him I would like to get him to help me for a while—I wasn't able to see after anything myself. Nothing was said about its being necessary to look after the matter promptly and right away. He said he had been told by several to get the place as temporary administrator if he could. He came to see me again. I asked him to carry these papers back and put them in the bank. He said this policy had been there several days. He did not say whether W. J. Folds had ever seen it. He said W. J. Folds told him just to keep this policy up there with his other papers as he had always done. Mr. Smith said when he received it he put it with his other papers in the bank. When he came to my house, he had it all together in one bundle."

At the conclusion of the evidence introduced by the plaintiff the court granted a motion for nonsuit.

It is not necessary to add anything further to what is said in the headnotes.

2. Railroads  $\S$ 327(1)—Failure to stop, look, and listen does not establish negligence.

It is not the rule that it constitutes negligence in one approaching a railroad crossing to fail to stop, look, and listen before crossing.

3. Trial  $\S$ 194(17)—Generally court cannot instruct as to what constitutes negligence at crossing.

The question of negligence of one injured crossing a railroad track is for the jury, and, unless his acts constitute negligence per se, the court cannot instruct as to what facts would constitute negligence.

4. Trial  $\S$ 253(4)—Instruction omitting element of comparative negligence held properly refused.

Even if decedent was negligent in approaching the railroad crossing at which he was killed, yet, there being also evidence that those in charge of the train were also negligent in approaching the crossing, from which evidence the jury might well have found that defendant's negligence exceeded that of decedent, an instruction omitting the question of comparative negligence was properly refused.

HILL, J. [1] This case was before the Supreme Court on substantially the same record as in the present case. The only two points involved in the case then are the only two points involved now. Those two points are, first, whether the plaintiff was the lawful wife of the decedent, and was therefore entitled to bring the suit for his homicide by the defendant railroad company, and, secondly, whether the decedent, at the time he was killed by the railroad company, was himself guilty of such negligence as would prevent his widow from recovering damages for his death. The Supreme Court, in Neely v. Tennessee, Georgia & Alabama Railroad Company, 145 Ga. 363, 89 S. E. 325, L. R. A. 1916F, 819, decided the two points in question as follows:

First. "Upon the whole, the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff made out a prima facie case that she was married to the decedent and remained his wife until his death, although under a misapprehension and under advice of counsel, she had married a second time before that event. As against this, the mere bald proof of a marriage in Alabama to another woman and of living with her in Georgia at the time when his death occurred would not be sufficiently conclusive to show that the first marriage had been dissolved, and that the plaintiff was not the widow of the decedent, or to authorize the judge to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant railway company on that ground."

On the present trial, as disclosed by the record, there was no difference in the evidence on the subject of the plaintiff being the lawful widow of the decedent, and the trial judge substantially charged the law decided in the case by the Supreme Court on that point.

On the second point the Supreme Court held:

"If the plaintiff made out a prima facie case showing she was the widow of the decedent, there was sufficient evidence on the subject of negligence and liability to authorize the submission of the case to the jury. It follows that the direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant was error."

In the present trial, as disclosed in the record, the evidence on the question of negligence and liability was substantially, if not identically, the same, and in the absence of any error of the trial judge in the conduct of the trial, if, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, the evidence was sufficient on the subject of negligence and liability to authorize the submission of the case to the jury, it follows that a verdict on practically the same evidence would be supported.

We have examined the grounds of the motion for a new trial as amended, and we find none of them are meritorious. The law as specifically decided by the Supreme Court in this case, on the subject of the plaintiff being the lawful widow of the decedent, was given in charge, and the principles of law that have been well settled by repeated decisions of this court and the Supreme Court on the subject of negligence and liability, applicable to the facts, were also submitted to the jury. The failure to give the following instructions requested was not erroneous according to repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court:

"It is the duty of one approaching a railroad crossing to exercise ordinary care to ascertain whether a train is approaching. I charge you that it is ordinary care to look and listen. It may not be negligence which will bar a recovery to fail to use one's senses—to fail to look and listen. If the evidence shows that the deceased could have seen or heard the train in time to avoid danger had he looked or listened, and he drove upon the track in front of the moving train, then this was such negligence on his part as would prevent a recovery in this case, and if you find such to be the fact, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

[2] Such instructions would have been fatally afflicted with two infirmities, and if it had been given as requested would have been reversible error. First, it has never been held in this state that it constituted negligence in one approaching a crossing over a railroad track to fail to stop, look, and listen before crossing. Bryson v. Southern Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 407, 59 S. E. 1124; Columbus R. Co. v. Peddy, 120 Ga. 589, 48 S. E. 149; Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Blackwell, 16 Ga. App. 504, 85 S. E. 686. There are many other decisions both of the Supreme Court and of this court to the same effect.

[3] Second, the question of negligence in such circumstances is always one for the jury, and, unless the act complained of as negligence is negligence per se, the trial judge cannot instruct the jury as to what facts would constitute negligence. This is an issue to be determined by the jury according to the facts of each particular case, without any assistance from the trial judge.

[4] Even if the decedent was negligent in approaching the railroad crossing, there was also evidence that those in charge of the train of the defendant company were also negligent in approaching the crossing, and the jury might well have found from the evidence that the defendant's negligence exceeded that of the decedent, and that therefore, under the well-established doctrine of comparative negligence, the verdict for $1,500 was authorized.

Judgment affirmed.

(182 N. C. 200)

YOUNG v. DAVIS. (No. 107.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Statutes  $\S$ 162—Procedure act as to specified money demands held not repealed by act relating to procedure generally.

Pub. Laws Sp. Sess. 1920, c. 96, relating to procedure in civil cases, held not to repeal Pub. Laws 1919, c. 156, relating to procedure in actions to enforce money demands of a specified kind.

2. Statutes  $\S$ 225—Several acts on same subject to be harmonized, if possible.

In the construction of statutory law there is a presumption against inconsistency, and when there are two or more statutes on the same subject in the same or successive Legislatures, in the absence of an express repealing clause, they are to be harmonized, and every part allowed significance, if it can be done by fair and reasonable interpretation.

3. Statutes  $\S$ 225½—Special act construed as exception to general act.

Where there are two acts or provisions, one of which is special and certainly includes the matter in question, and the other general, which, if standing alone, would include the same matter, the special act must be construed to constitute an exception to the general act.

4. Pleading  $\S$ 77—General procedure statute as to time for pleading and special act held not repugnant.

Pub. Laws 1919, c. 304, relating to the time for pleading in civil actions generally, held not repugnant to Pub. Laws 1919, c. 156, affording an additional and more speedy relied in moneyed demands, where no defense is offered within the required time; one act being an exception to the other.

Appeal from Superior Court, Harnett County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by E. F. Young, receiver, against Z. R. Davis. From a judgment setting aside a default and granting leave to answer, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The facts more directly relevant to the inquiry and his honor's judgment thereon are set forth in the record as follows:

"It appears to the court, and the court finds, from the record of the cause and affidavits submitted, the following facts:

"(1) The summons in this cause was issued by the clerk of the superior court of Harnett county, April 13, 1921, returnable May 2, 1921; the last-named date being the first Monday of May.

"(2) The summons was, by the sheriff of Wilson county, together with a copy of the complaint, duly served on the defendant April 20, 1921.

"(3) The complaint, duly verified, declared on a promissory note, and demanded judgment to the amount of the note, alleging that the plaintiff was the holder in due course of said note.

"(4) On the 10th day of May, 1921, eight days after the return date of the summons, and on the second Monday of May, 1921, judgment by default final was entered by the clerk of the superior court against the defendant for the amount demanded by the plaintiff.

"(5) The defendant, on the 18th day of May, 1921, for good cause, requested an extension of time in which to answer the complaint. The defendant was informed by the clerk of the superior court of Harnett county that the time to answer would be extended as requested, and for the cause assigned, but for the fact that judgment had already been entered in the cause. The court finds further that the defendant could have and would have answered prior to the 22d day of May, 1921, had judgment not already been entered, and had the clerk of the superior court of Harnett county refused the application of the defendant for an extension of time in which to answer.

"(6) The court finds that the defendant has a meritorious defense; that the defense set up in the further defense of the answer sought by the defendant to be filed in this cause, and used in his motion as an affidavit, is a good and meritorious defense to the plaintiff's alleged cause of action.

"The court is of the opinion that chapter 156 of the Laws of 1919, was repealed by chapter 96, Pub. Laws Sp. Sess. 1920, and is further of the opinion that the judgment entered by the clerk of the superior court in this case was premature, and for that cause irregular, and that the defendant is entitled to have his motion that the judgment be set aside and that he be granted leave to answer sustained.

"It is now, by the court, on motion of the defendant, ordered and decreed that the judgment heretofore entered in this cause by the clerk of the superior court of Harnett county be and the same is hereby set aside and declared of no effect. The defendant is permitted to file answer within 10 days from this date."

From this judgment plaintiff appealed, assigning as error the ruling of his honor that chapter 156, Laws of 1919, was repealed by chapter 96, Pub. Laws Sp. Sess. 1920, and that, the judgment of the clerk being therefore premature and irregular, defendant is entitled to have same set aside.

Ross & Salmon, of Lillington, and James Best, of Dunn, for appellant.

W. A. Lucas, of Wilson, and Pou, Bailey & Pou, of Raleigh, for appellee.

HOKE, J. Chapter 156, Laws 1919, entitled "An act to provide a more speedy determination of uncontested rights and actions upon bills, notes, bonds, and other forms of indebtedness," and duly ratified March 7, 1919, makes provision in effect that, in all such actions, summons may be returnable before the clerk on the first Monday in the month, and judgment by default rendered on the second Monday, provided such summons is issued more than 10 days before any first Monday, a duly verified complaint is filed at time of issue, setting forth a cause of action of the kind specified, a copy of same being "served on defendant at time of service," and the defendant shall neglect or fail to file a verified answer, raising material issues before said second Monday.

In chapter 304 of the same session, ratified March 11, 1919, the Legislature made provision as to the procedure in civil actions generally, the first three sections of which are as follows:

"Section 1. The summons in all civil actions in the superior court shall be made returnable before the clerk at a date named therein, not less than ten days nor more than twenty days from the issuance of said writ, and shall be served as now provided by law.

"Sec. 2. The complaint shall be filed on or before the return day of the summons: Provided, for good cause shown the clerk may extend the time to a day certain.

"Sec. 3. The answer or demurrer shall be filed within twenty days after the return day, or, if the time is extended for filing the complaint, then the defendant shall have twenty days after the date fixed for such extension: Provided, for good cause shown the clerk may extend the time for filing the answer or demurrer."

The statute contained extended and further provisions affecting procedure not specially relevant to the questions presented. At the Special Session of 1920 (chapter 96) the same Legislature enacted a statute which, in section 1, purports in express terms to amend "chapter 304 of the Laws of 1919," and which makes extended provision affecting procedure in civil causes, providing, among other things, that the "summons in all civil actions in the superior court shall be made returnable before the clerk at a date named therein not less than ten days nor more than twenty days from the issuance of said writ," that "the complaint shall be filed on or before the return day of the summons," unless the time is extended, and that "the answer or demurrer shall be filed within twenty days after the return day," unless time is extended, etc.

After making, as stated, additional regulations affecting procedure in the civil causes to which it may refer, this statute closes with the following repealing clause:

"All of that part of chapter 304, Public Laws of North Carolina, Session 1919, not included and rewritten in this act, and all other laws and clauses of laws in conflict with this act, are hereby repealed."

[1,2] Upon this, a sufficient statement to a proper apprehension of the questions presented, we are of opinion that this chapter 96 of the special session of 1920 did not have the effect of repealing chapter 156 of the regular session of 1919, which in terms applied only to actions to enforce moneyed demands of specified kind, but the same is still in force as a permissive and selective method of procedure in the class of actions to which it refers. Speaking generally, it is recognized that in the construction of statutory law there is a presumption against inconsistency, and when there are two or more statutes on the same subject in the same or successive Legislatures, in the absence of an express repealing clause, they are to be harmonized, and each and every part allowed significance, if this can be done by fair and reasonable interpretation. In further elucidation of the position it is said in Black on Interpretation of Laws, pp. 328, 329:

"Where a statute contains both a general enactment and also specific or particular provisions, the effort must be, in the first instance, to harmonize all the provisions of the statute by construing all the parts together; and it is only when, on such a construction, the repugnancy of the specific provisions to the general language is plainly manifested, that the intent of the Legislature as declared in the general enacting part is made to give way. . . ."

"A substantially similar rule prevails in cases where the two conflicting provisions are found in different statutes relating to the same subject. It is an established rule in the construction of statutes that a subsequent act, treating a subject in general terms, and not expressly contradicting the provisions of a prior special statute, is not to be considered as intended to affect the more particular and specific provisions of the earlier act, unless it is absolutely necessary so to construe it in order to give its words any meaning at all. Hence, where there are two acts or provisions, one of which is special and particular, and certainly includes the matter in question, and the other general, which, if standing alone, would include the same matter, and thus conflict with the special act or provision, the special act must be taken as intended to constitute an exception to the general act, as the Legislature is not presumed to have intended a conflict."

[3] The principle so stated has been approved and applied in authoritative cases on the subject in this and other courts. A. C. L. R. R. v. Brunswick Co., 178 N. C. 254, 100 S. E. 428; Rankin v. Gaston Co., 173 N. C. 683, 92 S. E. 719; Hannon v. Power Co., 173 N. C. 520, 92 S. E. 353; Bramham v. Durham, 171 N. C. 196, 88 S. E. 347; Cecil v. High Point, 165 N. C. 431, 81 S. E. 616; Rodgers v. U. S., 185 U. S. 83, 22 Sup. Ct. 582, 46 L. Ed. 816; Dahnke v. People, 168 Ill. 102, 48 N. E. 137, 39 L. R. A. 197; Stockett v. Bird, 18 Md. 484. As more directly opposite to the facts presented, in Bramham v. Durham, it was held that—

"Where there are two acts of the Legislature applicable to the same subject, passed at different times at the same session, their provisions are to be reconciled in their interpretation, if this can be done by fair and reasonable intentment, but to the extent they are necessarily repugnant the latter shall prevail."

And in the Cecil Case, supra:

"Statutes on the same subject-matter should be construed together, so as to harmonize different portions apparently in conflict, and to give to each and every part some significance, if this can be done by fair and reasonable interpretation."

Recurring to the facts, it appears at the regular session the Legislature of 1919 enacted chapter 156, providing that an action could be instituted in a certain class of moneyed demands returnable in 10 days to the first Monday in any month, and judgment could be entered on the second Monday thereafter on proper proof made, and in case no verified answer raising material issues should be filed, ratified March 7th. Four days later, on March 11th, another statute (chapter 304) by the same Legislature was duly ratified, making provision as to return of summons within 20 days and answer within 20 days, etc., making extended provisions affecting procedure; this latter statute purporting to apply to "all civil actions in the superior court," and containing a repealing clause in general terms as follows:

"That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

[4] Under the decisions cited, and others of like kind, and the principles they approve, we must hold that chapter 304, purporting to deal with civil actions generally, is not necessarily repugnant to chapter 156, which affords an additional and more speedy relief in the class of actions therein specified, to wit, the moneyed demands, wherein no defense should be offered within the required time. The two acts are not, therefore, necessarily repugnant, but, on the contrary, it is clear, we think, that the one is an exception to the other, or rather the first affords an additional and more speedy method of relief in the stated class of suits. This, in our view, being the correct construction of the two acts of the regular session, the same Legislature at the special session enacted this chapter 96, making provision for the institution and mode of the procedure in civil actions generally. It begins by stating expressly that it purports to deal with this chapter 304 of the Regular Session. The general act provides for the issue of summons in 20 days, etc., in all civil actions, etc., and closes with the repealing clause as stated:

"All of that part of chapter 304 * * * not included and rewritten in this act, and all other laws and clauses of laws in conflict with this act, are hereby repealed."

If the special chapter 156 of the regular session was not in conflict with 304 of the same session, no more is it in conflict with this chapter 96, which on the question presented here is in exact accord with the corresponding section of 304 with the exception that the later act contains provision for "service by publication"; a position that is emphasized by the fact, as shown, that in express term it purports to deal only with chapter 304.

We are confirmed, also, in this view by the fact that the capable codifiers of Consolidated Statutes and their learned assistants have incorporated the two statutes of the regular session, chapters 156 and 304, in their valuable work, where they appear in separate sections, 476 and 593, not as inconsistent, but as affording two recognized methods of procedure in civil causes and in the cases specified. The legislators, at the time they passed the statute of the special session, were no doubt fully aware that both these laws of the regular session were generally recognized as existent, and had been so brought forward in the work referred to, and in restricting the effect of the act of the special session in terms to chapter 304 they thereby manifested a clear intent that the special act on moneyed demands, in the cases and to the extent specified therein, should be undisturbed.

For the reasons stated, we are constrained to differ with the learned judge in his ruling, and must hold that the judgment is in all respects regular, and the order by which same was set aside is disapproved.

Reversed.

TRIPP et al. v. SOMERSETT. (No. 293.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  567(2)—Agreements to extend time for settlement of cases not favored.

Agreements to extend time for the settlement of cases on appeal are not favored by the courts.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$  567(2)—Statutory time for settling cases controlling in absence of agreement in writing or admitted.

The statute has fixed the time for the settlement of cases on appeal, and this should be strictly observed, unless there is a mutual agreement which is either in writing or admitted.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$  567(1)—Illness of counsel no excuse for failure to settle case in time.

Illness of counsel is no excuse for failing to settle the case on appeal in time, where such counsel is not the only counsel for appellant, and, even if he is, it is the duty of the party to obtain other counsel.

4. Appeal and error  $\S$  659(5)—Where case not settled in time, appellant should docket transcript and move for certiorari.

When for any sufficient cause the case on appeal is not settled in time to have the case docketed at the term of the Supreme Court to which the appeal should be brought, the appellant should in apt time docket a transcript of the record proper and move for a certiorari.

Appeal from Superior Court, Brunswick County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by J. F. Tripp and others against John Somerset. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals, but on failure to docket the transcript the appeal was dismissed. On motion to reinstate. Motion denied.

Verdict and judgment against defendants who appealed, and were allowed by consent 60 days in which to serve case on appeal and plaintiff 60 days thereafter to serve counter case. The transcript on appeal not being docketed at this term at the beginning of the call of the docket of the district to which it belonged, the motion to docket and dismiss under Rule 17 (81 S. E. ix) was allowed. Immediately thereafter the appellants moved to reinstate.

Herbert McClammy, of Wilmington, for plaintiff.

Robert Ruark, of Wilmington, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. This was a motion for leave to reinstate an appeal from June term, 1921, of Brunswick, which had been dismissed for failure to docket the transcript on appeal at this term. It appears from the affidavits filed that, just before the expiration of the 60 days allowed appellants by agreement to serve case on appeal, one of their counsel asked one of the counsel for the appellee for an extension of the time. The appellants' counsel insist that there was a verbal agreement that the time would be indefinitely extended, to which the appellee replies that the agreement for extension was upon the express agreement that the time would be extended 10 days and upon condition only that the appeal should be settled in time for the case on appeal to be docketed at this term.

[1, 2] We have often given notice that the time for the settlement of the case on appeal can be extended only by agreement of counsel and when the alleged agreement is oral it cannot be considered, if denied. This court will not pass upon the relative accuracy of memory of counsel, when they do not put their agreements in writing. Agreements to extend time for the settlement of cases on appeal are not favored by the courts. The statute has fixed the time, and this should be observed, and must be observed strictly, unless there is a mutual agreement which is either in writing or admitted.

[3] One of the counsel for the appellants also contends that the failure to settle the case on appeal was due to his illness. This, however, is not sufficient ground seeing that he was not the only counsel for the appellants, and besides, if he had been, it was the duty of the parties to employ other counsel to represent them.

[4] It is also elementary that when for any sufficient cause the "case on appeal" is not settled in time to have the case docketed at the term of this court to which the appeal should be brought, the appellant should in apt time docket a transcript of the record proper and move for a certiorari. This not having been done, the motion to docket and dismiss was properly allowed, and this motion by the appellants to reinstate and continue the cause must be denied. The appellant does not even docket a transcript of the record proper with his motion to reinstate.

These requirements for the orderly settlement of cases on appeal and for docketing the same in this court are clearly marked out by the statute and the rules of this court, and it admits of more than a mild surprise that counsel should not observe them and should take the time of the court, which is intended for the discussion and decision of cases, by motions to excuse themselves from a failure to observe the well-settled and orderly procedure which is necessary in bringing appeals to this court when a party deems that there has been error in the proceedings below. This is the second time at this term that we have been called upon to consider the failure to observe the well-known requirements in bringing up the case on appeal, to which the appellee has a statutory right. Kerr v. Drake, 108 S. E. 393.

The motion to reinstate the appeal is denied.

(182 N. C. 223)

WARD v. LIDDELL CO. (No. 255.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Sales  $\S$ 285(2) — Notice of defects within certain time held essential to recovery for breach of warranty.

Under a contract for the sale of a cotton gin, requiring the buyer to give notice in writing within 10 days from the time the machine was set up of any original defect, and providing that continued possession or use of the gin should be conclusive evidence of fulfillment of a warranty as to the quality and capacity of the machine, the buyer could not recover for breach of such warranty, where he made no complaint of any defects until 3 months after the gin was set up.

2. Sales  $\S$ 267—Implied warranty held excluded by express warranty.

By an express warranty of a cotton gin that it was "of good material, well made, and with proper management capable of working well for the purposes intended," any warranty that the gin would turn out as much as 22 or 25 bales per day, which might be implied from the fact that the seller's agent so assured the buyer after seeing the buyer's plant and machinery, was excluded.

3. Evidence  $\S$ 442(6)—Evidence of representations of agent as to capacity of cotton gin held incompetent.

In an action for breach of a warranty that a cotton gin was of "good material, well made, and with proper management capable of working well for the purposes intended," evidence of assurances of the seller's agent of an output of 22 to 25 bales a day was incompetent, in the absence of fraud, in view of an express provision of the contract that it contained the entire contract, and that none other, written or verbal, should form any part of it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; G. W. Connor, Judge.

Action by A. Ward against the Liddell Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff excepts and appeals. Affirmed.

Robert C. Strong, of Raleigh, for appellant. Cansler & Cansler, of Charlotte, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The written contract of sale executed between the parties contained a warranty as follows:

"The machinery specified in the within contract is warranted by Liddell Company to be of good material, well made, and with proper management capable of working well for the purposes intended. In case of original defects in any machine, or part of machine, Liddell Company agree to make good the defect, by supplying a new machine, or a new part, provided notice of such defect shall be given, in writing, within 10 days from the time said machinery is set up and ready for operation; but continued possession or use of said machinery, after expiration of said 10 days, without such written notice, shall be conclusive evidence that the above warranty is fulfilled to the satisfaction of the undersigned, who agrees not to thereafter make other claim upon Liddell Company on account of said warranty: Provided, that in case any casting shall be replaced by Liddell Company without charge, except express charges, upon like written notice of 10 days; but on any claim for replacement of defective casting, the defective pieces shall be presented to Liddell Company, or the agent through whom the machinery was ordered, and shall clearly show the defects. Defects or failure in one part shall not condemn or be ground for claiming renewal, or for the return of any other part."

This contract also contains stipulation:

"That when this order is accepted, it is understood that the same shall be held to be the entire contract between us, and no agreement, verbal or otherwise, other than set forth herein, forms any part of this contract."

[1, 2] The evidence of plaintiff tends to show that it was 3 months after the gin was set up and in operation before plaintiff made complaint of any defects in the gin, written or otherwise, and, this being true, we are of opinion that the cause has been properly nonsuited. It is contended for the appellant that these gins, if properly constructed and with the machinery and power there operated by plaintiff, should have ginned 22 to 25 bales of cotton per day; whereas, they could never turn out more than 12 bales per day, and to plaintiff's great loss. And appellant offered to introduce testimony (excluded on objection of defendant) to the effect that defendant's agent, who was there at plaintiff's place and saw the plant and machinery at the time of the contract, and as an inducement thereto, gave express assurance that the gins would turn out as much as 22 or 25 per day. As to any implied contract or warranty embodied in this position of appellant, in Armour Fertilizer Works v. Aiken, 175 N. O. 398, 95 S. E. 657, it was stated to be the general rule that, subject to a few recognized exceptions (not presented on this record):

"An express warranty in an executed contract of sale will exclude one that is ordinarily implied, where the two are of the same general nature, or refer to the same or closely related subjects or qualities in the things sold."

[3] And as to the evidence offered tending to show express assurances of an output of 22 to 25 bales a day, that is incompetent further by reason of the express provision:

"That the written instrument contains the entire contract between the parties, and none other, written or verbal, shall form any part of the contract." Bland v. Harvester Co., 169 N. C. 418, 88 S. E. 350; Machine Co. v. McClamrock, 152 N. C. 405, 67 S. E. 991.

Unless, indeed, the verbal assurances relied upon, offered in avoidance of the contract, and available to a claimant on that issue, are such as to permit the inference of fraud, and there is no allegation or claim of fraud presented. See Machine Co. v. Feezer, 152 N. C. 516, 67 S. E. 1004. On the record, our decisions pertinent to the precise questions involved are clearly in affirmance of his honor's ruling, and the judgment of nonsuit must be affirmed. Farquhar v. Hardware Co., 174 N. C. p. 369, 93 S. E. 922; Manufacturing Co. v. Lumber Co., 159 N. O. 507, 75 S. E. 718; Allen v. Tompkins, 136 N. C. 208, 48 S. E. 655.

Affirmed.

(182 N. C. 171)

BUCHAM et al. v. KING et al. (No. 217.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Fraud  $\S$ 54—Evidence held admissible to show good faith in representations as to animal's age.

In an action for fraudulent representation as to the age of a race horse sold to plaintiffs by defendant, evidence that defendant, when he purchased the horse, was handed a registry by his vendor showing the age of the horse as represented by defendant, was competent as showing defendant's good faith.

2. Evidence  $\S$ 351—Not competent to prove entries in a book giving ages of racing horses where it was not authentically compiled.

In an action for fraudulent representations as to age of race horse sold to plaintiffs, it was error to permit proof of entries in a book entitled the Year Book purporting to give the age of race horses, where it did not appear that the book was published by authority of a recognized trotting association acted upon by persons conversant with such matters as authentic and official, but which the evidence tended to show was compiled from mere statements not under oath made by persons interested.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Bond, Judge.

Action by A. A. Bucham and another against John L. King and another to recover damages for a false and fraudulent representation as to the age of a race horse, which induced the plaintiffs to purchase the same. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs and assessed their damages at $250, and defendants appealed from the judgment. New trial.

Thos. C. Hoyle, of Greensboro, for appellants.

WALKER, J. [1] There was evidence for the plaintiff tending to show that the horse, which was represented to be seven years old, was actually nine years of age, and contrary evidence for the defendant. There was also proof by the defendant that, if the representation was made and was not true, the defendant acted upon the reasonable belief that it was true, having been handed a registry, at the time of his purchase, by the man who sold him the horse, wherein it appeared that the animal was but seven years old. The jury, notwithstanding this proof (which was competent as showing defendant's good faith in making his statement as to the horse's age), found against the defendant upon the issue of fraud. The court, over defendant's objection, permitted plaintiffs' witness S. B. Harper to testify that there was a book, entitled the Year Book, which purported to give the ages of race horses, that he had seen this book, and it listed the horse in question by his name, "Ned P., Jr.," and stated that the horse was foaled in 1909, from which it therefore appeared that he was nine years old at the time of the sale by the defendant J. R. Thomas to the plaintiff. This witness did not say with assured accuracy how the book was compiled, or whether it was accepted and relied on by any official body of horsemen for the information it professed to contain. His testimony in this respect was not full or satisfactory, as will appear further on, and does not show the book to be an authentic record, and it will further appear therefrom that the sources from which its author, or authors, gathered the information, to say the least of it, were very questionable. Defendants objected to this testimony because the witness could not speak of what he had seen in the book, but that the book itself was the only competent evidence of its contents and should be produced. His honor, in the beginning, when plaintiffs' first witness, Joseph Stricklin, who also referred to this book, was being examined, excluded all reference to this book, but admitted it when plaintiffs' witness S. B. Harper was testifying in rebuttal of defendants' evidence.

[2] We hold that the book would be competent and relevant evidence, under certain conditions and circumstances, which do not exist here as will appear by the following authority:

"Records published by authority of a recognized trotting association, if accepted and acted upon by persons conversant with racing matters as authentic and official, have been held admissible for the purpose of showing the speed of a horse or of others to whom he is related.

So under statute in Iowa a printed copy of a herd book in which cattle are registered has been held admissible if it be shown to be a standard authority recognized by cattle breeders; it being regarded as an historical work on a particular subject. The admissibility of books kept to register cattle and other animals as coming within the exception to the hearsay rule relating to proof of pedigree is discussed elsewhere." 17 Cyc. at p. 425(e).

And see, further, Railway v. Sheppard, 56 Ohio St. 68, 46 N. E. 61, 60 Am. St. Rep. 732; Kuhns v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 65 Iowa, 528, 22 N. W. 661; Crawford v. Williams, 48 Iowa, 247.

All the requisites noted in these authorities to the competency of the book are not found to be present in this case, and not even the majority of them, if any of them do, clearly appear, and those said to be lacking in the case last cited (Crawford v. Williams) have not been shown here. But we are of the opinion that parol evidence of an entry in the book was not competent, and should not have been received, for the reason that it does not appear that the book was made up and published in compliance with the essential requirements of the rule above stated. It was not shown that it was published by a recognized trotting association, and accepted and acted upon by persons conversant with racing matters as authentic and official. This very question was decided in Railway Co. v. Sheppard, supra, where it was held:

"(1) In an action to recover the value of a trotting horse, evidence of his pedigree, and that some of his blood relations have a record for speed, is competent as affecting his value, and when such record is published by authority of a recognized trotting association, and the publication is accepted and acted upon by those interested in and conversant with such matters as authentic and official, it is not error to admit evidence of the horse's speed as shown by that record."

There are other authorities to the same effect.

The cases of Morrison v. Hartley, 178 N. C. 618, 101 S. E. 375 (opinion by Allen, J.), and Miles v. Walker, 179 N. C. 479, 102 S. E. 884, do not militate at all against this view. In the Morrison Case the document was a letter, and in the Miles Case it was a written sublease. They were not records or registers of important facts or events, such as that in this case, and were not the co-operative act of a body of men or association, and were not required to be published, accepted, and acted upon by persons conversant with matters to which they relate as authentic and official, and as reliable for reference in trade transactions or in racing. Those cases held:

"Where the contents of a letter are not directly in issue and it is not the purpose of the action to enforce any obligation created by it, its contents may be shown by parol when relevant to the inquiry." Morrison's Case, supra.

The principle underlying the two cases just cited is elementary that, where the writing relates to a matter collateral to the issue, but is or becomes relevant to it at any stage of the trial, its contents may be shown by parol. The party against whom it is produced may attack the testimony upon the ground that no such paperwriting ever existed, or that, if it did, its contents was not truly stated by the witness, or he may deny its relevancy to the issue, and rely upon its being collateral and immaterial. But that does not exclude the oral evidence in cases like those we have cited or which come within the rule they lay down.

It appears by the testimony of the plaintiffs' witness S. B. Harper that the alleged register or record was borrowed by him at the request of Stricklin, and that he brought it to Stricklin, one of the plaintiffs, and, so far as appears, the latter has possession of it. If the parol evidence had been competent, the defendant could have answered it by requiring the production of the book by Stricklin, if he had taken proper proceedings to that end, or, if a third party had the register, by a subpoena duces tecum issued to him or other appropriate procedure. But the parol evidence was incompetent because the book itself was not competent, and if plaintiffs wish to avail themselves of the book's contents, or any part thereof, they must in some way show the facts in regard to it which we have stated above, or something substantially to the same effect. S. B. Harper, plaintiffs' witness, testified:

"I saw the Year Book. Said book listed the horse, age of which was in controversy, as 'Ned P., Jr.,' and stated that he was foaled in 1909. I borrowed the book and brought it to Stricklin. There were no sworn statements in the book, but it claimed to give the record of race horses and their age. I do not know where the information is secured from. I saw the horse driven around the track, and he was a nice horse and moved nicely."

Defendants' witness N. M. Reaves testified:

"The book referred to by Harper was what is known as the Year Book, and is just about on a par with a newspaper report. It is made up by men who go around and see the races and get their information as best they can from statements given them. They do not mean to misrepresent, but the information thus gathered is not always correct. They often make mistakes. The statements are not sworn to."

While under this and other similar testimony the reliability of the "Year Book" may be seriously questioned, as ably argued by Mr. Hoyle, it was not evidence under the present facts, and could not be referred to for information as to pedigree and age by the witness.

If the book itself would not be competent, if introduced, without further evidence as to its nature, make-up, and reliability, oral evidence of its contents cannot be introduced.

We were not favored with a brief from the plaintiff, which, if filed, would, we have no doubt, have aided us very much in and greatly facilitated our investigation of the case, which has been prolonged for the lack of it. It was necessary for us to ascertain if there was any legal ground upon which this oral evidence could be held as competent, and by an exhaustive and patient search among the best authorities on the subject we have not been able to find any, but, as appears above, the authorities are the other way. We are greatly helped in our work here by the unusually well prepared briefs of counsel, which are the results of their deliberate thought upon and consideration of the questions involved, and we express the hope that they will give us the benefit of them, whether compelled by our rule to do so or not, and as a voluntary contribution to the correct decision of the case. We have been the more careful in the study of the plaintiffs' side of the case because of the absence of a brief, and have formed our conclusion definitely after a full investigation of the same.

This is an important case for the defendant Thomas at least, as there is more involved for him than mere dollars and cents, his character having been gravely impeached by the verdict, finding that he was guilty of a fraud in a horse trade, and, if he is unable finally to acquit himself of the charge, it will be a permanent record against him and a serious handicap to him in his future life. It is also important to the plaintiffs, so far as mere money can make it so, as they have recovered $500, the original price of the horse. The plaintiffs' note which they gave for the purchase price has been transferred to a purchaser in due course for value and without notice, and they are entitled, therefore, to recover for the fraud, if any was practiced upon them.

The verdict will be set aside and a new trial ordered because of the error in admitting the evidence as to the contents of the book.

New trial.

RUDOLPH v. FARMERS' SUPPLY CO., Inc., et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Corporations  $\S$  428(3)—Knowledge gained by salesman and acting secretary of corporation in casual conversation held not notice to corporation.

Knowledge gained by a salesman and acting secretary of a corporation in a casual conversation with dealer in secondhand cars that such dealer had a certain car for sale which had been sold under a conditional contract by the corporation to the person who had sold it to the secondhand dealer was not notice to or knowledge on the part of the corporation; such salesman and acting secretary not then acting within the sphere of his duty or attending to the business of the corporation.

2. Sales  $\S$  473(2)—Sale by vendee to dealer with shifting stock does not deprive original vendor of lien.

Where plaintiff sold automobile, reserving title and docketing a memorandum of the contract in the clerk's office of the circuit court under Code 1919,  $\S$  5189, it could not be deprived of the benefit of the lien by the supervening act of the vendee in selling the same to a dealer, without the knowledge of the vendor, and thereby allowing the automobile to become a part of a shifting stock and to be sold to a bona fide purchaser for value.

3. Sales  $\S$  480(1)—On recovering automobile in hands of innocent purchaser vendor should assign notes to such purchaser.

Where vendee of automobile under conditional contract sold the same to a dealer in secondhand automobiles, who had a shifting stock, and it was purchased by defendant without knowledge of the lien, original vendor, in obtaining possession of the car to enforce its lien, should assign to defendant unpaid notes of the original purchaser, if defendant should pay the balance due the original vendor, or if the car should be sold for an amount sufficient to satisfy the lien.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Roanoke.

Bill by the Farmers' Supply Company, Incorporated, against L. S. Rudolph and another. From a decree for complainant, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed, with directions.

Willis, Adams & Hunter, of Roanoke, for appellant.

Hall, Wingfield & Apperson, of Roanoke, for appellees.

SAUNDERS, J. On December 17, 1919, the Farmers' Supply Company, a corporation doing business in the city of Roanoke, sold to L. W., W. M., and J. O. Garman, citizens of Roanoke county, a Maxwell touring car for the sum of $1,125.

By a written agreement between the parties, $300 of the purchase money was to be paid in cash, and the balance to be paid in eleven installments of $75 each, all of these deferred installments to be evidenced by notes of the buyers. It was further agreed that the Farmers' Supply Company was to retain title to the said car until the whole of the purchase price was paid. A memorandum of this contract was duly docketed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Roanoke county on December 19, 1919. Thereafter this automobile was sold by the Garman to one Walter L. Davis, a resident and dealer in secondhand automobiles in the city of Roanoke. L. S. Rudolph, the appellant in this proceeding, bought said automobile from Davis without knowledge of any reservation of title thereon. Later Davis failed in business and absconded. Thereupon the Farmers' Supply Company filed its bill in chancery against the Garman, and L. S. Rudolph, alleging, among other things, that a balance was due from the said Garman on the purchase price of said automobile, and that it held a lien on same which it was entitled to enforce. To this end, as well as in other respects, the aid of the court was asked.

Rudolph answered this bill, setting up that he was a purchaser for value of said automobile without knowledge or notice of the contract of sale relied upon by the plaintiff; that Davis was a dealer in automobiles in the city of Roanoke, and the automobile in question was a part of a shifting stock of merchandise; that complainant was aware "during the time that Davis had possession of the automobile, and at the time of its purchase by respondent, that said Davis was conducting a business of buying and selling automobiles," and that with this knowledge "complainant suffered and permitted Davis to retain said automobile as a part of a shifting stock of merchandise, and thereby lost its right to subject said automobile to sale under its contract, as against a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice or knowledge of said contract."

The answer asked that same be treated as a cross-bill, and that a decree be entered relieving respondent of any liability under and by virtue of complainant's contract; and, in the event the lien was held to be valid, asking that the Garman be "ordered to reimburse said respondent in whatever sum he might be compelled to pay complainant to satisfy said lien."

No process appears to have been issued against the Garman to answer the cross-bill, and the same was not taken for confessed as to them.

Upon the hearing of the bill, answer, depositions, and exhibits, the courts established the complainant's lien, and directed the automobile to be sold in satisfaction of same, but refused to give a decree of reimbursement in favor of Rudolph against the Garmans, as prayed in said Rudolph's cross-bill.

An appeal from this decree was allowed by one of the judges of this court, thereby bringing the whole controversy before us for consideration and review.

The contentions of the appellant are:

I. That the automobile in the possession of Davis as a dealer was an article of shifting merchandise, and that, as against an innocent purchaser, the lien of the initial vendor was not enforceable. The case of Boice v. Finance Corporation, 127 Va. 563, 102 S. E. 591, 10 A. L. R. 654, is relied upon to support this contention. Further, it is contended that the officers of the Supply Company not only knew that Davis was conducting a retail automobile sales business, and acting as agent for them, but knew that Davis had this particular car in his place of business for sale.

II. That the court, after establishing complainant's lien should have given judgment over in favor of Rudolph against the Garmans, or in lieu thereof should have required that the notes for the unpaid deferred instalments on the car, if paid by Rudolph, should be "assigned to him by the Farmers' Supply Company, without being marked paid."

The evidence relied upon to show that the Farmers' Supply Company (appellee) was aware that the car sold the Garmans, was in the hands of Davis for resale as one of a stock of second hand cars is not impressive. W. E. McGuire, Sr., is the President of the Farmers' Supply Company. He was examined for the plaintiff, and stated that Davis sold cars for his company on commission, but did not think he represented them at the time he bought the Garman car. Witness had been told that "Davis had been selling cars at a secondhand automobile place," but "knew nothing about his business." Witness' son, W. E. McGuire, Jr., "was a salesman for the Farmers' Supply Company," and also "secretary-treasurer. He was acting secretary." Further, this witness stated that he did not think that Davis was selling for the Supply Company up to June 1, 1920.

Davis states that he bought the Garman car some time in 1920, about May 20th, but adds that when he made this purchase "he was not agent for the Farmers' Supply Company," thereby positively confirming McGuire's impression in this respect. The following extracts from the testimony of this witness relate to the alleged imputed knowledge of the Supply Company that the Garman car was in Davis' hands for sale, and constituted a part of his stock in trade:

"Q. State whether or not any officer or agent of the Farmers' Supply Company knew that you had this car.

"A. The young Mr. McGuire knew that I had this car, for he had a talk with me. He is acting secretary. I told him that I had the car there.

"Q. Did you tell him that you had the car for the purpose of disposing of it?

"A. Yes; I could not say that we were talking about having the car there; I would not say that.

"Q. He knew that you had bought it?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Did young Mr. McGuire see this car when he was there?

"A. I would not be sure whether he did or not. * * *

"Q. Were you selling the car for the Farmers' Supply Company to the Garmans?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Were you agent at that time for the Supply Company?

"A. Yes.

"Q. At the same time you were running this business?

"A. No.

"Q. But I understood that you were acting as agent for the Farmers' Supply Company?

"A. Not when I bought this car from Garman."

From the foregoing testimony it will be perceived that Davis bought the Garman car after he ceased to represent the Supply Company.

This testimony also shows that it was in an apparently casual conversation with young McGuire some time in 1920, and not in the course of business (for he did not represent the company at the time) that he told the latter that he had this car for sale.

[1] Would this conversation be sufficient to impute to the Supply Company knowledge that the car in question was in the hands of Davis for sale, and a part of his stock? The answer to this query must be in the negative.

"While a corporation knows a fact only as its officers and agents know it, it does not know all that its agents know, but only what comes to them while acting for the corporation within the scope of their agency, when it is their duty to report their knowledge to the general officers, or agents of the company, and it may be presumed that they have told their principal what they know." Corrigan v. Bobbs-Merrill Co., 228 N. Y. 68, 69, 126 N. E. 260, 10 A. L. R. 662.

"The prevailing rule upon this subject in the federal courts is that notice to an officer of a corporation is not such notice to the corporation as to affect its rights, unless such notice or knowledge of the officer is in regard to a matter coming within the sphere of his duty while attending to the business of the company, and acquired while acting in regard to the same." McDermott v. Hayes, 197 F. 129-135, 116 C. C. A. 553, 559.

"The rule that notice to an officer or agent is notice to the corporation applies as a general rule only where the matter with reference to which notice is given or acquired is within the scope of the officer's or agent's authority, and has some direct connection with his agency, and the notice or knowledge comes to or is possessed by him in his official or representative capacity, and where the officer or agent in the line of his duty ought and could reasonably be expected to act upon or communicate the knowledge to the corporation; and hence the corporation is not affected with knowledge which the officer, or agent, acquires while not acting within his authority, or which relates to matters not within the scope of his authority, or which is acquired by a person who is not an officer or agent of the corporation." 14A Corpus Juris, p. 487.

In the case of Taylor v. Sutherlin-Meade Tobacco Co., 107 Va. 787, 790, 60 S. E. 132, it appears that an affidavit in attachment which the Code required to be made by the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, was signed by the secretary and treasurer of the corporation.

The court held that this affidavit did not show on its face that it was made by an agent of the corporation, the court not taking judicial knowledge of the fact that such officer was, virtute officii, the agent of the corporation.

In the instant case it appears that a salesman of the Supply Company and its acting secretary, in a conversation with Davis after the latter had ceased to be an agent for the Supply Company, was apprised that Davis had the Garman car for sale. It is not established nor sought to be established that this knowledge was secured by McGuire while acting within the sphere of his duty and attending to the business of his company. Nor does it in any wise appear that it was McGuire's duty to report the information thus secured to the general officers or agents of his company.

Hence, under the circumstances revealed, McGuire's knowledge was not the knowledge of the Supply Company, and, if this casual communication of information by Davis is to be regarded as notice to McGuire, it was not notice to the Farmers' Supply Company.

[2] The elimination of this feature of the instant case leaves remaining for determination the inquiry whether the holder of a lien such as was reserved in this case, valid in all respects in its inception and recordation, shall be deprived of the benefit of same by the supervening act of his vendee who sells the same to a dealer without the knowledge of his vendor, thereby allowing the mortgage chattel to become a part of a shifting stock, and in the result to be sold to a bona fide purchaser for value, and without knowledge or notice of the contract.

The facts upon which the decision rests in the case of Boice v. Finance & Guaranty Company are widely different from the facts in the case in judgment.

Gordon, a licensed dealer in automobiles, with a salesroom and storeroom on Broad street in the city of Richmond, purchased certain automobiles from the National Company. He borrowed the money with which he paid for these automobiles from a Guaranty Company in Baltimore, Md. To secure the notes given for this borrowed money, he executed a chattel mortgage which was duly recorded in the city of Richmond. Thereafter the automobiles in question passed into and became a part of his stock in trade in his salesroom. C. Boice, the plaintiff in error, purchased and paid for one of these cars, on which a balance of purchase money, secured as aforesaid, was still due. Thereupon the guaranty company brought an action of detinue to recover possession of the automobile. The evidence showed that the guaranty company was aware that Gordon was exposing and offering for sale to the general public the automobiles in his showroom or salesroom, and that the automobiles upon which the chattel mortgages were given were bought for sale and placed in said salesroom for that purpose. The question presented was, Who had the superior claim to the automobile, Boice or the guaranty company? Boice was a subsequent purchaser for value from Gordon, without actual notice of the existence of the mortgage. The court held that—"If the owner stands by, and permits a seller who is a licensed dealer in such goods to hold himself out to the world as owner to treat the goods as his own, to place them with other similar goods of his own in a public showroom, and offer the same indiscriminately with his own to the public, he will be estopped by his conduct from asserting his ownership against a purchaser for value without notice of his title.

"The constructive notice furnished by a recorded mortgage or deed of trust in such cases is not sufficient. The act of knowingly permitting the goods to be so handled and used by the seller in the ordinary and usual conduct of his business is just as destructive of the rights of the creditor as if such permission had been expressly granted in the mortgage, or deed of trust." Boice v. Finance & Guaranty Co., 127 Va. 563, 102 S. E. 591, 10 A. L. R. 654.

It will be noted in this case that the owner loses his lien because his conduct estops him from enforcing it. No such situation is presented in the instant case. The Supply Company sold a car to the Garman, not to become part of a shifting stock on exhibit for sale, but for their personal use. A lien for the deferred balance of purchase money on this car was reserved in a written contract, pursuant to the statute, and a memorandum thereof duly recorded in the clerk's office of the county of the vendee's residence.

[3] The vendor was not aware of the subsequent sale to Davis, and did not "stand by and permit" Davis to place the car in his salesroom, and offer the same for sale to the public. Hence there is no estoppel by conduct. The sole ground upon which the Supply Company could be deprived of its lien in the instant case would be upon the theory that, after a lien is reserved under section 5189, it is the duty of the vendor to keep track of the chattel, and, if it is sold to a dealer, and becomes part of a shifting stock, to take prompt and appropriate steps to preserve his lien, and prevent a sale to an innocent purchaser. There is nothing in section 5189 to indicate that the General Assembly, when it gave the lien which that section affords, intended to place upon the vendor the duty of following the subsequent course of the chattel sold by him, and, failing in this duty, incur the penalty of losing his lien in the event that in the ultimate such chattel without his knowledge became a part of a shifting stock, and was sold to an innocent purchaser. It would be unreasonable to place such an interpretation upon the statute. The controlling principle asserted and established in Bolce v. Finance & Guaranty Corporation, supra, is that the company's conduct was as destructive of its right to assert its lien as if it had expressly included in the mortgage provisions adequate to defeat its purposes. It is not perceived that the Law and chancery court of the city of Roanoke erred in upholding the lien in question, and its action in that respect is sustained. It is considered, however, that to the extent of the balance due to the Supply Company upon the car in question, should the appellant pay the same, or said balance be recovered by the said company by means of sale of the automobile under the decree under review, the Supply Company should and is hereby required to assign the notes of said Garmans, above mentioned, together with the lien upon the automobile, to the said Rudolph, without recourse as to said company.

Affirmed.

LYNCH et al. v. CLINCH MOTOR CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 71(3)—Order refusing to dissolve injunction appealable.

An appeal will lie from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 447—Appeal from order refusing to dissolve injunction does not forestall order at final hearing.

The granting of an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction does not forestall the order to be made at final hearing.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 863—Matters not finally decided on appeal from order refusing to dissolve injunction.

On an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction restraining defendants from entering the automobile business, made before final hearing, conflicting affidavits leave the matter in too much doubt for final decision, so that the cause should be remanded for proofs necessary to final determination.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County.

Bill by R. T. Sutton and another, copartners as the Clinch Motor Company, against T. B. Lynch and another, to enjoin defendants from entering the automobile business. From an order refusing to dissolve the injunction, granted in accordance with the prayer of the bill, the defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed without prejudice.

Burns & Kidd and Bird & Lively, all of Lebanon, for appellants.

Finnery & Wilson and S. B. Quillen, all of Lebanon, for appellees.

BURKS, J. R. T. Sutton and C. B. Sutton, partners as Clinch Motor Company, filed their bill in equity to enjoin T. B. Lynch and Joe Monk from going into the automobile and garage business at Lebanon, in Russell county, Va., in violation of their alleged contract not to do so within a given time. Lynch and Monk had been engaged in that business as partners, under the firm name of Lebanon Garage & Machine Company, for some time prior to January 13, 1919, and both partnerships were so engaged on that date, when the following contract was entered into:

"This contract, made this the 13th day of January, 1919, by and between Lebanon Garage & Machine Company, hereinafter known as the party of the first part, and Clinch Motor Company, hereinafter known as party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That party of the first part this day sell to party of the second part their garage and shop equipment and accessories, which includes Ford and Maxwell parts; party of the first part agrees to sell party of the second part their parts, accessories, shop equipment, and building at cost, plus expense of placing same in stock; party of the first part agrees to not go into garage or automobile business within 3 years from the above-mentioned date, within a radius of twenty miles on either side of Lebanon, Russell county, Va. [Signed] L. C. Mch. Co., by Joe Monk, Party of the First Part. Clinch Motor Co., by R. T. Sutton, Mgr., Party of the Second Part."

Soon after this contract was entered into a corporation was organized and chartered to do a rival business in the town of Lebanon, in which both Lynch and Monk became officers and active participants in the business. The original bill was a pure bill of injunction, but soon after it was filed an amended bill was filed, making some changes in and additions to the original bill, and the prayer of the bill was enlarged, so as to ask that the defendants be required to compensate the complainants for the damages already done, and for the ascertainment of such damages by proper accounts to be ordered and taken. The application for the injunction, of which notice had been duly given, was to have been heard on January 13, 1920, but owing to causes for which the complainants were not responsible was not heard till March 10, 1920. In the meantime the bill had been amended, and the motion was heard on the original and amended bills, the demurrers and answers to each, and upon affidavits filed by the complainants and the defendants. Written briefs were also filed by counsel on both sides. Upon this hearing the demurrers were overruled, and the injunction was awarded as prayed for on March 10, 1920. On April 20, 1920, the defendants gave notice that they would move to dissolve the injunction on April 29, 1920. On the latter date the motion to dissolve was heard upon the pleadings and affidavits heard at the original hearing, and on the affidavits of the parties thereafter made, and on certain written motions filed by the defendants which need not now be considered. The court took time to consider of its judgment, and by an order entered June 18, 1920, refused to dissolve the injunction. From this order the present appeal was taken.

[1] The right to appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction seems to be settled in this state, and is placed on the ground that it adjudicates the principles of the case. It is said that—

"The refusal to dissolve the injunction adjudicated the principle to this extent: That the injunction had not been improvidently awarded, and that as the cause then stood it ought to still be continued. It is therefore such an order as may be appealed from." Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. City of Wheeling, 13 Grat. (54 Va.) 40, 59.

See, also, Kahn v. Kerngood, 80 Va. 342; Bristow v. Home Building Co., 91 Va. 18, 23, 20 S. E. 946, 947; Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Old Dominion B. Co., 97 Va. 89, 90, 33 S. E. 385.

[2] But the granting of the appeal does not in any way forestall the order to be made at the hearing. It simply operates to put the case on the docket of this court for such order to be made therein at the hearing as appears to be right and proper.

A number of questions of great interest and importance were raised, and they have been discussed before us in briefs of more than ordinary ability, and with a very full citation of authority. Some of them are pure questions of law, that might be disposed of on the present record; others are dependent on the facts. On the former, we do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion, but will reserve our opinion until the case can be heard on the facts also.

[3] It will be observed that no testimony was taken in the cause, but that it was heard on purely ex parte affidavits. Among the questions discussed in the briefs were the power of Monk to make the contract; whether the same embraced the "good will" of the sellers' business; whether the contract was of such nature as to be void because in restraint of trade; whether or not the contract had been ratified by Lynch, if not originally authorized by him; and whether or not the complainants were barred of relief by reason of their laches in the enforcement of their rights. It is readily observed that most, or all of these questions, will be seriously affected by the facts of the case, and these have not been fully or sufficiently presented. The facts are to be gathered chiefly from the parties themselves, two on each side. None of them has been sworn to tell the whole truth, and each has apparently presented his side of the case, and has left unsaid facts material to a correct determination of the case. On some of the most material points the affidavits are in direct conflict. Both cannot be true. The transaction was of such nature that the parties thereto must have known facts which are not stated in their affidavits. These facts would most probably have been developed on cross-examination, and the accuracy of the witnesses' statements would have been tested by details not contained in the affidavits, but neither party has had the opportunity of cross-examining the other's witnesses. The conflicting affidavits leave the facts of the case in too much doubt and uncertainty to form a safe basis for the determination of the rights of the parties. The practice of receiving affidavits on an application for an injunction, or on a motion to dissolve, is too well established in this state to require the citation of authority, but they are not entitled to the same weight as depositions taken after notice to the opposite party and an opportunity for cross-examination. It is true that on a pure bill of injunction very summary proceedings are allowed, and are sometimes necessary, but they must be compatible with the correct decision of the case in question. As well said by Moncure, J., in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Wheeling, ubi supra:

"Irreparable mischief may be done, not only by denying, but also by granting and refusing to dissolve an injunction."

The case in judgment is of that nature. Very serious, if not irreparable, damage may be done to one or the other of the parties if the case is decided on the present record. The case should be remanded for proof in the usual form, and then heard on its merits.

The appeal will therefore be dismissed as prematurely awarded, at the costs of the appellants, but without prejudice in any way to their rights.

O'QUINN v. HAZEL LAND CORPORATION et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Judicial sales  $\S$ 27(2)—Purchaser, cast in judgment for failure to complete purchase, held not entitled to reimbursement from proceeds of further sales.

Purchaser at sale of land at suits of holders of several liens, failing to complete his purchase and compelled to pay loss incurred by resale for lesser amount, was not entitled to reimbursement from surplus from proceeds of sales of other lands of the debtor in the same proceedings, or entitled to subject other lands sold by the debtor to his claim for reimbursement by virtue of an agreement between him and the debtor, unknown to the subsequent purchasers, that he should be saved harmless by reason of his purchase; his remedy, if any, being against the debtor on such agreement.

2. Lis pendens  $\S$ 26(1) — Lands subject to owner's debts in inverse order of alienation.

If a purchaser at judicial sale, compelled to pay loss sustained by his failure to complete the purchase, was entitled to reimbursement for such loss out of lands sold by the debtor pending the proceedings, the lands first aliened would be last subject to such claim.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Petition of W. O'Quinn in numerous creditors' suits against J. P. Laforce, which were heard together for enforcing liens. Sale was ordered, at which W. O'Quinn purchased six tracts of land. Failing to pay purchase money, the land was resold, resulting in a deficit, for which judgment was taken against O'Quinn, which he paid in full, and between the time of sale and resale the Hazel Land Corporation purchased of the debtor certain other tracts, which were subsequently sold, resulting in a surplus, and O'Quinn petitioned to be reimbursed therefrom for the judgment he had paid, and from a decree sustaining a demurrer by the Hazel Land Corporation and others to the petition, and dismissing the petition, O'Quinn appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Phipps, and S. H. & G. C. Sutherland, all of Clintwood, for appellant.

Chase & McCoy, of Clintwood, Harman & Probst, of Tazewell, for appellees.

KELLY, P. This is an appeal from a decree sustaining a demurrer to a petition interposed by W. O'Quinn in several lien creditors' suits against one J. P. Laforce and others.

Laforce owned a number of tracts of land, some of which were incumbered by deeds of trust, and all of which were subject to the liens of sundry judgments against him. Numerous suits were brought from time to time, all of which were finally heard together, for the purpose of enforcing the liens aforesaid against the Laforce lands. There was a report of the liens by a commissioner, and a judicial sale ordered, at which six certain tracts of land owned by Laforce (being only a portion of his real estate) were purchased by W. O'Quinn at the aggregate price of $3,160, for which he gave his notes, with personal surety, payable in one, two, and three years. This sale was confirmed on condition that the costs and commissions should be paid within 30 days; otherwise, a new sale was to be made on the same terms as in the previous decree. It does not affirmatively appear from that portion of the record in the aforesaid chancery causes accompanying the petition now before us that this condition was ever complied with, but the clear inference is that it was, for the record in hand does disclose that the sale thereafter was dealt with by the court, the commissioner, and the parties, including O'Quinn, as having been duly confirmed.

O'Quinn failed to pay his purchase-money notes, and after due service of a rule against him and his sureties to show cause why the lands should not be resold at their risk, a resale was ordered and made, which resulted in a loss or deficit of $1,584.54 in the fund belonging to the creditors, for which a judgment was duly rendered against O'Quinn and his sureties, and afterwards paid in full by O'Quinn.

While the aforesaid suits were pending, but before there had been any decree of sale therein, J. P. Laforce sold and conveyed to Harrison Austin 59 acres of land, and Austin thereafter conveyed a part thereof to W. J. Leftwich. This 59 acres was affected by some of the judgments against Laforce, but having been among the first aliened by him was, of course, to be among the last subjected to his debts. It was not one of the six tracts sold to O'Quinn.

Subsequently, but before the sale was made to O'Quinn, by decree of October 14, 1914, J. P. Laforce was permitted to convey to W. M. Ritter Lumber Company 139 acres of land involved in the litigation for $1,700, which sum was paid into court, and the liens as to the land thus sold and conveyed were transferred therefrom to the fund thus arising.

And between the date of the original sale to O'Quinn and the resale at his risk, J. N. Harman, trustee, acting on behalf of the Hazel Land Corporation, purchased from J. P. Laforce four tracts of land and 1,000 standing trees, all of which were subject to some or all of the liens sought to be enforced in the aforesaid chancery suit, but none of which had been sold therein. It therefore appeared that at the time of the purchase by Harman for the Hazel Land Corporation there was a fund in court represented by the notes of O'Quinn and his surety for $3,160 available to owners of the liens sought to be enforced.

The proceeds of the lands sold to the W. M. Ritter Lumber Company and of the six tracts sold first to O'Quinn (and afterwards to another purchaser, with a judgment over against O'Quinn for the deficit), and of certain other lands sold in the cause, but not necessary to be further referred to herein, not being sufficient to pay all of the liens against the real estate owned by Laforce, the several causes were again referred to a commissioner to ascertain the other lands of Laforce not theretofore sold which were liable to the judgments and liens remaining unsatisfied. The commissioner reported among other things that a certain 5-acre tract should be first sold; that the Hazel Land Corporation property should be next sold; that a certain 1-acre tract should come next; that the Harrison Austin and W. J. Leftwich land should be sold as fourth in order of priority, and so on as to other tracts in the inverse order of their alienation by Laforce. This report was confirmed, and a sale ordered and made accordingly, but it was unnecessary to go beyond the Hazel Land Corporation tract to satisfy the liens. As a matter of fact it developed that the Hazel Land Corporation property (exclusive of the standing trees), which was bought by H. Claude Pobst at the price of $2,245, was more than sufficient to pay off all the liens, and there remained in the hands of the court a surplus fund of about $1,000 realized from the sale of the latter property. Thereupon O'Quinn filed his petition, in which he prayed that he be awarded the $1,000 surplus, and that the unsold lands of J. P. Laforce and the Austin and Leftwich land and the 1,000 trees aforesaid, owned by the Hazel Land Corporation, be sold "to reimburse petitioner."

This very remarkable claim on the part of appellant seeks a foundation in the following extract from the petition setting up the claim:

"Your petitioner would further state that before he bid at the sale by Special Commissioner Geo. C. Sutherland, he was surety on the $475 judgment owing to T. G. Kiser (a joint judgment against Laforce and O'Quinn), and, as the lands of J. P. Laforce were being sold to satisfy that as well as other liens, your petitioner was anxious to see all of the said J. P. Laforce debts paid in order to save petitioner harmless, and that before the sale of said tracts by Commissioner Sutherland in which petitioner became the purchaser, J. P. Laforce told petitioner to bid the land off for said amount, and if petitioner would do so, he, J. P. Laforce, assured him that he, the said J. P. Laforce, would sell the other tracts of land owned by him, said J. P. Laforce, or execute deeds of trust, as well as on other property, and, if necessary, the tracts which were sold by Special Commissioner Sutherland and bid in by this petitioner, and from the money thus realized by deeds of trust or other sales, the said J. P. Laforce would pay off all the debts and the notes executed by this petitioner to said Commissioner Sutherland. This petitioner would also state that he knew, and was fully aware, the said J. P. Laforce owned other lands, and petitioner was willing that the said J. P. Laforce should take all of his lands (that which was unsold as well as the portion being sold by Commissioner Sutherland) and sell the same, or obtain the money by deeds of trust or otherwise, and pay off and discharge all of the judgments, including the one to T. G. Kiser, for which petitioner was surety, and also pay and satisfy the notes which petitioner executed to Commissioner Sutherland for the lands bid in by him. Petitioner also knew that the lands were of sufficient value to enable the said J. P. Laforce to sell the same and discharge all the judgments and liens against the same, including the notes executed by petitioner to Commissioner Sutherland, and, relying upon the representations and statements of said J. P. Laforce that he would sell all or such amount of his lands as would discharge all liens against the same, and the notes executed by this petitioner to Commissioner Sutherland, your petitioner made the said bids at the sale by the said Commissioner Sutherland; and that he would not have made said bids and executed said notes had it not been for the representations made by the said J. P. Laforce; for this was the inducing cause and motive. And petitioner would further state that after said notes were executed to Commissioner Sutherland, and after the rule was served upon him and his sureties, the said J. P. Laforce still assured this petitioner that he would, in the manner he had represented, pay off and discharge the liens as well as the notes executed by petitioner to Commissioner Sutherland, and assured this petitioner that he need not give the matter any notice or concern, and thereby lulled this petitioner into a sense of security, which caused him not to attend the other sales of the lands afterwards made in these causes."

To the foregoing petition the Hazel Land Corporation, Harrison Austin, and W. J. Leftwich demurred upon several grounds, among which were the following:

"(2) That the alleged agreement between O'Quinn and Laforce was a private matter in which the demurrants were not interested.

"(3) That the purchase by W. O'Quinn of the six tracts of land at the judicial sale for $3,160 was a new and independent obligation on his part to the court, and any loss suffered by him thereunder is his individual loss, and cannot be asserted against the lands of demurrants; that O'Quinn simply had the verbal promise of J. P. Laforce to make sale of his lands, or borrow the money thereon, and pay off his own indebtedness, and also pay the notes which O'Quinn executed to the court for the six tracts purchased at the judicial sale for $3,160, and that such agreement would not give a lien on any lands of J. P. Laforce, or give him the right of subrogation to the lien of any lienholder, or prevent J. P. Laforce from selling his lands.

"(4) * * * That even if such an agreement should place an obligation on Laforce to reimburse O'Quinn for the $3,160 bid by O'Quinn at the judicial sale of the six tracts of land, it would be an open account of O'Quinn against Laforce, without lien or equity of any kind; and that in no event would such an agreement affect the lands of demurrants."

The court sustained the demurrers, dismissed the petition as to the Hazel Land Corporation and Austin and Leftwich, directed that the $1,000 surplus realized from the sale of the Hazel Land Corporation's land be paid over to it, and provided that process should issue upon the petition against J. P. Laforce if the petitioner should so request. It is from this decree that the present appeal was allowed.

[1] The foregoing statement of the case is greatly abridged from the account thereof contained in the petition upon which the decree complained of was rendered. The outline we have given, however, embraces all the facts appearing in the petition which are essential to a proper decision of the controversy; and from that outline it is manifest that there is no error in the decree to the prejudice of the appellant. To state the case is to decide it.

The relief sought by O'Quinn was based upon his alleged relationship as surety for Laforce. If this relationship existed, except as to the $475 judgment against him and Laforce, it arose from the verbal agreement set out in the petition and quoted above. Neither as to the judgment nor as to the agreement did the Hazel Land Corporation have any notice of the alleged relationship of surety on O'Quinn's part. He became a purchaser just as any other stranger might have done, and raised none of the questions which he is now raising until after his own default had been in large measure the cause of the situation of which he here complains. He gave his obligations in a new and independent contract with the court, failed to meet these obligations or to show any reason why he should not do so, and permitted the lands to be resold at his risk, with a resulting loss. If he has any recourse, it is against Laforce, and this recourse was expressly offered him by the decree complained of.

[2] As to the Austin and Leftwich lands, it is sufficient to say that there is no possible view of the case in which O'Quinn can justly ask that they be sold for his benefit. They were among the first of the lands to be aliened by Laforce, and the proceeds of other lands liable in advance of the former fully satisfied the liens sought to be enforced.

The decree complained of is affirmed.

Affirmed.

ALLS et al. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Ball  $\S$  82—Need not show that recognizance sought to be forfeited was in legal form.

The purpose of a writ of scire facias to forfeit a recognizance is merely to give notice to defendant of application for award of execution to enable him to show cause why the recognizance should not be forfeited, and it need not show on its face that the recognizance was in legal form, and need not recite all conditions of the recognizance, being sufficient if it identifies the recognizance.

2. Ball  $\S$  58, 59—Recognizance held valid.

A recognizance was not invalid because it did not require the defendant to appear before the court, or any court, but only before the judge, or because language therein, "to answer said indictment," was not sufficiently definite to identify the indictment, and hence not equivalent to statutory requirement that condition of recognizance should be that the defendant shall appear "to answer for the offense with which such person is charged," it appearing in the caption in which the form of the recognizance appeared that the indictment was for violation of the Prohibition Law, in view of Code 1919, §§ 4973, 4981.

3. Ball  $\S$  58—Recognizance need only point out offense.

If the language used in a recognizance is sufficiently definite to point out the offense with which the person who is let to bail is charged, there is a compliance with Code 1919, § 4973.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Proceeding by the Commonwealth against Leslie Alls and another to forfeit a recognizance. Judgment for the State, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

On October 6, 1920, the following order was entered in this case, to wit:

"Commonwealth of Virginia v. Leslie Alls.

"Violation of the Prohibition Law.

"This day came the attorney for the commonwealth, and the defendant, Leslie Alls, who stands indicted for a misdemeanor returned by the grand jury at this term of court, on being solemnly called came not, whereupon the attorney for the commonwealth moved for a forfeiture of the defendant's recognizance, executed and given for his appearance on this day, which motion is docketed; and it is ordered that a scire facias be issued by the clerk, directed to the sheriff of the county, against the surety, H. J. Alls, returnable on the first day of the next term of this court, to show cause, if any he can, why said recognizance should not be forfeited and a judgment entered against said surety for the amount thereof."

Accordingly, on October 8, 1920, the following scire facias issued:

"Whereas, on the 2d day of October, 1920, Leslie Alls and H. J. Alls personally appeared before the judge of the circuit court of Montgomery county, Va., and acknowledged themselves indebted to the commonwealth of Virginia, the said Leslie Alls in the sum of $500, and the said H. J. Alls in the like sum of $500, of their respective goods and chattels, lands and tenements to be levied, and to the said commonwealth rendered, yet upon condition that if the said Leslie Alls should personally appear before the judge of our circuit court for said county, on the 1st day of October, 1920, for violation of the Prohibition Laws of this state (Laws 1918, c. 388), and should not depart thence without the leave of the said court, then the said recognizance was to be void; and,

"Whereas, the said Leslie Alls has failed to make his personal appearance before the judge of our said court, at the time and place aforesaid, according to the condition of said recognizance as appears of record:

"Therefore we command you that you make known to the said Leslie Alls and H. J. Alls that they do be before the judge of our said circuit court, on the first day of the December term, 1920, to show cause, if any they can, why said commonwealth, execution against them, the said Leslie Alls and H. J. Alls, of the several sums of money aforesaid, ought not to have, if to us it shall seem expedient: and further to do and receive what our said judge then and there of them in this part shall consider.

"And have then and there this writ.

"Witness, Archer P. Johnson, clerk of our said court, at the courthouse, on the 8th day of October, 1920, and in the 145 year of the commonwealth.

"Archer P. Johnson, Clerk."

The defendants, the appellants, demurred to the scire facias on the grounds that it shows on its face that the recognizance taken in the case did not require the defendant Leslie Alls (a) to appear before the court or any court, or (b) "to answer for the offense with which such person is charged," as required by section 4973 of the Code; and also on the ground that the recognizance imposed no legal liability upon the defendants because it is not sufficiently definite so as to point to and designate the offense for which the defendant Leslie Alls was required thereby to answer.

The recognizance appears from the order of court entered October 2, 1920, which, together with its caption, is in the record before us as follows:

"Commonwealth of Virginia v. Leslie Alls.
"Violation of the Prohibition Law.

"This day came the attorney for the commonwealth, and the defendant, Leslie Alls, was led to the bar in the custody of the sheriff. And this case is continued until the 6th day of October, 1920. Whereupon the said Leslie Alls and H. J. Alls, his surety, entered into a recognizance in the penalty of $500, to be levied of their respective lands and tenements, goods and chattels, and unto the commonwealth to be rendered; yet upon the condition that if the said Leslie Alls shall make his appearance before the judge of this court on the 6th day of October, 1920, to answer said indictment, and not depart thence without leave of our said judge, and be of good behavior towards all citizens of this commonwealth, and not violate any of the provisions of chapter 388 of the Acts of 1918, then this recognizance to be null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

On the return day of the scire facias, December 1, 1920, the court overruled the demurrer aforesaid to the scire facias, and, on motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, entered judgment upon the recognizance against the defendants. It is of this action of the trial court that the defendants complain.

V. M. Sowder, of Christiansburg, and R. L. Jordan, of Radford, for appellants.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. Was the scire facias invalid on demurrer thereto, because it failed to show on its face that the recognizance was in legal form?

This question must be answered in the negative.

As held in Bolanz et al. v. Commonwealth, 24 Grat. (65 Va.) 31, the purpose of the writ of scire facias is merely to give notice to the defendant of an application for award of execution upon the recognizance, to enable him to show cause, if any he can, why the recognizance should not be forfeited. If the terms of the scire facias are definite enough to so designate the recognizance as to unmistakably identify it as the recognizance upon which execution will be asked, the scire facias is sufficient. In such case a variance between the language of the scire facias and that of the recognizance is immaterial, and the validity of the judgment and execution will depend upon the validity of the recognizance itself. Allen's Case, 90 Va. 356, 18 S. E. 437; Fulks' Case, 94 Va. 585, 27 S. E. 498; Bolanz v. Commonwealth, supra.

In the instant case the scire facias gave the defendants unmistakable notice of the particular recognizance upon which execution would be asked, namely, the recognizance which the defendants had entered into on October 2, 1920, in the case of Commonwealth v. Leslie Alls, in which the latter had been indicted on October 1, 1920, in the circuit court of Montgomery county, Va., for violating the prohibition laws of the state, which recognizance was in the penalty of $500 as to each of the defendants, and upon condition that the said Leslie Alls should personally appear before the judge of said court on the 6th of October, 1920, etc.

It is true that the scire facias does not correctly recite all of the conditions of the recognizance. But that, as aforesaid, is immaterial, since it otherwise identifies the recognizance, which speaks for itself. Indeed, in the second "whereas" clause of the scire facias, "the condition of the recognizance as appears of record" is expressly referred to.

[2] 2. Was the recognizance itself invalid (a) because it did not require the defendant Leslie Alls to appear before the court or any court, but only before the judge of the court, or (b) because the language therein, "to answer said indictment," was not sufficiently definite to point to and identify the indictment, and, hence is not equivalent to the statutory requirement that the condition of the recognizance shall be that the defendant who is let to bail shall appear "to answer for the offense with which such person is charged."

The whole question must be answered in the negative.

(a) As to the appearance of the defendant who is let to bail, which a recognizance should require, this should be said:

Section 4973 of the Code of 1919 provides as follows:

"The condition when it is taken of a person charged with a criminal offense shall be that he appear before the court, judge, or justice before whom the proceedings on such charge will be at such time as may be prescribed by the court or officer taking it to answer for the offense with which such person is charged."

Further:

Section 4981 of the Code of 1919 provides as follows:

"Defects in form of recognizance not to defeat action or judgment. No action or judgment on a recognizance shall be defeated or arrested by reason of any defect in the form of the recognizance, if it appear to have been taken by a court or officer authorized to take it, and be substantially sufficient."

It will be observed that the statute, section 4973 of the Code, does not require the place of the appearance to be stated in the recognizance, and the language of the statute is such that it is immaterial whether the recognizance requires the appearance to be before "the court [or] judge * * * before whom the proceedings on [the] charge will be." And, it appearing in the case before us that the recognizance was "taken by a court, or officer, authorized to take it," the recognizance was certainly "substantially sufficient" in the particular now under consideration, namely, in its condition that the defendant Leslie Alls "shall make his personal appearance before the judge of this court," etc., and hence the recognizance is valid under the statute in so far as such particular is concerned.

(b) As to whether the language of the recognizance "to answer said indictment" is equivalent to the statutory requirement that the condition of the recognizance shall be that the defendant who is let to bail shall appear "to answer for the offense with which such person is charged," this should be said:

[3] It is well settled that by the statute (section 4973 of the Code) no particular form of language is prescribed for a recognizance in the particular now under consideration. If the language used in the recognizance is sufficiently definite to point out the offense with which the defendant who is let to bail is charged, it is a compliance with the statute. Allen's Case, 90 Va. 356, 18 S. E. 437; Bolanz v. Commonwealth, supra.

In Allen's Case the condition of the recognizance, as it appeared in the order of the court, was for the appearance of the defendant let to bail "to answer the charge against him." The court held that—

" * * * The language * * * is sufficiently definite, as it points out the only offense with which the prisoner stood charged."

In the case before us the caption of the order of court, in which the form of the recognizance appears, while not a part of the order itself, is a part of the record of the court below and before us. Robinson v. Commonwealth, 88 Va. 900, 14 S. E. 627. Hence they must be read along with each other. When the order of court is read along with its caption, it plainly appears that the condition of the recognizance was for the appearance of the defendant Leslie Alls to answer the indictment against him in the case of the commonwealth against him for violation of the Prohibition Law. This identifies the indictment referred to, and fixes it as a single indictment in that particular case. Hence it points out, identifies and designates unmistakably, the offense for which such defendant was required to answer.

The judgment under review will be affirmed.

HARLEY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  1092(8)—Bills of exception, not filed within 60 days after final judgment, not considered, though execution on judgment was suspended.

Bills of exception, not being applied for or obtained within 60 days after final judgment, as required by Code 1919,  $\S$  6252, they are not part of the record, and assignment of error based thereon cannot be considered, though execution of the judgment was suspended under section 6338.

2. Criminal law  $\S$  951(4)—Motion to set aside verdict for after-discovered evidence must be made at trial term.

The trial court's jurisdiction ends with the term, and it has no power thereafter to set aside a verdict for after-discovered evidence.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  1031(1)—Objection to sufficiency of warrant cannot be raised for first time on appeal.

Where no objection was made in the trial court to the sufficiency of the warrant to state the disorderly conduct complained of the objection cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

4. Criminal law  $\S$  1031(1)—Venue in warrant in prosecutions for petty misdemeanors not essential.

In prosecution for disorderly conduct, under Code,  $\S$  4533, that venue was not laid in the warrant, no objection being made at the trial court, and no motion made to correct it, under Code 1919,  $\S$  4989, is not ground for reversal, especially in view of section 4992, providing for trial without warrant, and section 4990, for trial on appeal without formal pleadings.

Error to Hustings Court of Richmond.

One Harley was convicted of disorderly conduct, and she brings error. Affirmed.

A. O. Boschen and M. J. Fulton, both of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. The plaintiff in error, hereinafter called the defendant, was convicted by a justice for disorderly conduct on a street car, and sentenced to pay a fine of $10. She appealed to the hustings court, part II, of the city of Richmond, where the case was heard de novo and the trial was by jury. The jury found her guilty and imposed a fine of $10, which the trial court refused to set aside, and upon which it entered up judgment. To that judgment a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court, pursuant to the statute providing that—"In all criminal cases where petition for a writ of error is presented the same shall be granted as a matter of right." Acts 1920, c. 300.

It is assigned as error: (1) That the venue is not laid in the warrant of arrest; (2) that the warrant does not specify any act of disorderly conduct; (3) that the court erred in giving an instruction for the commonwealth; (4) that the court erred in permitting certain questions to be asked and answered; and (5) that the court erred in overruling defendant's motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence. The last three assignments are dependent upon the bills of exception taken to support them. If the bills of exception are not parts of the record, these assignments cannot be considered.

[1] Final judgment was entered against the defendant on February 10, 1920, and the court adjourned before the first Monday in March. The bills of exception were not applied for or obtained until May 8, 1920, which was not within the 60 days after final judgment, as required by section 6252 of the Code. The bills of exception are not parts of the record, and hence the assignments of error based thereon cannot be considered. Bragg v. Justus, 129 Va. —, 106 S. E. 335. The fact that execution of the judgment was suspended under the provisions of section 6338 of the Code did not affect the finality of the judgment in that court.

[2] A motion was also made to set aside the verdict for after-discovered evidence, but the motion was not made until after the adjournment of the term at which the final judgment was entered. The jurisdiction of the trial court over the case ended with the adjournment of the term, and it had no power to grant the motion. Allen v. Commonwealth, 114 Va. 826, 77 S. E. 66.

[3] No objection was made in the trial court to the sufficiency of the warrant in any respect, and no demurrer thereto was interposed, and the defendant cannot raise the objection for the first time in this court that the warrant does not specify the acts of disorderly conduct complained of. If the specification was necessary, it could, and doubtless would, have been readily supplied. It is too late now to raise the objection.

[4] In case of indictments, especially for serious offenses, venue must be alleged and proved. Early's Case, 93 Va. 765, 24 S. E. 936; Fitch's Case, 92 Va. 824, 24 S. E. 272; Anderson's Case, 100 Va. 860, 42 S. E. 965; West v. Commonwealth, 125 Va. 747, 99 S. E. 654. But in prosecutions for petty misdemeanors the same particularity is not expected or required in the charge made in the warrant, and where no objection to the warrant is made in the trial court, and no motion is made to correct it, under the comprehensive provisions of section 4989 of the Code, this court will not reverse the judgment of the trial court for formal imperfections of the warrant, unless the ends of justice require it.

In Flint v. Commonwealth, 114 Va. 820, 822, 76 S. E. 308, 309, it is said:

"As has been said by this court frequently, the same exactness and precision is not required in the statement of an offense where it is to be heard upon a warrant as in more formal proceedings by information or indictment. In this case it appears, further, that the defendant made no objection whatever to the form of the warrant in the corporation court. Had he then objected, whatever formal defects may have appeared in the warrant could have been cured.

"As was said in Robinson v. Commonwealth, 111 Va. 844, 69 S. E. 518: 'Under the broad powers conferred upon the trial court, by section 4107 of the Code, it was entirely competent for the court, of its own motion, pending the trial of an appeal from the justice of the peace, to direct the attorney for the commonwealth to change the warrant from an attempt to commit larceny of oats to an attempt to obtain money by false pretenses. While it would have been more regular, perhaps, to have directed the change to have been made before the trial began, yet where the prisoner did not ask for a continuance, and there is nothing to indicate that he was prejudiced by the amendment during the trial, the irregularity is harmless.'

"We think, therefore, that if there were formal objections to the warrant, the court had ample power, under the statute, to amend it, and that the accused cannot be permitted to go to trial upon a warrant which the court had full power to amend, and after verdict and judgment, for the first time, to make known his objection."

If the defendant had been arrested by a police officer without a warrant she might have been tried and convicted without any warrant, unless she demanded that the charge against her be reduced to writing in the form of a warrant (Code, § 4992), and it is expressly provided that if the defendant appeals to the court he shall be entitled to a jury trial, but that "the appeal shall be tried without formal pleadings in writing." Code, § 4990. If the accused may be tried without a warrant in the first instance, unless demanded, if abundant opportunity is afforded to correct the warrant where one has been issued (Code, § 4989), and in either event the appeal is to be tried "without formal pleadings in writing," it would seem to be very plain that this court ought not to reverse the judgment of the trial court simply because the warrant failed to allege the venue of the offense.

It is said in the reply brief that the warrant did not charge the commission of any crime under the laws of this state. It is sufficient answer to quote section 4533 of the Code, which is as follows:

"If any person, whether a passenger or not, shall, while in any car or caboose, or on any part of a train carrying passengers or employees of any railroad or street passenger railway, behave in a riotous or disorderly manner, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The agent or employees in charge of the train, car, or caboose, may require such person to discontinue his riotous or disorderly conduct, and if he refuses to do so may eject him, with the aid, if necessary, of any other persons who may be called upon for the purpose."

The judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

BLANCHARD v. DOMINION NAT. BANK et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Usury  $\S$  47—Note providing for semiannual payments of interest not usurious.

Provision for semiannual payments of interest does not render note usurious, in view of Code 1919, § 5551, relating to legal rate of interest.

2. Interest  $\S$  60—Creditor entitled merely to simple interest, notwithstanding debtor's continuing default in payment of interest at specified periods.

Where the principal of debt is ascertained, and there has been a continuing default in payment of interest, though contract provides for its payment on recurring and for specified periods, the court in settling the account, in the absence of a specific agreement to pay lawful interest on the installments in default, will only allow simple interest on the principal sum due.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County.

Suit by F. T. Blanchard against the Dominion National Bank and others. Decree for the named defendant, and complainant appeals, and the named defendant cross-appeals. Affirmed, as amended.

A. H. Blanchard, of Bristol, Hutton & Hutton, of Abingdon, for plaintiff.

Peters & Lavinder, of Bristol, for defendants.

PRENTIS, J. This is the sequel to the case of Blanchard v. Dominion National Bank, 125 Va. 586, 100 S. E. 463. There the appellant, who was the indorser of certain notes, claimed that they had been paid. That question having been decided against him, the case was remanded for further proceedings. One of the objections then urged is thus stated in that opinion:

"Objection is made to the decree appealed from on the ground that it is uncertain, because it fails to state from what time the amounts due the [plaintiff] should bear interest."

This point is thus decided:

"The decree did not finally dispose of the case, but referred it to a commissioner to take certain accounts, which would of necessity disclose, not only the amount of the bank's claim, but the time from which it bore interest. This decree properly ordered accounts of liens and their priority before directing a sale under the trust deed."

After the former appeal was determined and the case remanded, the commissioner stated the account and compounded the interest on the debt semiannually. The appellant excepted to this, claiming that the amount of the debt was irrevocably fixed by the former decree at $4,584, and that, as no other time was thereby fixed, the interest thereon could only be computed from the date of the decree, October 10, 1918, and also upon the ground that, in case his first exception should be overruled, the commissioner erred in compounding the interest.

At the hearing the court entered a decree in favor of the creditor, Dominion National Bank, for the sum of $4,866.18, with simple interest thereon from June 6, 1914, that being the aggregate of the balance due by the debtor as of that date.

[1] The chief contention of the appellant upon this appeal is that, because the notes provide for semiannual payments of interest thereon, therefore the debt was usurious. No authority is cited supporting this proposition, and so far as we are informed it has never been sustained by any court anywhere.

This is said by the learned annotator in a note to 46 Am. St. Rep. 189:

"The interest specified in these statutes [referring to usury] is usually designated as a certain rate per annum. This has never, so far as we are aware, been considered either as forbidding loans for a short period of time, or as requiring that interest shall be computed at yearly intervals only. On the contrary, it is well settled that interest may be made payable semiannually, or quarterly, or at such recurring periods as may receive the assent of the parties."

And he cites numerous cases to support the text.

In Myer v. Muscatine, 1 Wall. 391, 17 L. Ed. 566, this is said on the subject:

"This objection has no foundation. When a statute fixes the rate of interest per annum, it has always been held that parties may lawfully contract for the payment of that rate, before the principal debt becomes due, at periods shorter than a year"—citing Mowry v. Bishop, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 98.

In Brown v. Vandyke, 8 N. J. Eq. 795, 55 Am. Dec. 250, it was held that an agreement between commission merchants and their customers that rests shall be made in their accounts quarterly, and that interest should be calculated upon the balance thus found to be due quarterly, was not usurious, saying in this connection:

"Business men must be allowed to make their own bargains; and when they do so understandingly, and are not entrapped or deceived, their bargains must be enforced. If the parties dealing with commission merchants agree that rests shall be made quarterly, it has long been settled that such a mode of stating accounts and calculating interest is perfectly legal."

In Goodrich v. Reynolds, Wilder & Co., 31 Ill. 490, 83 Am. Dec. 243, it is held that a reservation in a note that the interest thereon shall be paid semiannually is not usurious. In Gooddale v. Wallace, 19 S. D. 405, 103 N. W. 651, 117 Am. St. Rep. 969, 9 Ann. Cas. 545, it is held that the fact that upon the face of the notes the interest was payable monthly, instead of annually, does not make them usurious.

In Cook v. Courtright, 40 Ohio St. 248, 48 Am. Rep. 681, under a statute which allowed interest at a specified rate "upon the amount of such note payable annually," it was held that the reservation of the prescribed legal rate of interest on the face of the note, but making it payable semiannually, is not usurious.

It is observed in this connection that the Virginia statute provides (Code 1919, § 5551) that—

"Legal interest shall continue to be at the rate of six dollars upon one hundred dollars for a year, and proportionately for a greater or less sum or for a longer or shorter time."

In Brown v. Johnson, 43 Utah, 1, 134 Pac. 590, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1157, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 321, it is also held that, under a statute permitting any rate of interest not exceeding 12 per cent. per annum, a note calling for interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month is not usurious. 27 R. O. L. 229.

To hold that such a contract violates the usury statute of Virginia would be to condemn contracts and business transactions which are of everyday occurrence in this state as well as elsewhere. The statute forbids the taking of a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent., and where the time is 12 months, or more, there is no violation of either the letter or spirit of the statute to contract that the legal rate due shall be payable in installments during the specified period. The point made is without merit.

[2] The court eliminated the compound interest which the commissioner allowed, and this is assigned as cross-error by the bank. While it is true that a debtor may enter into a contract under some circumstances to capitalize overdue interest, and to pay interest thereon, no such contract is shown to exist in this case. Where the principal of the debt is ascertained, and there has been a continuing default in the payment of interest although the contract provides for its payment upon recurring and for specified periods, a court in settling the account, in the absence of a specific agreement to pay lawful interest upon the installments thus in default, will only allow simple interest upon the principal sum due. 46 Am. St. Rep. 190. The decree is without error in this respect.

The notes provide for the payment of 10 per cent. attorney's fees in case the notes should be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, and by authority of this provision the court allowed an attorney's fee of $500. This sum is less than the amount authorized by the contract of the debtor. If he had not appealed from that decree, it is not probable that we would have adjudged the fee insufficient. Inasmuch, however, as the debtor appealed from the decree as a whole, has thus delayed his creditor in the collection of the debt justly due, and is responsible for the expense caused by the litigation thus prolonged, we think that this fee should be increased to compensate for the additional labor thereby imposed. We therefore sustain the cross-error assigned by the appellee, and will provide in our decree for an additional fee of $100, this being within the 10 per cent. limitation specified in the notes.

As thus amended, the decree will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

CORVIN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Divorce $\S$ 328—When divorce decree will be given full faith and credit in other states.

Divorce decree of court in state in which the parties were married, rendered in conformity to the laws of such state, against constructively served defendant who has left the state, will be given full faith and credit in other states under the federal Constitution, but decree granted in state other than that of the matrimonial domicile, in suit by party who has acquired, or who claims to have acquired, a bona fide residence in such other state, without personal service or appearance of other party, is not binding in state of matrimonial domicile under the full faith and credit clause, and its force will depend upon the respect given it by the courts of the state of matrimonial domicile as a matter of comity.

2. Judgment $\S$ 509—Fraud vitiates judicial proceedings, though they appear to be legal in form.

Fraud vitiates judicial proceedings, even where they appear to be legal in form.

3. Divorce $\S$ 329—Decree fraudulently procured held not entitled to full faith and credit in other state in bigamy prosecution.

Where husband, who had forced wife to leave him, obtained a divorce in other state on constructive service by fraud, in that he gave false testimony that wife had abandoned him, and that separation had taken place one year prior to actual date, the decree was not entitled to full faith and credit, under the federal Constitution, in state in which they had lived prior to separation, in prosecution of husband for bigamy following his marriage to and cohabitation with second wife, even though husband acquired a bona fide residence in state in which decree had been rendered.

4. Bigamy $\S$ 2—Fraudulent divorce decree rendered in other state held no defense.

Divorce decree obtained by husband against constructively served wife, in state other than that in which they had lived prior to separation, by means of fraud, held no defense under Code 1919,  $\S$  4538, in prosecution of husband for bigamy in state in which they had lived following his marriage to and cohabitation with second wife; the courts of such state not being bound by the fraudulently obtained decree in other state.

5. Indictment and Information $\S$ 111(3)—Indictment need not negative exceptions in statute not constituting part of the description of the offense.

Indictment charging bigamy in violation of Code 1919,  $\S$  4538, need not negative exceptions contained in section 4539, since such section does not constitute a part of the description of the defense but merely affords the accused certain grounds of defense.

6. Witnesses $\S$ 271(3)—Exclusion of divorce decree offered by defendant during cross-examination of state's witness held proper.

In bigamy prosecution in which defendant claimed to have been divorced from first wife, court's refusal to admit copy of divorce decree during defendant's cross-examination of state's witness as to conversation during which defendant had shown witness copy of divorce decree, on defendant's refusal to adopt the witness as his own, held proper; the admission of the decree being a matter of defense.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1170(3)—Exclusion of evidence subsequently introduced harmless.

In bigamy prosecution exclusion of copy of divorce decree offered by defendant during cross-examination of state's witness held harmless, where it was subsequently introduced.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 759(1)—Refusal to charge that failure of second wife to testify created no presumption held proper in bigamy prosecution.

In bigamy prosecution involving validity of defendant's divorce from first wife, refusal to charge that second wife's failure to testify created no presumption against defendant under Code 1919,  $\S$  6211, held proper in view of issue as to validity of marriage to second wife, since such charge would have been on the facts.

Error to Circuit Court, Wythe County.

L. G. Corvin was convicted of bigamy, and he brings error. Affirmed.

W. S. Poage, S. B. Campbell, and E. Lee Trinkle, all of Wytheville, for appellant.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazlie, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. The accused has been convicted of the crime of bigamy and is here alleging that several errors were committed in the course of the trial.

The fact of his first marriage, to Augusta Sult, as well as the fact of his second marriage while she was still living to Zollie Umberger Sult, the divorced wife of L. A. Sult, the brother of Augusta Sult, are both conceded. The defense is based upon the fact that the accused first obtained a decree of divorce from Augusta Sult Corvin in Barbour county, W. Va., and he relies upon that decree as a bar to this prosecution.

The facts leading up to the prosecution, all of which are pertinent for the consideration of the decisive question to be determined, may be thus stated: He was first married in 1903, in Wythe county, Va., and lived there with his wife for a number of years, but they separated on December 3, 1916. The causes of the separation were his apparent interest in and affection for one Zollie Umberger Sult (she being then the wife of L. A. Sult, his own wife's brother), which conduct, if not criminal, was so notorious as to lead to a breach of intimate relations with his wife followed by separation and ultimately by a divorce, in Virginia, of Zollie Umberger Sult from her husband, L. A. Sult, upon the ground of her intimacy with the accused. The contradicted testimony of Augusta Corvin was that she was a good and faithful wife; that she had to leave her husband because of the relationship existing between him and Mrs. Sult, and that when she remonstrated with him he told her that it was none of her business, and finally that when he got certain business fixed up he and Zollie were going to leave; that he told her (his wife) that either he or she must leave, and that if she did not leave him she would not stay there very long; and that thereupon she obtained refuge at Simon Umberger's house on December 3, 1916. It also appears in the evidence that about the time of the separation the accused saw Simon Umberger, the father of Zollie Umberger Sult, and requested him to advise his wife, Augusta, to sue him for a divorce, and at the same time to advise Sult to sue his wife, Zollie Umberger Sult, for a divorce, so that he (the accused) and Zollie Umberger Sult might marry each other, and at about the same time he also approached Mrs. Walter Umberger, a daughter-in-law of the same

Simon Umberger, and made a proposition to give his wife certain household property and $400 in money if she would get a divorce from him, upon condition, however, that L. A. Sult should get a divorce from his wife, accompanied by the statement that he would not pay one cent of the amount unless Zollie was divorced from her husband, and these two witnesses also testify that the accused asked them at that time if they would not rather have him live in Wythe county with Zollie Umberger Sult than to take her away from there and not marry her.

Thereafter, on October 15, 1917, the accused was indicted on the charge of unlawfully and without just cause deserting, and willfully neglecting and refusing to provide for the support and maintenance of, his wife, Augusta Corvin; she being then in destitute and necessitous circumstances. He made his defense, on October 29th was found guilty as charged in the indictment, and his punishment therefor was fixed at 90 days on the state convict road force at hard labor and a fine of $250. After the discharge of the jury the trial court, with the consent of the accused, ordered him to pay to the clerk of the court for the support of his wife the sum of $12.50 per month, payable on the first day of each month for the period of one year, and released him from custody on probation during that period, upon condition that he enter into a recognizance, with surety, in the penalty of $500, conditioned for his appearance at court whenever so ordered within the year, and also to appear on the first day of the October term, 1918.

The accused did not testify in this case, but it otherwise appears that he went to the city of Washington and worked on the street car line immediately after he left Virginia; that he there saw Zollie Umberger Sult, who was clerking in a store in that city in the fall of 1917. Thereafter, about March, 1918, he was employed as a farm laborer in Barbour county, W. Va., by W. H. Wentz, and worked there until late in the fall of 1919; that Zollie Umberger Sult visited the Wentz place two or three times while the accused was there, and was finally employed by Wentz to go to the farm to look after his mother, and that she and the accused both boarded and slept in the Wentz home there.

On May 19, 1919, the accused instituted his suit for divorce against his wife, Augusta Corvin, alleging that he was then, and for more than one year had been, a resident of the state of West Virginia; that his wife had willfully deserted him without any just or reasonable cause therefor; and twice in his bill fixes the date of such desertion as December 3, 1915, the truth being that the separation occurred a year later, on December 3, 1916. He proceeded to mature his case by order of publication, alleging that he was informed that his wife, the defendant, was a resident of the state of Virginia. He undertook to establish the facts alleged by the evidence of himself and Zolite Umberger Sult.

The West Virginia statute (West Virginia Code, § 3840), provides, among other things, that a divorce from the bond of matrimony may be decreed "to the party abandoned," "where either party willfully abandons or deserts the other for three years."

It appears, then, that at the time his suit was instituted the date of separation or abandonment was misstated in the bill. We think it may be fairly inferred that this was not a mere inadvertence, because of these circumstances: The date fixed for the taking of depositions was November 21, 1919, and on that day no witnesses appeared, so that the commissioner continued the proceedings until December 26, 1919, and when examined neither of the witnesses corrected the erroneous statement appearing in the bill, though they carefully refrained from expressly repeating the falsehood, and merely testified that the desertion or separation had continued for more than three years, without stating when the period began. One answer of the accused was that they had "been separated three years past." At the time his testimony was given the separation had continued three years, but his lack of frankness is apparent when it is observed that he failed to give the date of the separation, which, if he had given truly, would have disclosed that at the time of institution of the suit the court was without jurisdiction to grant the relief sought. Neither in the bill nor in the testimony was the attention of the West Virginia court directed to the true cause of the separation. No allusion whatever was made to these material and significant facts, viz., that the accused had in Virginia been adjudged the party at fault, guilty of an inexcusable desertion of his wife, required to contribute to her support, that he was on probation, and had been required to enter into a recognizance for his appearance before the Virginia court.

It is claimed for the accused that the divorce decree, thus obtained in West Virginia, creates a perfect defense in this prosecution, both under the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution and because of the comity which should exist between the states and the respect due by one state to the judicial proceedings of another. This introduces a question about which much has been written, and has been raised many times and under varying circumstances. We do not think that we can add anything of value to this general discussion, and hence shall confine ourselves to the precise facts of this case.

[1] It seems to be settled since the case of Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 562, 26 Sup. Ct. 525, 50 L. Ed. 867, 5 Ann. Cas. 1, that in cases like this, where the matrimonial domicile was in one state and the divorce is granted in another state at the suit of one consort, who has acquired, or who has claimed to acquire, a bona fide domicile in such other state, a decree there obtained without personal service of process and without an appearance of the defendant is not binding upon the courts of the state of the original matrimonial domicile, under the federal Constitution. It is otherwise, however, where the suit is properly brought in the state of the matrimonial domicile of the parties against a consort who has left that state and gone to another. Under such circumstances the suit may be matured against the absent party by constructive service of process, and courts of the state in which the parties had their matrimonial domicile have jurisdiction to enter a decree in conformity with the laws of that state, which must be given full faith and credit in the other states of the Union, under the federal Constitution. Atherton v. Atherton, 181 U. S. 155, 21 Sup. Ct. 544, 45 L. Ed. 794; Thompson v. Thompson, 228 U. S. 551, 33 Sup. Ct. 129, 57 L. Ed. 351. So that if this divorce is a bar to this prosecution, it can only be because of the respect which this state will pay to the decree as a matter of comity.

It seems to be always conceded or announced in such cases that a divorce obtained in a foreign jurisdiction which is based upon fraud will not be recognized when questioned in another jurisdiction. Paraphrasing the language used in Thompson v. State, 28 Ala. 21, it may be said that if the accused did not go to West Virginia with the determination to make it his legal domicile, or if he went there merely for the purpose of obtaining a divorce, intending to remain no longer than was necessary to accomplish his purpose, or if the divorce was obtained by fraud, the decree of the West Virginia court is void, and the accused, in marrying another woman and thereafter cohabiting with her in this state while his former wife still was living, is guilty of bigamy.

By express provision of our statute (Code 1919, § 4538), the crime is complete in this state if under an invalid marriage in another state there shall thereafter be cohabitation under such marriage in this state.

In Magowan v. Magowan, 57 N. J. Eq. 322, 42 Atl. 330, 73 Am. St. Rep. 645, a divorce in Oklahoma was held invalid in New Jersey; this being said:

"Where the plaintiff in a suit for divorce is required by statute to have been a bona fide resident of the state in which this suit is brought for a fixed period of time, in order to enable him to maintain his suit, the ascertainment by the court of the fact of such residence necessarily precedes a consideration of the merits of the case, and the determination of that question by the court is final, not only in the courts of that state but in every other jurisdiction where the validity of the judgment comes in question, unless such determination has been procured by fraud. When, however, the adjudication has been procured by fraud, it is without extraterritorial effect, and the judgment will be treated as void in the courts of a sister state."

The court there also held that it was not precluded from inquiry into whether the party who obtained the divorce was in fact a bona fide resident of New Jersey at the time he instituted his suit for divorce in Oklahoma.

In Dumont v. Dumont (N. J. Ch.) 45 Atl. 107, the substantial facts were these: The husband was a diamond setter in New York, and, on being accused by his wife of undue intimacy with another woman, refused to live with her any longer. He offered to supply her with evidence upon which she could secure a divorce from him, which she declined, and begged him not to desert her. He then left her, went to Dakota, rented a room in a small town where there was no demand for diamond setting, set up a bench and a chair, sent out circulars, and pretended to be in the diamond setting business, but his work came chiefly from New York. After the three months' residence which was required by statute in Dakota, he sued his wife for divorce, and on the trial swore that she had deserted him for a year, that he came to Dakota to establish himself in business, and intended to remain there forever. After securing his divorce by default, he immediately returned to New York, resumed his old employment, and married the woman with whom he had previously been intimate. It was held by the Court of Chancery of New Jersey that he was never domiciled in Dakota, that his divorce was procured by fraud on the court, and was therefore void, and hence was no defense to a suit by his wife for divorce on the ground of adultery in New Jersey.

In Goolsby v. State, 100 S. E. 788, a conviction of bigamy was sustained in Georgia, although the accused there had obtained a divorce in Alabama against his wife, who at the time of the institution of that suit was still a resident of Georgia, having obtained jurisdiction in Alabama by order of publication. The conviction was sustained because the court concluded that the evidence justified the jury in finding that the accused was a resident of the state of Georgia at the time he instituted his suit in the state of Alabama.

In State v. Herron, 175 N. C. 754, 94 S. E. 698, a conviction of bigamy is sustained notwithstanding a decree of divorce entered in Georgia upon constructive service of process upon the wife who remained in North Carolina, and upon the ground of the bad faith and fraud of the accused in attempting to acquire a domicile in Georgia.

In Dunham v. Dunham, 162 Ill. 589, 44 N. E. 841, 35 L. R. A. 70, it is held that a wife who upon separation from her husband goes into another state for the purpose of obtaining a divorce and brings a suit without disclosing the fact that a suit is pending in the state of her former residence, involving the same matters alleged as a cause of divorce, and in which she has appeared, is guilty of such a fraud as to invalidate a decree of divorce obtained by her, although the pendency of the prior suit could not have been pleaded in abatement or bar of her divorce suit.

[2-4] Bearing the facts of this case in mind, and applying the rule that fraud vitiates judicial proceedings, even where they appear to be regular in form, it seems to us that there can be no doubt in this case that the trial judge correctly referred the question to the jury by an instruction which authorized them to disregard the West Virginia divorce decree if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused practiced fraud in obtaining the divorce in West Virginia which is relied on by him, by offering false testimony for the purpose of obtaining it; the other requisites for conviction having been either proved or admitted.

This instruction can be justified, even if it be conceded that the accused acquired a bona fide residence in West Virginia, though as to this the evidence is weak and inconclusive when all of the circumstances are considered, for it must be remembered that very soon after he obtained the decree in West Virginia he married the woman with whom he had been so long apparently intimate, and returned with her to Wythe county to live. The decree was entered in January, 1920; the date of his marriage in Maryland is not given, but they together returned to Wythe county in the spring of 1920. There is much here, then, in his conduct to justify the conclusion that he had no other reason for going to West Virginia than the securing of the divorce there, which he could not obtain here, and that he always intended to return to Virginia. His mother had property in Wythe county, Va., and had frequently urged him to return, and he had neither property interest in West Virginia nor any prospective property interest there such as he had in Virginia.

Waiving this inquiry, however, can there be any doubt as to the fraudulent character of the West Virginia proceeding? The bill suppressed the material fact that so far from its being true that his wife had deserted him without cause (and he relied solely on this ground for the divorce in West Virginia), taking the most favorable view of the evidence, he acquiesced in the separation, while the additional truth is, for his wife's testimony in this respect is uncontradicted, that she was driven from home by him pursuant to his avowed and active efforts to force her to sue him for divorce because of his own default. He sought and obtained the decree by a false statement of the date of the separation, while, if he had stated the true date, his bill would have been demurrable because it would have appeared therefrom that at that time when it was filed no ground for divorce existed under the West Virginia statute. In the depositions of himself and his only witness, they suppressed the truth by deceptive and ambiguous testimony. This divorce decree, thus based upon deceit and fraud, would doubtless be annulled by the courts of West Virginia upon proper presentation of the facts here appearing, and in a case like this, where there was no appearance by the defendant nor service of process upon her, should be held to be a nullity everywhere. The fraud here, then, is so patent and palpable that, whatever difference of view there may be as to many questions which can be raised as to the extraterritorial effect of decrees of courts where the jurisdiction over the defendant is based solely upon constructive service of process, we think that no court would accord any respect to this decree.

[5] Among the errors as to procedure which are assigned is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment upon the ground that it should have negatived the exception contained in Code 1919, § 4539. The crime of bigamy is completely described in section 4538, and section 4539 does not constitute a part of the description of the offense, but is disconnected with the statutory description of the crime and only affords the accused certain grounds of defense—among them a divorce from the bond of a previous marriage. This question has been recently considered and decided by this court adversely to that contention in the case of Sickel v. Commonwealth, 124 Va. 821, 97 S. E. 783, 99 S. E. 678, and this, we believe, accords with the general rule in other jurisdictions. 7 C. J. 1166, and cases cited; 3 R. C. L. 807.

[6] There is an exception, also, growing out of these circumstances: The commonwealth introduced a witness to show that the accused admitted that he had been married in Maryland. Upon cross-examination the witness was questioned as to the alleged divorce in West Virginia, and, having testified that the accused so claimed, said that he showed him a copy of the divorce decree. The accused then attempted to put a copy of the divorce decree in evidence, but the commonwealth objected to the introduction of the document. The court, having permitted the entire conversation to be detailed by the witness, declined to allow the paper to be introduced at that stage of the proceeding unless the accused would adopt the witness as his own for the purpose of introducing the decree. He declined to do this, and excepted to the ruling.

[7] We find no ground for reversal in this action of the court. The divorce was clearly matter of defense, the burden of proving which was upon the defendant, and if he desired to prove it at that stage of the prosecution he should have accepted the court's suggestion. This identical paper was afterwards introduced by the accused, and he suffered no wrong or injury because of the circumstance of which he complains.

The other objections to the testimony have been disposed of by what we have previously said.

In order to test the good faith of the defendant and his motives in connection with the divorce proceedings in West Virginia, it was proper to introduce the material facts referred to, which culminated in that suit, as well as his conduct immediately thereafter, so as to determine whether the decree had been obtained in good faith or by deceit and fraud.

[8] The basis of another assignment of error is the refusal of the court to give this instruction, offered by the accused:

"The court instructs the jury that the failure of the defendant, Lucian Corvin, or of Zollie Corvin, to testify in this case, creates no presumption against the defendant, and is not to be considered by the jury in arriving at their verdict."

It is claimed that this should have been given because of Code 1919, § 6211, which provides that husband and wife in criminal cases may be allowed to testify in behalf of each other, and that the failure of either so to testify "shall create no presumption against the accused, nor be the subject of any comment before the court or jury by the prosecuting attorney." Manifestly, the action of the court was proper. The section relied upon relates primarily to the competency of witnesses, and applies where the existence of the relation of husband and wife appears. It has no reference to a state of facts such as were developed upon this trial. The vital question here at issue was whether or not Zollie Umberger Sult was the wife of the accused. The court could only have given the instruction upon the assumption that she was his wife, and this would have invaded the province of the jury, for that was the very question which they had to determine. Neither the accused nor his alleged wife testified, and the jury were properly instructed that his failure to testify created no presumption against him and was not to be considered by the jury in arriving at their verdict. This was all that he was entitled to.

We find no ground for reversal in the record. The divorce decree upon which the accused relied was obtained by fraud and deceit, and under the testimony here adduced the jury could not have properly found otherwise. In this changing world human nature changes little, if any, and those who persist in defying public sentiment by violating the written law, when it is based upon reason and supported by sound public policy, are as sure to receive a punishment adjudged to fit the crime to-day as was Zimri on that day long ago when he defiantly brought a Midianitish woman into the Hebrew camp, in the sight of Moses and the congregation before the door of the tabernacle.

ZIGLER v. SPRINKEL, City Treasurer.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 29, 1921.)

1. Mandamus  $\Leftrightarrow$  148—Petitioner's interest in enforcement of laws sufficient.

When the performance of a public duty is sought to be coerced, petitioner's interest, as a citizen, in the enforcement of the laws, is sufficient to entitle him to proceed in mandamus.

2. Elections  $\Leftrightarrow$  83—Treasurer's list must include all voters who paid poll taxes assessed against them "during" any or all the three years preceding that of election.

In view of Const. 1902, § 21, giving one the right to vote if he has paid all poll taxes assessed against him "during the three years next preceding," the city treasurer, under section 38, and Code 1919, § 109, requiring him to file a list of all who have paid the poll taxes required by the Constitution "during the three years next preceding," must place on such list the names of all who have paid the taxes required as a prerequisite to their right to vote at the ensuing election, whether that be the payment of such taxes for one, two, or all three years, section 38 merely furnishing the evidence of the discharge of the requirements imposed by section 21, the word "during" in which means, not "throughout the continuance of," but "in the time of," nor is the right of persons coming into a city from another city within such period to inclusion in the list affected by Code 1919, § 110, entitling them to have their names entered on application to the court, though not entitled to vote on the treasurer's certificate under Code 1919, § 115.

Error to Circuit Court, Rockingham County.

Petition by E. A. Zigler for a writ of mandamus against H. Sprinkel, Treasurer of City of Harrisonburg. Writ denied, and petitioner brings error and supersedeas. Mandamus awarded.

John Paul, John W. Morrison, and Chas. A. Hammer, all of Harrisonburg, for plaintiff in error.

H. W. Bertram, of Harrisonburg, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is a petition by R. A. Zigler and others, praying the circuit court of Rockingham county to award a writ of mandamus, directed to H. A. Sprinkel, treasurer of the city of Harrisonburg, commanding and compelling said treasurer to comply with the requirements of section 38 of the Constitution of Virginia and section 109 of the Code of Virginia, requiring him as such treasurer, at least five months before each regular election, to file with the clerk of the circuit court a list of all persons who have paid, not later than six months prior to such election, the state poll taxes required by the Constitution during the three years preceding the one in which said election is held.

It is alleged in the petition that the petitioner, as well as other citizens of the city of Harrisonburg, are entitled to "the information which the list should embrace, and that the said treasurer is required by law to publish a list which shall correctly set forth the names of persons assessed with capitation taxes, and showing the years for which such taxes have been paid, prior to the six months preceding the general election to be held in November, 1921." It is further alleged that said treasurer has "refused and declined to certify such a list," but has certified to the clerk of the circuit court of Rockingham county a list of persons which purports to be a list of persons in the city of Harrisonburg "who have paid their capitation taxes assessed or assessable against them for the years 1918, 1919, and 1920 prior to and including May 7, 1921," and has certified that the names appearing thereon are a list of voters "who have paid their capitation taxes prior to and including May 7, 1921." Proceeding, the petition charges that this list is incorrect, in that the same does not contain either the names of all young persons who became of age at such time that they were not chargeable with three years' taxes, but chargeable with one or two years only, as the case might be, or the names of those persons who, coming into the city from the counties of this state, or from other states, have paid in said city the taxes required of them as a prerequisite for voting. The petition alleges that the number of these omitted persons is considerable.

The defendant treasurer demurred to this petition, but his demurrer was overruled. Thereupon he filed an answer in which, among other things, he alleged that he was required by law to file a list of those persons only who had paid their taxes for the full period of three years next preceding the year in which an election is held, and not less than six months prior to said election. In this regard the treasurer specifically states:

"Respondent further says that he is advised that all that he is empowered and required to do is to place upon said list such persons as he has legal knowledge and information have paid all of the taxes assessed, or assessable, against them for the years 1918, 1919, and 1920, and paid within the period prescribed by law, and that this has been done by him in the list certified by him to the clerk as above stated."

The case was heard upon the petition and the answer of the defendant, and the trial court, for reasons expressed in writing and lodged with the papers as a part of the order, denied the petition for mandamus. To this action of the trial court a writ of error and supersedeas was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

[1] The demurrer to the petition for mandamus was properly overruled. When the duty the performance of which is sought to be coerced is a public duty, and the interest relied on by the petitioner in mandamus is the interest which the petitioner has in the enforcement of the laws, then such interest is a sufficient interest to entitle him to maintain the proceeding. Clay v. Ballard, 87 Va. 787, 794, 13 S. E. 262.

"Where the question is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to procure the enforcement of a public duty, the people are regarded as the real party, and the relator at whose instigation the proceedings are instituted need not show that he has any legal or special interest in the result; it being sufficient to show that he is a citizen and as such interested in the execution of the laws." High on Extr. Rem. § 431.

See, also, Tazewell v. Herman, 108 Va. 416, 60 S. E. 767, 61 S. E. 752, and Smith v. Bell, 113 Va. 667, 75 S. E. 125.

[2] The learned judge of the trial court, in construing section 38 of the Constitution, and interpreting it to mean that the persons to appear on that list are the persons who have paid their poll taxes for the entire period of three years next preceding the year of election, considers that the "case turns upon the meaning to be given to the words 'during the three years' as used in the section supra of the Constitution." He concludes that the word "during," as used, means "throughout the course or continuance of." Hence the further conclusion that the persons to be listed are the persons who have paid their poll taxes "throughout the continuance of" the entire period of three years.

In aid of this conclusion he cites the use of the word "during" in other sections of the Constitution. For instance, in section 21 it is provided that a duly registered person shall have the right to vote, provided that he, unless exempted, shall have personally paid "at least six months prior to the election, all state poll taxes assessed or assessable against him, under this Constitution, during the three years next preceding that in which he offers to vote," etc. Obviously the word "during" in the foregoing connection does not mean "throughout the continuance of," in the sense that such a registered person, as a prerequisite to voting, must have paid taxes for each of the years embraced in the three-year period. On the contrary, it means that as a prerequisite for voting such registered person must pay the taxes with which he is assessed, or for which he is assessable, during said three-year period. If he is assessable with poll taxes for two years only of the three-year period, and pays those taxes whether assessed or not, he is entitled to vote. So if he is assessable for only one year, and pays that tax. Such persons have paid all the taxes required of them by the Constitution as a prerequisite of the right to vote during the three-year period, whether their payments were for one year, or for two years, and are as fully endowed by the Constitution with the right to vote as the person who is assessable with poll taxes for each year of the three-year period, and has paid the same. Hence the meaning of the word "during" in this section is the meaning given by Webster—that is to say, "in the time of." If the meaning suggested in the opinion of the learned trial court is given to this word in the foregoing connection, it would inevitably follow that a duly registered person, liable for poll taxes for only one year, or two years, of the three-year period, would not become entitled to vote upon the payment of such taxes, since obviously he has not paid for the full period of three years, though he has paid in full the poll taxes required of him during such period.

Section 21 prescribes the conditions for voting of a registered person. Section 38 is intended to furnish the evidence that the registered person has qualified himself to vote by the discharge of the requirements imposed by the section ubi supra.

In the case of Tilton v. Herman, 109 Va. 503, 64 S. E. 351, this court construed the meaning and effect of the words "personally paid." Referring to the treasurer's list, the court used the following language:

"This case is the sequel of the case of Tazewell v. Herman, 108 Va. 416, 60 S. E. 767, 61 S. E. 752, 2 Va. App. 387, recently decided by this court, in which it was held that said list to be made up and filed by the treasurer should only contain the names of those persons who at least six months prior to the election had personally paid the poll taxes required of them as a prerequisite to their right to register and vote at an ensuing regular election."

If the view taken of the list in this citation is the correct view, then unquestionably a treasurer must place on his list the names of all persons who at least six months prior to an election have "personally paid the poll taxes required of them as a prerequisite to their right to register and vote at the ensuing regular election." (Italics supplied.) In some cases the prerequisite to vote is the payment of one year's poll tax; in other cases it is the payment of poll taxes for two years; in still other cases it is the payment of poll taxes for three years; but there is no distinction in the right to vote of the persons in these three classes, provided the poll taxes are paid as required. Hence, when the court said in Tilton v. Herman, supra, that the treasurer's list, as made up and filed, should contain only the names of those persons who had personally paid the poll taxes required of them as a prerequisite to their right to vote, this requirement as to the contents of said list included every person who, with respect to the payment of poll taxes as a prerequisite to his right to vote, had discharged the obligation imposed upon him individually in this regard by the positive mandate of the Constitution.

Article 2 of the Virginia Constitution deals with the elective franchise. Section 38 is a part of that article. This section provides for a list which is to be used at the elections established by law. It is an election list, and affords evidence of the prepayment of the capitation taxes required by the Constitution as a prerequisite to the right to register and vote. A person who is only assessed or assessable with poll tax for one or two years, as the case may be, and who has paid the same as required for voting purposes, is entitled to vote, and in consequence to have the treasurer's list afford evidence of this prepayment. This is considered to be in harmony with reason and the proper construction of the constitutional provisions.

As this court has said, in Tazewell v. Herman, 108 Va. 421, 60 S. E. 768:

"The principal, if not the only, purpose for which the [treasurer's] list is required to be filed is to provide record or at least written evidence that the persons named in the list have complied with the provisions of the Constitution in paying their poll tax, so far as such payment is made a prerequisite to their right to vote."

Section 38 provides how persons omitted from the treasurer's list may secure a place on same. But this right to apply to the court to correct said list is afforded to all those persons who have paid their capitation taxes and whose names have been improperly omitted. In the view of the learned judge of the circuit court of Rockingham county, only those persons who have paid their poll taxes for the full three years preceding the election year are entitled to a place on the list. Hence, if the name of such a person has been erroneously omitted for one of the three years in question, he is entitled to the aid of the court to have his name entered for the omitted year. But, as a corollary to this ruling, it would follow that a person who has paid the taxes required of him, whether it be for one or two years, has no right to apply to the court for a place on the list, since he was not originally entitled to be included by the treasurer, and therefore has not been improperly omitted. The language of section 38 does not justify the foregoing limitation of persons entitled to a place on the list, and hence entitled, if omitted, to apply to the court for relief. Says the section:

"Within thirty days after the list has been posted, any person who shall have paid his capitation tax, but whose name is omitted from the certified list, may," etc. (Italics supplied.)

The words "any person who shall have paid his capitation tax, but whose name is omitted from the certified list," etc., are certainly comprehensive enough to include the persons who are chargeable for the purposes of voting with one or two years' taxes only, and who have paid the same. Moreover, the reason of the law advises us that it was intended to apply to such persons as fully as to persons who have paid for three years. A person who is chargeable with poll taxes for a lesser period than three years, and pays the same within the prescribed time, is as fully entitled to vote by virtue of section 21, if otherwise qualified, as the person who pays for the full three years. Hence the same fundamental considerations which cause the names of voters in the latter class to be placed on the treasurer's list, which is evidence "that the provisions of the Constitution have been complied with by the payment of poll taxes, so far as such payment is made a prerequisite to their right to vote," indicate as compellingly that all other persons who have paid, as required by the Constitution for the purposes of voting, the poll taxes with which they are assessed or assessable, are entitled to a like inclusion in said list. If a person who has paid one year's tax in another county, and two years' taxes in the county in which he offers to vote, or a person coming from another state, who is chargeable with capitation taxes for only one or two years and has paid the same, or a young man who is chargeable with and has paid his taxes for a like period, is not entitled to be placed upon the treasurer's list, then it follows that, in exercising the right to vote afforded by section 21, such voter must prove the prepayment of his capitation taxes six months prior to the election by means of his receipted tax tickets or otherwise. The necessity of recourse to such evidence was regarded as an evil, and was intended to be avoided by the framers of the Constitution when they enacted section 38, providing for the preparation and posting of a treasurer's list of voters who had conformed to the constitutional requirements in respect of the payment of their poll taxes. Section 38 provides that the treasurer's list shall contain the names of "all persons in his county or city who have paid, not later than six months prior to such election—[i. e., the succeeding general election] the state poll taxes required by this Constitution during [i. e., in the time of] the three years next preceding that in which such election is held," etc. The use of the word "required" is significant. Evidently it refers to the poll taxes necessary to be paid by the individual persons as a prerequisite to the right to register and vote. These persons are not concerned with paying, for the purposes of registry and voting, any taxes other than their own, nor for such purposes are they required to pay any poll taxes save those with which they are assessed or assessable. Light is cast upon the purpose of the treasurer's list and the meaning of the word "required" in the foregoing connection by a later paragraph of this section which says:

"Further evidence of the prepayment of the capitation taxes required by this Constitution as a prerequisite to the right to register and vote may be prescribed by law."

The clear implication of this latter paragraph is that the treasurer's list is evidence of the prepayment of the capitation taxes required by the Constitution, as a prerequisite to the right to register and vote. Hence the persons who have prepaid to the treasurer the capitation taxes required of them, respectively, as a requisite to voting, whether the same was for one year, two years, or three years, are equally entitled to be placed upon said treasurer's list and to enjoy the benefit to be derived therefrom.

Amplifying a portion of the first sentence of section 38, according to its true meaning, the same would read:

"A list of all persons in his county, or city, who have paid to such treasurer, not later than six months prior to such election, the state poll taxes required by this Constitution of said persons, respectively, in the time of the three years next preceding that in which such election is held, as a prerequisite to the right to register and vote," etc.

This list, as stated supra, is a list for voting purposes, and must be considered from that point of view. It is true that the clerk is to forward a certified copy of the corrected list to the auditor of public accounts, but this is only as a check upon the treasurer, since he is not to be charged with "the amount of the poll taxes stated therein," when he has previously accounted for the same.

The learned judge of the trial court makes a distinction between young men coming of age after February 1st of a year in which an election is held and those who come of age before February 1st of said year. For instance, in any given year, say the year 1921, some young man may come of age after February 1st of that year, while others may have become 21 prior to that date. With respect to young men in the former class, the opinion seems to conclude that their names should go on the treasurer's list for the year 1922, and, if their taxes continue to be paid, for the year 1923, and of course for the year 1924. With respect to the young men in the latter class, supra, and persons who have not resided in the state long enough to be chargeable with three years' taxes, as well as persons who have paid taxes for one or two years in another county, the trial court considers that they must use their tax receipts, or in the case of the voters from another county their tax certificates, to prove the payment of their taxes to the judges of election; that is to say, they must use them until they shall have paid their taxes for the full period of three years, when they will go upon the list. Why the Constitution should be so construed as to make these distinctions, thereby keeping the names of the foregoing persons from the treasurers' list, and compelling the undesirable use of tax receipts to prove the necessary prepayment of the poll taxes required by the Constitution, is not apparent. Of course, as to persons coming from another county, the law provides for the use of the certificate of the treasurer of the former county to prove the payment of taxes in that county, but the taxes for the one year or two years succeeding are paid to the treasurer of the new county of residence. If, as stated in Tazewell v. Herman, supra, the principal, if not the only, purpose for which the list is required to be filed is to provide written evidence that the persons named in the list have complied with the provisions of the Constitution by paying their poll taxes so far as such payment is made a prerequisite to their right to vote, it is not perceived why all persons who have complied with the Constitution in this respect, and who are not otherwise provided by law with a prescribed means of proving such payment, are not entitled to be upon this list and to the use of same as evidence of prepayment, inasmuch as this list is made conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated for the purpose of voting.

Counsel for defendant contends in his brief that—

tle them by virtue of the two-year period of residence to vote, and who would therefore be required to pay taxes for one year only, and have paid them, but have been omitted from the list, ample provisions have been made, both by section 38 of the Constitution and section 110 of the Code, whereby they may have their names placed upon said list upon personal application to the court, or the judge in vacation, and the introduction of proof to establish their right, even if it should be held that these persons would not be entitled to vote on the certificate of the treasurer under the provisions of section 115 of the Code."

But a person applying to the court under section 110 of the Code to be placed upon the treasurer's list must establish that he has paid his capitation taxes; otherwise he has not been improperly omitted. Improper omission carries the implication that the party complaining should have been properly included in the first instance. Hence, if the persons referred to in the citation supra are entitled to establish in court the payment of their poll taxes, and the consequent right to a place on the treasurer's list, from which they have been improperly excluded, it would seem that such persons should have been primarily included in said list. Their right to such primary inclusion is established by the conclusion of law that all persons who have paid their poll taxes within the three-year period and whose names are not found on the treasurer's list have been improperly excluded therefrom.

Confining our holding to the narrow issue presented in the instant case, we conclude that it is the duty of the treasurer of the city of Harrisonburg to put upon his list the names of all persons within his city who have been assessed with and personally paid, not later than six months prior to the general election in November, 1921, their state poll taxes for all or any of the years 1918, 1919, and 1920, unless it appears to said treasurer from the books and papers of his office that such persons have failed to so pay the taxes with which they have been assessed for one or more of the foregoing years. Persons thus delinquent should not be placed upon the list.

This court will therefore enter an order (a copy of which when served shall have the force and effect of a writ of mandamus) requiring the treasurer of the city of Harrisonburg to forthwith make out, certify, and file with the clerk of the circuit court of Rockingham county a list including the names of the persons ascertained in the above finding to be entitled to a place on same, but who have been heretofore omitted. This list shall be arranged alphabetically by wards, and shall state the white and colored persons separately, and shall be verified by the oath of the treasurer.

Mandamus awarded.

VIRGINIA WHOLESALE CO., Inc., v. TOWN OF APPALACHIA et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

Municipal corporations @—966(1)—Towns held to have statutory authority to impose ad valorem town tax on capital of merchants.

Code 1904, § 1043, as amended and re-enacted by Acts 1915, c. 111, not having been affected in that respect by the Segregation Act of 1915, held to authorize a town to impose a local ad valorem property tax on the capital of merchants employed in the town; such capital being intangible personal property taxable under the general power of taxation.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Proceeding by the Virginia Wholesale Company, Inc., against the Town of Appalachia and others for refunding of an ad valorem tax and penalty. An order denying relief was entered, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding in which the plaintiff in error moved the court below, under section 2389 of the Code of 1919, for relief from the payment, and to require the return and refunding of an ad valorem tax and penalty thereon, which tax the town of Appalachia, one of the defendants in error, by a levy ordered by its council, imposed for town purposes upon the capital of the plaintiff in error employed in its business as a merchant in such town on the 1st day of February, 1919 (which tax and the penalty thereon aggregated the sum of $1,634.50 and was paid under protest), on the ground that the town was without authority to impose such tax.

The court below, by its order which is under review, declined to grant the relief sought, the effect of which was to hold that the town was authorized by law to make such levy and collection, and that the same was valid.

Bullitt & Chalkley, of Big Stone Gap, for plaintiff in error.

Morton & Parker, of Appalachia, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The case turns upon the decision of the following question, namely:

1. Did section 1043 of the Code, as amended and re-enacted by Acts 1915, pp. 146, 147, delegate to the towns of the state the power to impose an ad valorem town tax on the capital of merchants employed in business in the towns?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The question is one of original grant of power to tax, "to which the rule of strictissimi juris applies," as is said in the opinion of this court delivered by Judge Kelly on the rehearing of Richmond v. Drewry-Hughes Co., 122 Va. 178, at page 194, 90 S. E. 635, 94 S. E. 989. We look, then, to see if section 1043 aforesaid plainly conferred the power in question.

This section as it stood prior to the enactment of the Segregation Act in 1915, so far as material, reads as follows:

"The council of every city or town shall * * * order a city or town levy of so much as in their opinion is necessary to be raised in that way in addition to what may be received for licenses and from other sources. The levy so ordered may be * * * upon any property therein, and on such other subjects as may at the time be assessed with state taxes against persons residing therein." (Italics supplied.)

The section as amended and re-enacted by Acts 1915, pp. 146, 147, reads as follows:

"The council of every city or town shall * * * order a city or town levy of so much as in their opinion is necessary to be raised in that way in addition to what may be received for licenses and from other sources. The levy so ordered may be * * * upon any property therein subject to local taxation and not expressly segregated to the state for purposes of state taxation only, and on such other subjects as may at the time be assessed with state taxes against persons residing therein. * * *" (Italics supplied.)

The italicized language next above is the only new language in the statute. In the petition and brief for the plaintiff in error much significance is attached to the language "property therein subject to local taxation," and it is urged that this indicates that the town must look elsewhere than to section 1043 in order to find the statute law which authorizes the "local taxation" by the town. But when we look to the Segregation Act, passed by the same Legislature which amended and re-enacted said section 1043 and used the new language aforesaid, we see at once that the new language "subject to local taxation" was added to the statute (section 1043), merely in order to restrict the otherwise broad meaning, that the city or town levy was authorized to be made on all "property therein," to the meaning that the city or town levy was authorized to be made on such "property therein" as is "subject to local taxation"; i. e., as is not segregated for state taxation under the Segregation Act. Hence it is plain that, inasmuch as the capital of merchants is such property as has not been segregated for state taxation, it is still subject to town taxation, if it was subject to that taxation as the statute (section 1043) stood before 1915; for in the Segregation Act (Acts 1915, c. 63) it is expressly provided as follows:

"The capital of merchants shall not be subject to state taxation, but may be taxed locally as prescribed by law."

The subject under consideration then comes to the precise question of whether section 1043 aforesaid, as it stood prior to the enactment of the Segregation Act in 1915 authorized the town tax in question: Was that tax therein and thereby "prescribed by law"?

It is admitted in the argument for the plaintiff in error that the Legislature has conferred upon cities and counties the authority to impose both a license tax upon merchants and an ad valorem tax upon their capital employed in business and that the same authority might have been conferred by the Legislature on towns; but it is urged with ability and force that there are cogent reasons why such authority should have been conferred on cities and counties and yet have been withheld from towns. And it is argued that it is at least left in doubt whether such authority has been conferred upon towns because, it is urged, as appears from City of Norfolk v. Griffith-Powell Co., 102 Va. 115, 45 S. E. 889, and Richmond v. Drewry-Hughes Co., supra, 122 Va. 178, 90 S. E. 635, 94 S. E. 989, the source of the authority of the cities of the state for their general power of taxation is found in their charters. But this argument overlooks the holding in the latter case that such source of authority is found in section 1043 aforesaid, as well as in the charters of the cities. It is there said that the statutory provisions conferring the authority—

"authorizing a tax on merchants' capital at such rate as the * * * city authorities deem necessary and proper * * * are found in section 69 of the charter of the city of Richmond [under which the tax here in question was levied] and in section * * * 1043 of the Code, * * *" etc. (Italics supplied.)

See Richmond v. Drewry-Hughes Co., 122 Va. at page 187, 90 S. E. 635, 94 S. E. 989.

And a reading of section 1043 aforesaid demonstrates that whatever authority is thereby conferred on cities is also conferred upon towns.

It is true that the Drewry-Hughes Company Case held, as urged for the plaintiff in error, that the capital of merchants is not within the class of property which is embraced in schedule C of the tax bill. But such case does not hold, as is contended in argument for plaintiff in error, that such capital is not "property" within the meaning of section 1043 aforesaid. On the contrary, the following is expressly stated and held in the opinion in that case on the rehearing:

"It is conceded that the capital of merchants is 'intangible personal property' within the meaning of the tax laws. * * * Such capital is excepted from taxation by the state in the ordinary sense (that is, upon an ad valorem basis), and is, therefore, not within the class of intangible property segregated for state taxation, but is subject to be taxed locally 'as prescribed by law.' The ultimate and decisive question, therefore, is: What is meant by the phrase, 'as prescribed by law'? Does it mean the prescribed rate * * * mentioned in the Segregation Act, or does it mean that the local taxation of merchants' capital is to be controlled by other statutory provisions outside of the terms of that act? We feel constrained * * * to adopt the latter view. * * *

"Statutory provisions outside of the Segregation Act, contemplating and authorizing a tax on merchants' capital at such rate as the * * * city authorities deem necessary and proper, and thus responding to the expression 'as prescribed by law,' are found in section 69 of the charter of the city of Richmond (under which the tax here in question was levied) and in section * * * 1043 of the Code, * * *" etc. "The purpose of the General Assembly seems to have been to leave merchants' capital to be taxed by localities practically as it had been prior to the passage of the Segregation Act. * * *

And it is also stated, further on in the same opinion, with specific reference to Schedule C:

"We hold that merchants' capital is not embraced in the classification of that schedule, but remains where it has practically always been, in a class to itself, subject to a license tax only by the state, but liable to a local property tax."

It is true that the authority of towns to impose the tax in question was not directly involved in the Drewry-Hughes Co. Case, and we have not regarded what is there said as conclusive of the question presented in the case now before us, and we have considered such question with an open mind; but, in view of what is there said in reference to the authority conferred on cities by section 1043 aforesaid, that decision certainly cannot be regarded as holding that merchants' capital is not "property" within the meaning of such section.

Coming back again, then, to the consideration of section 1043 in question, it seems to us plain that it authorized the towns, as well as cities, of the state, to impose "a local property tax" for town purposes on all property, in contemplation of law within the corporate limits, not segregated by the state for state taxation; that, subject to the last-stated limitation, this statute conferred a general power of taxation on the towns; that merchants' capital, not having been segregated by the state for state taxation, is intangible personal property, taxable as such by the towns under such general power of taxation; that, no question being raised before us as to the proper situs for taxation of the intangible personal property of the plaintiff in error, we must regard that situs as being, under the well-settled rule of law on the subject, within the town of Appalachia, and hence we must regard such property as being within such town limits in contemplation of law; and therefore we are of opinion that there was no error in the order of the court below under review, and it will be Affirmed.

PHLEGAR'S EX'R v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions §44(5)—Action to enforce trust deed securing bond for loan barred 20 years after maturity of bond.

A suit to enforce a trust deed securing a bond for payment in five years of a loan of a trust fund was barred 20 years after maturity of the bond, though the maker was also the assignee of the interest on such fund during the lifetime of his assignor.

2. Life estates §21—Holder of life estate in interest on fund from sale of lands cannot set off value thereof in action on trust deed securing bond for borrowed principal.

An assignee of the interest for assignor's lifetime on a trust fund, realized from the sale of lands, who borrowed the principal and executed a bond and trust deed to secure payment within five years, could not, if sued on the deed, set off the present value of such life estate; one having a life estate in a fund arising from proceeds of the sale of land not being entitled to have the value thereof commuted and paid in gross instead of annual interest on the fund, unless the parties so agree.

3. Limitation of actions §104½, New, vol. 6 Key-No. Series—Set-off does not prevent statute from running on principal demand.

The existence of a set-off does not prevent the statute from running on the principal demand.

4. Mortgages §424—Though money from sale of decedent's lands treated as real estate, limitations applicable to action to enforce trust deed securing loan thereof to assignee of interest thereon for assignor's life.

Though money realized from the sale of a decedent's land must be treated as real estate, the statute was applicable to an action to enforce a trust deed securing a bond for the loan of such funds to the assignee of the interest thereon for assignor's lifetime.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Suit by Archer A. Phlegar's executor against A. B. Smith and others. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

M. H. Tompkins and Ellett & Phlegar, all of Christiansburg, for appellant.

Harless & Colhoun and Jordan, Roop & Sowder, all of Christiansburg, for appellees.

BURKS, J. The facts of this case are undisputed, and are very fairly set forth in the petition for appeal as follows:

"The chancery suit of Abell's Adm'r v. Wilson et al. was brought in Montgomery court in November, 1879, to enforce a vendor's lien on 260 acres of land owned by the then deceased wife of John W. Wilson. By decree, John W. Wilson was given, as curtesy, the interest to be derived throughout his lifetime on $480.58 which arose from the land sale after paying off the vendor's lien. A daughter, Lucy Wilson, was born in 1874, and was still an infant at the time the land of her deceased mother was sold under court order to satisfy the vendor's lien. This daughter was decreed as heir of her mother the surplus money, $480.58, after her father's death. This sum of $480.58 Archer A. Phlegar, receiver in the said suit, was ordered by decree at the May term, 1884, to land for 5 years at a time on real estate security, the decree expressly permitting the loan to be made to W. H. Smith if he so desired.

"A written assignment by John W. Wilson to W. H. Smith of the former's life interest in the money was already introduced into the suit and recognized by decree as valid. Thus W. H. Smith, as assignee, was entitled to the interest throughout John W. Wilson's lifetime on the $480.58.

"On July 12, 1884, Receiver Phlegar loaned the $480.58 to W. H. Smith, taking his 5-year bond therefor with a trust deed lien on certain Montgomery county farm land owned by W. H. Smith. This land was entirely different from the land of Mrs. Wilson which had been sold to satisfy a vendor's lien. On July 23, 1884, the trust deed was duly recorded in Montgomery county's Deed Book Y, p. 175, and was filed in the suit as an exhibit with Receiver Phlegar's report to the November term, 1884, of the making of the loan to W. H. Smith, at which term and on which report of Receiver Phlegar's action a decree of confirmation was entered.

"W. H. Smith died a good many years ago. There was no occasion or reason for Receiver Phlegar to collect interest from W. H. Smith on the bond for money loaned, because W. H. Smith himself was entitled to the interest as assignee from John W. Wilson as long as Wilson lived. So no interest seems to have ever been collected. The bond executed by W. H. Smith to Receiver Phlegar remains wholly unpaid, and the trust deed securing same remains wholly unreleased.

"As shown by Receiver Phlegar's itemized report to the November term, 1884, and receipts filed therewith, the costs of the suit were all paid at the time the loan was made.

"By deed dated December 11, 1889, and duly recorded on April 21, 1891, W. H. Smith sold the trust deed land to L. H. Thurman. On December 29, 1903, the same land was sold to A. B. Smith at auction under decree of Pulaski circuit court in the judgment lien suit of Miller's Ex'r v. Thurman's Adm'r et al. A. B. Smith still owns this land under a commissioner's deed made shortly after his purchase, and has been in possession continuously since his purchase.

"The proceedings in the suit of Miller's Ex'r v. Thurman's Adm'r in the Pulaski court were had with no reference at all to the fact that the suit of Abell's Adm'r v. Wilson et al. was pending in Montgomery circuit court, in which latter suit the land sold under decree of the Pulaski court was pledged under a trust deed as security for money that had been decreed to Lucy Wilson, an infant, to the principal of which money she was entitled after her father's death. No account of liens was taken in the Pulaski suit, and neither the trustee nor the beneficiary under the trust deed securing the money loaned by Receiver Phlegar to W. H. Smith was made a party to the Pulaski suit.

"The suit of Abell's Adm'r v. Wilson et al. was pending on the docket of Montgomery circuit court continuously from 10 years before Thurman bought from W. H. Smith the security land until after A. B. Smith bought this land at auction from the commissioner in the Pulaski suit on December 29, 1903.

"John W. Wilson died on May 16, 1918. About a month thereafter his daughter Lucy (whose married name was then Lucy Wilson Ward) filed her petition in the suit in Montgomery circuit court styled Abell's Adm'r v. Wilson et al., in which petition she asked the court to order her sum of $480.58, with interest from her father's death, to be paid over to her now that her father was dead. To her petition (or an amendment thereof) B. M. Hagan, as executor of Receiver Archer A. Phlegar, then also deceased, and A. B. Smith were made defendants.

"As the result of Lucy Wilson Ward's aforesaid petition and answers of the aforesaid defendants thereto, the question which arose between Receiver Phlegar's executor of the one part, and A. B. Smith of the other part, and which question is now presented to the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, is this: Has the right to raise the money owing to Lucy Wilson Ward by enforcing the trust deed which W. H. Smith executed on July 12, 1884, to John R. Johnson, trustee, to secure Receiver Phlegar, become barred by limitation, or is this land now liable in A. B. Smith's hands under the trust deed which W. H. Smith placed thereon to secure the fund he borrowed from Receiver Phlegar?"

It is claimed on behalf of the appellant that the right of action on the bond and deed of trust executed by Smith never accrued until the death of John W. Wilson, the life tenant, because, as is claimed:

"Receiver Phlegar could not have compelled repayment of the money by W. H. Smith so long as Wilson lived. If sued by the receiver when the bond apparently became due on July 12, 1889, W. H. Smith could have successfully set up the defense (and no doubt would have done so) that all costs of the suit were paid, that the receiver had no need of the money, that the ends of justice did not demand Smith to pay before Wilson's death, that he (Smith) as assignee from Wilson, was entitled to interest on the money so long as Wilson lived, and that, since the money was amply secured by real estate, he, as maker of the bond, was not compellable to pay off the bond before Wilson's death."

It is further claimed that Phlegar, receiver, held the fund in trust as well for the life tenant as for the remainderman, and that, if he had sued to recover on the bond, or proceeded to enforce the deed of trust, Smith would have had the right to set off his life estate in the fund. The further claim is made that the fund sought to be recovered is real estate, and that for some reason, not disclosed by the argument and not otherwise apparent, the statute of limitations is not applicable to the claim. None of these claims is sound.

[1, 2] The fund was under the control of the court, and it was the duty of the court to see that it was preserved so that the life tenant might enjoy the income from it, and the remainderman might receive the principal on the termination of the life estate. The court was under no obligation to lend the money to the life tenant at all, or, if it did, for any particular length of time. It recognized the fact that there might be a change in value of any security that might be offered, and, while it directed the loan to be made to Smith if he desired it, it was particular to provide that the loan should be made for "not exceeding 5 years at a time." Smith well understood that the loan was to be made only for a period of five years, and that the return of the money could be demanded at the expiration of that time. He thereupon executed his bond to the receiver whereby he promised to pay to the receiver "five years after date, with interest from date" the sum of $480.58. When this time expired the court had the right to demand payment and to change the investment for any reason it pleased, or without reason. Smith had given his solemn promise under seal to return the money at that time, and he could not evade it. This bond was secured by a deed of trust on real estate, and the court could at any time after its maturity have enforced it. But the act of limitations began to run on both the bond and the deed of trust at the maturity of the bond. The bond became barred in 10 years, and the deed of trust in 20 years, from that date. The running of the statute was neither prevented nor stayed by the fact that Smith was entitled to the interest on the fund during the lifetime of Wilson. Nor was he entitled, if sued, to set off the present value of an estate for the life of Wilson against his obligation to return the principal in five years. As said in Amer. Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 112 Va. 1, 70 S. E. 534, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 40:

"As a general rule, a party who has a life estate in a fund arising from the proceeds of the sale of land is not entitled to have the value of his life estate commuted and paid to him in gross instead of the annual interest on the fund, unless the parties in interest agree to it."

[3] But, even if he could have claimed such set-off, that fact would not have prevented the statute from running. The existence of a set-off does not prevent the statute from running on the principal demand.

[4] The fund in controversy was the proceeds of the sale of land of which the wife died seized in fee. For the purpose of ascertaining the rights of the parties thereto the court properly held that the money must be treated as real estate, and decreed curtesy therein to the husband and the remainder to the only daughter. This is all that the doctrine of conversion has to do with the case. The money as such was thereafter loaned to Smith under the circumstances hereinbefore detailed.

The right to enforce the deed of trust has long since been barred by the statute of limitations. Hence there was no error in the decree of the trial court so holding, and said decree is accordingly affirmed.

Affirmed.

POWERS v. LONG et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Trusts $\S$ 44(1)—Evidence insufficient to establish parol trust in land.

In a suit to establish a parol trust in land conveyed by the father of the parties to respondent under an alleged agreement to reconvey to complainants, evidence held insufficient to establish the trust.

2. Trusts $\S$ 44(3)—Proof required to establish parol trust in land stated.

To establish a parol trust in land, the declaration must be shown to be unequivocal and explicit, and established by clear and convincing testimony.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Bill by Cotella Long and another against E. M. Powers. From the decree, defendant appeals, and appellees assign cross-error. Reversed and dismissed.

W. S. Powers, the father of the appellant and appellees, on May 11, 1898, executed and acknowledged a deed conveying three certain tracts of land therein described to appellant. This deed was duly recorded on September 26, 1900, and is as follows:

"This deed, made this eleventh day of May, 1898, by and between W. S. Powers, party of the first part, and E. M. Powers, party of the second part,

"Witnesseth that, for and in consideration of the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the party of the first part has this day bargained and sold to the party of the second part all the following described real estate lying and being in Dickenson county, Virginia; One tract on the waters of Sally branch containing one hundred and fifty acres, more or less, and joins the lands of A. J. Mullins, Louisa Kennady, and others; one tract on Alley's creek, containing fifty acres more or less, joining the lands of Ida Kennady and others; one tract on Crane's Nest river, containing twenty-five acres, more or less, sold by the boundary, and not by the acre, joins the lands of Meliad Mullins and others—to have and to hold forever. Party of the first part warrant the title generally to the land hereby conveyed.

"Given under my hand and seal this above date written. W. S. Powers. [Seal.]" (Italics supplied.)

The bill in the cause alleges:

That "the said conveyance to the said E. M. Powers was impressed with a direct express [parol] trust and agreement between the said E. M. Powers the grantee and W. S. Powers, the grantor, that the said E. M. Powers would hold the land conveyed until the children of the said W. S. Powers became 21 years old, and then, in furtherance of the said trust, the said E. M. Powers was to convey the said land to the children of the said W. S. Powers by deed of general warranty when they should reach the age of 21 years; the portion each was to receive being ascertained and understood by said trust agreement."

The bill then alleges that when the appellees became 21 years of age, appellant, in pursuance of said trust, conveyed to them a portion of the land to which they were entitled, and, without stating the definite acreage or otherwise describing the alleged deficit, the bill prayed that the appellant may be required to convey to the appellees the remainder of the land to which they were entitled under the said parol trust, and for general relief.

The answer of the appellant, E. M. Powers, denies that he accepted said conveyance upon any trust agreement, promise, or understanding, express or implied, to the effect that "he was afterwards to convey the same to complainants or any one else." The answer thereupon alleges:

That, on the contrary, said grantor "conveyed this land to respondent voluntarily and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors; that no consideration deemed valuable in law passed from respondent to the grantor for said conveyance, before or at the time the same was made, but that several years thereafter respondent did pay to said W. S. Powers, his grantor, full and adequate value for the part of said land now owned by him, which respondent had surveyed off to himself, which amounted to 15.91 acres"; that the conveyance respondent made to appellees was made at the request of said W. S. Powers; that respondent was under no legal obligation to make such conveyance, but did so "out of respect to the wishes of his father and the like respect for the moral rights of his brother and sister to share in the property of their father. * * *"

Although there were a number of persons, who were members of the family and intimate associates of the grantor, examined as witnesses, there is absolutely no evidence in the case of any declaration of trust having been made by the grantor to any one at the time of or before the aforesaid conveyance, except the testimony of the grantor, which appears from his deposition filed in the cause in behalf of appellees, which was taken 20 years after the conveyance was made, and that testimony consists of the following vague general statements on cross-examination:

"A. I suppose the whole 321 acres [the three tracts conveyed by the deed, which in fact contained more land than the quantities mentioned in the deed] was deeded to him [E. M. Powers] with the understanding that he was to make certain conveyances according to our agreements. * * *

"Q. Isn't it a fact that E. M. Powers didn't know that you had made this conveyance to him, I mean the deed of 1898, for a long time after the deed was made and recorded?

"A. Of course he knew the contract before the deed was ever made, and I never claimed any of the property since 1898.

"Q. Isn't it a fact that you never mentioned this fact to E. M. Powers until a long time after the deed was made?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Please give the time and place where you had a conversation or contract with E. M. Powers what he was to do with this land, or about you going to convey it to him.

"A. I don't remember. It was somewhere in Virginia. The time was some time prior to the deed."

The father had five children—E. M. Powers, the appellant, Mrs. Susie Dotson, Mrs. Maggie Kennedy, and the appellees, Mrs. Cotella Long and Scott Powers, Jr., who were living at the time of the deed in 1898, and, so far as appears, were also living at the time this suit was brought, and when the depositions were taken. None of them testified in the case, except E. M. Powers and Scott Powers, Jr.

Scott Powers, Jr., was examined as a witness in behalf of the appellees, and testified in substance that he knew of the sale by his father of the 10 acres of land, covered by the writing presently to be mentioned, to E. M. Powers, made some 9 or 10 years after 1898, and of the agreement between them on the boundaries of such land, of which the witness gives a description.

Walter Kennedy, the husband of Mrs. Kennedy, was examined as a witness for the appellees, and testified to the effect that, about 9 or 10 years after the deed of 1908, he was present when the said father and the appellee, E. M. Powers, "were talking of trading" for 10 acres of the 15.91 acres aforesaid, and that E. M. Powers had lived on this 10-acre piece of land ever since, and that the witness—

"had never heard him [E. M. Powers] say anything about being a trustee, except, when I took my wife's deed to him, he said he couldn't sign the deed, unless I had an order from his father, or he was present, I believe."

This witness' testimony is also to the effect that there was no designation by the father of the parcel of land Mrs. Kennedy was to get until the year 1904, when he "showed her what part of the land she could have," and that they built there about a year before it was surveyed, and that the boundaries of it were not fixed until it was surveyed, a month or two before Mrs. Kennedy got her deed in 1905.

R. A. Long, the husband of the appellee, Mrs. Long, was a witness in the case for appellees, and his testimony is to the effect that when the appellant, E. M. Powers, executed the aforesaid deed to Mrs. Long, E. M. Powers said:

"That he was to deed this land as Scott [his father, W. S. Powers] wanted it deeded, or when he wanted it deeded to the children, words to that effect."

R. A. Long filed with his deposition a copy of the following writing, which he says he saw in the possession of appellant, E. M. Powers, in the original of which, however, the "fifteen" before the word "acres" had been plainly written over an erasure of the word "ten." Long's testimony is to the effect that otherwise this appeared to be a genuine writing signed by the said father, W. S. Powers, as of the date thereon of July 8, 1907. This writing, as it appears in the record, is as follows:

"I have this day bargained and sold to E. M. Powers fifteen acres of land on the waters of Alley's creek, in Buchanan county, Virginia, at the price of twenty dollars ($20.00) per acre, including storehouse; balance to be paid hereafter. This July 8th, 1907."

"[Signed] W. S. Powers."

In the testimony of the father as to the trust, he first states on examination in chief, that—

"I divided it [the three tracts of land conveyed by the deed of 1898], and deeded a portion to W. R. Keil, and another portion of it to Susie Dotson, my daughter, and another portion of it to Maggie Kennedy, another one of my daughters, and then I deeded the remainder to E. M. Powers, with the understanding that he was to deed all the remaining part to Cotella Long and Scottie Powers [the appellees], except 10 acres, including his [E. M. Powers'] house.

"Q. Did you give to E. M. Powers any writing for this 10 acres?

"A. Yes, sir; I think I did, showing what he was to have.

"Q. Now do you remember the number of acres that the following deeds contained, namely: To W. R. Keil, Maggie Kennedy, Susie Dotson, and the bond to E. M. Powers?

"A. I do not remember the amounts in any of the deeds except Maggie Kennedy's, which was 59 acres, and the amount of the title bond was 10 acres, as I remember."

Then immediately in sequence in the deposition occurs the following questions and answers:

"Q. Then, if I understand you correctly, you had made this division of your land before you conveyed it to E. M. Powers as trustee in the year 1898, and that since that time he has executed conveyances to all the parties named, except the complainants in this suit?

"A. My recollection is that he made these deeds, and I joined in as a release; yes, certainly, the division had been made, and each boundary had been allotted to them, and the lines drawn, at the time of the execution of the deed of 1898.

"Q. Do you know about the date of the title bond that you executed to E. M. Powers for the acres including the storehouse?

"A. I don't remember.

"Q. Was this title bond to E. M. Powers for the 10 acres after the year 1898?

"A. I don't remember whether it was or not."

This is all of this witness' testimony on examination in chief, except the answers to the usual formal introductory questions to a witness. A portion of his testimony on cross-examination has been given above. The following additional excerpts from and references to his testimony on cross-examination and re-examination will be given:

The sole explanation this witness gives as the reason for his making the deed of 1898 appears from the following question and answer on his cross-examination:

"Q. Why did you deed all your real estate to E. M. Powers?

"A. One reason was at the time I was in bad health and did not know what was going to happen."

This witness admits, in substance, that a brother of his, Willie Powers, and himself, had been engaged in the mercantile business under the firm name of Powers Bros., prior to 1898, and that at the time the deed of 1898 aforesaid was executed this firm had failed in business. He denies that he was heavily indebted at that time, and states that—

"I owed a few debts at that time, but they were very small. I paid a hundred cents on every dollar I owed."

There is no evidence in the cause showing the amount of the indebtedness of this witness or of the firm of Powers Brothers at that time; but it is an uncontroverted fact shown in evidence (without any objection to the testimony on the part of appellees on the ground that the answer of appellant was not sufficiently specific in its allegations to permit such proof to be introduced) that, at or about the same time the said deed of 1898 was made by W. S. Powers, the partners of Powers Bros. made a deed to the same E. M. Powers and the wife of Willie Powers, which was in fact fraudulent as to the creditors of the grantors, conveying to them a 200-acre tract of land, which was all the real estate owned by the firm, which was afterwards conveyed by the grantees in accordance with the request of W. S. Powers.

It is an uncontroverted fact shown in evidence that there was no consideration for either of these deeds at the time they were made.

The witness W. S. Powers admits that he and E. M. Powers agreed on the boundaries supposed to contain the 10 acres of land which he sold the latter, and that he then put E. M. Powers into possession of it.

The preponderance of the other evidence in the case clearly shows that E. M. Powers paid his father in full for the 10 acres of land as early as 1907 or 1908, and that the son then had the land surveyed practically according to the boundaries agreed on between himself and his father, and it surveyed out approximately 10 acres, which the son fenced in and took possession of; that before that time or subsequently the father became indebted to this son in the further sum of about $100, and the son without any express authority from the father had the same surveyor, who made the former survey, survey off an additional quantity of land which surveyed out 5.91 acres, approximately, which the son claimed the right to hold in satisfaction of such $100 indebtedness, and was extending his fences so as to inclose it when this suit was instituted.

W. S. Powers admits on recross-examination that he never marked out any of the boundary lines of the land which was conveyed to Mrs. Kennedy as aforesaid before "it was surveyed at the time the deed was made, or about the time the deed was made."

The tract of land first mentioned in the deed of 1898 as containing 150 acres, in fact contained, as it would seem from the evidence, about 174.65 acres. It appears from the uncontroverted evidence in the case that this was the only tract which the father at any time intended his children to have; that, of the residue of the land conveyed by such 1898 deed, the father, after 1898, sold a portion to the son, E. M. Powers, who paid him for it in full, and afterwards held and conveyed it away as undisputed owner; that either before or after 1898 the father sold the balance of said residue of land to one W. R. Keil, and that after 1898 it was conveyed by E. M. Powers to a vendee of W. R. Keil.

The record is not very explicit on the subject, but the preponderance of the evidence indicates that, if the 150-acre tract as described in the 1898 deed contained 174.65 acres, it was, after 1898, disposed of by the son E. M. Powers as follows: He conveyed at the requests of the father, made at the time the respective deeds were made, all after 1898:

To Mrs. Dotson.....	89	acres
To Mrs. Kennedy.....	59.75
To Mrs. Long.....	59.99
The son himself retaining.....	15.91
	<hr/> 174.65

The appellant, E. M. Powers, testified that he was away from home when the deed to him of 1898 was made; that he did not know it had been made until some years afterwards; that nothing was said to him by his father on the subject of this deed prior to the execution and recordation of it; that he thereafter executed the deeds, as and when requested by his father, conveying all of the land away as aforesaid, except that which was bought by himself and paid for as aforesaid, and the 5.91 acres which he considered that he had the right to hold in satisfaction of his $100 debt aforesaid. He first denies, but subsequently practically admits, that he altered the writing given him as a title bond by his father for the 10 acres of land therein mentioned, making it read "fifteen" acres instead of "ten" acres, because he claimed that his father had written him a letter about the year 1915 to have the land he had paid for surveyed off and to convey the balance to the appellees, and he construed this to authorize him to have the additional 5.91 acres surveyed off, as he did, as above stated, although he admitted that the matter of his buying this additional 5.91 acres of land from his father had never been expressly mentioned between them, and that, accurately speaking, his father had never authorized him to do this. The letter referred to was not introduced in evidence.

The wife of E. M. Powers testified as a witness for appellant and stated that W. S. Powers told her that he made the deed of 1898 to E. M. Powers because he (W. S. Powers) was in debt and in order to keep the land conveyed thereby from being sold for his debts. She said this statement was made to her about a year before the date of her testimony. (No objection was made to this testimony by appellees on the ground that the answer was not sufficiently specific in its allegations to permit its introduction.)

John Perrigan, who married a stepdaughter of W. S. Powers, was examined as a witness for appellant, and testified to the effect (without objection being made to the testimony as hearsay) that the general understanding in the family of W. S. Powers was that the deed of 1898 to appellant was made by W. S. Powers to keep the land from being sold by his creditors, and that it was the opinion of the children "that they would get the land or their proportionate part of the land": that he never heard the children say it in that way exactly, and that he did not know that he "ever heard them say in what way or who would make the deed," but that that was "the sort of opinion"; and that he never "heard E. M. Powers or W. S. Powers," that he could remember, "say anything binding either way." He does not testify when this "opinion" arose.

The court below, by the decree which is under review, held that the appellant was entitled to hold the 10 acres of land sold to him by W. S. Powers, being a part of the tract of land which is first mentioned in the aforesaid deed of 1898 from W. S. Powers to appellant, but required the latter to convey to the appellees the unconverted portion of such tract of land, which embraces the 5.91 acres of the 15.91 acres of land in controversy as aforesaid. This action of the court is by the appellant assigned before us as error. The appellees assign as cross-error the action of the court in holding that the appellant is entitled to hold the ten acres of land just mentioned.

Chase & McCoy, of Clintwood, and D. F. Kennedy, of Wise, for appellant.

S. H. & G. C. Sutherland, of Clintwood, for appellees.

SIMS, J. after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The whole case for the appellees turns upon the following question:

[1] 1. Is the parol declaration of trust relied upon by appellees in this case shown to "be unequivocal and explicit and established by clear and convincing testimony"?

The question must be answered in the negative.

[2] That the standard of proof required to establish a parol trust in real estate is that stated in the question is well settled. Fleenor v. Hensley, 121 Va. 367, 93 S. E. 582; Taylor v. Delaney, 118 Va. 203, 86 S. E. 831.

In the case before us the proof is neither clear nor convincing that there was any declaration of trust at the time of or prior to the execution and delivery of the deed of 1898 from W. S. Powers, the father, to his son, the appellant. The evidence, it is true, very clearly shows that there was no consideration at the time for the deed of 1898, and that the father some 9 or 10 years after 1898 decided to sell a portion of the land claimed by appellees to appellant, and to give the residue of the tract, which is especially drawn in question in this suit, to the other children; but the preponderance of the evidence, as we think, establishes that the father did not himself decide to make these gifts until long after 1898, to wit, shortly before or at the times the appellant made the respective deeds of land to the other children, in accordance with the requests of the father, made from time to time after 1898, that he should do so.

The only reason given by the father in his testimony for the making of the deed of 1898 in question is stated in his testimony as follows:

"One reason was at the time I was in bad health and did not know what was going to happen."

This statement, along with the absence of any testimony, even of the father, of any "unequivocal and explicit" declaration of trust until after 1898, and the total absence of any other evidence from any other source of any declaration of trust whatsoever having been made by the father until long after 1898, convinces us that the father made no declaration creating any trust until after the deed of 1898 was delivered and had vested in the appellant the absolute title to all of the land thereby conveyed. It is unnecessary for us to decide whether the prime motive for the making of the conveyance by the father was to shield the land from the chance of its being sold to pay his debts; for, whether that is true or not, the testimony, even of the maker of the deed, does not go any farther than to show that he made a voluntary conveyance to the son of all the land he then owned (three tracts, containing some 321 acres), because he (the grantor) "was in bad health and did not know what was going to happen," depending upon the son to afterwards "make certain conveyances according to our agreements," without stating explicitly or unequivocally what those agreements (or "contracts," as he calls them in another place) were, with his own statement excepting, as of 1898, 10 acres from the alleged trust, which the evidence in the case clearly shows was not mentioned between him and the son until nine or ten years afterwards, with his first statement showing that there was no actual decision made by the donor to give any of the land to the children until the deeds were made to them, which were made after 1898, with his subsequent statement, made in answer to a leading question, to the effect that the division was made in 1898, left in a most general, vague, and unexplicit form, contradicted in part by his own subsequent statements, and wholly contradicted by the other evidence in the case showing that no division or designation of boundaries of the land given to the children was ever made until long after 1898. This evidence in effect shows as we think, that there was in truth no gift to these children until the deeds to them were made, long after 1898, as aforesaid. Such gifts were, of course, necessarily subject to the absolute conveyance which had been made to the appellant in 1898, and dependent for their going into effect upon the assent of the appellant thereto, and his voluntary execution of conveyances putting the same into effect.

Other circumstances shown in the statement preceding this opinion tend strongly to confirm the conclusion just stated, but it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. What has been said is sufficient to show our reasons for holding, as we do, that the proof in the cause fails to establish the parol trust sought to be set up by the bill of the appellees in this cause.

It follows that there is no merit in the cross-assignment of error of appellees, with respect to the provisions of the decree under review, holding that the appellant is entitled to hold the ten acres of land therein mentioned; but as there is error in the decree in so far as it holds that the appellant should make any further conveyance of land to the appellees, we will enter our decree reversing the decree under review in that particular, and dismissing the bill, at the costs of the appellees.

Reversed and dismissed.

GILMER v. FRANCISCO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$ 781(4)—Case rendered moot by execution before supersedeas of order for removal of fence.

The case on appeal by G. from an order that the sheriff remove a fence erected by G. on his land, as claimed by him, but in the road of petitioner, and in violation of an injunction, as claimed by petitioner, becomes moot, so that appeal will be dismissed, by the fence being removed, pending the appeal, before the execution of the supersedeas bond; the case not being one in which the right of G. to have restoration of the fence is involved.

2. Injunction  $\S$ 215—Right to land not determinable in ex parte proceeding for removal of fence erected in violation of injunction.

G. not appearing in an ex parte proceeding by L. to have removed by the sheriff a fence erected by G. in the road of L. and in violation of an injunction, as claimed by L., the court was without jurisdiction to affect, by an order therein, any right and title of G. to the land on which the fence was located.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Scott County.

Ex parte application by W. W. Francisco for an order for removal by the sheriff of a fence erected by T. P. Gilmer in claimed violation of an injunction. From such an order, said Gilmer, claiming the fence was on his own land, appeals. Appeal dismissed.

It appears from the record that in a proceeding commenced before the board of supervisors by applicants, one S. L. Redwine and the appellee, W. W. Francisco, which was appealed to the circuit court by the appellant, T. P. Gilmer, a right of way for a road over the land of the appellant was condemned and established as a private road, to be built and kept up by the applicants, upon a location designated in the report of S. T. Mitchell, surveyor, of his survey thereof, and in the order of the board of supervisors as beginning at a certain known beginning point, about which there is no controversy, to wit:

"In the county road at the intersection of an old road and a line of a boundary of land deeded by Henry Osborne and wife to Charles Harris, dated January 18, 1847, thence [and this is the line in controversy in the case] with said line S.  $19\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$  E. 428 $\frac{1}{2}$  feet to a stake, corner to Jake Harris," etc.

The final order of the circuit court, which approves the order of the board of supervisors and thus establishes the road in the proceeding mentioned, was entered on January 18, 1917.

It appears from the record that subsequently a suit for injunction was instituted in the same circuit court by Redwine and Francisco against the appellant, Gilmer, his agents, etc., to restrain him and them from in any way interfering with said road and the use thereof by the complainants. The only parts of the record in that suit which appear in the record before us are an order of July, 1917, granting a preliminary injunction "according to the prayer of the bill," and the final decree in such suit, entered March 15, 1918, in which the cause is brought on to be heard "upon the bill and exhibits, the answers and exhibits, * * * and the evidence in support of the bill," and the court decreed perpetuating the preliminary injunction and decided:

"That the complainants are entitled to the road as established by the board of supervisors and approved or affirmed by this court on the law side thereof, the center line of which road is the survey made and reported by T. S. Mitchell, surveyor."

On June 19, 1919, Francisco presented a complaint in writing to the judge of said circuit court, in vacation, in which he recited the granting by the court of said preliminary and perpetual injunctions, alleged that the latter was still in force, further alleged that since the granting of such injunction "some person or persons has or have" placed a fence so as to take approximately three-fifths of the road as located—alleging that the fence begins at or near the west edge of the road or right of way and gradually deflects from the west side until it crosses the center line of the road as located, that it is practically impossible to travel over the road with a wagon, that the fence obstructs the road and violates the injunction, and that said fence also interferes with the use of said road by complainant.

The complaint then charges, on information and belief, that T. P. Gilmer and two other persons named "built the fence and obstructed the road," and filed therewith two affidavits, which are to the effect that the fence was built, as charged in the said complaint, by T. P. Gilmer and the two other persons aforesaid; that affiants were present when T. S. Mitchell, surveyor, surveyed the road and "put in the stakes marking the center line of the survey and the boundary lines"; and that the fence obstructed the road as so located on the ground, as alleged in said complaint.

The said complaint prayed:

(1) "That your honor issue a rule, attachment, or such process as is proper for said T. P. Gilmer" and the two other persons aforesaid, "directing them to appear before your honor at such time and place as your honor may direct"; (2) "that such further order enter or process issue as will require said parties to obey the mandate of the circuit court;" (3) "that an order be entered directing the sheriff to remove said fence and obstructions from said road, and, if necessary, authorizing the sheriff to summon T. S. Mitchell, the surveyor, to point out the survey as established by the court and make report thereof;" and (4) "that any other or further order necessary be entered."

Thereupon, on June 19, 1919, in vacation, the judge of said circuit court entered an order, reciting the presentation and prayer of the said complaint, "that a rule be awarded against T. P. Gilmer" and said two other persons "for violating the injunction" orders aforesaid, and reciting the filing of said affidavits with said complaint. Whereupon the order states that, "it appearing from an examination of the facts presented that a rule should be awarded," the court thereupon proceeds to award a rule against Gilmer and the other two parties aforesaid, returnable to the first day of the next ensuing September term of said court, 1919, to show cause, if any they can, why they and each of them should not be punished for contempt of court for "violating the terms of the injunction [aforesaid] by obstructing the road established by the board of supervisors * * * and affirmed by the circuit court by the order [aforesaid], and the interfering with the use thereof by the applicants. * * *

The same order thereupon continues as follows:

"It further appearing from the facts presented that there are now obstructions in said road which interfere with the use thereof, it is ordered that C. W. Dougherty, sheriff of Scott county, remove any and all obstructions which have been placed on said road in violation of the writ of injunction of March 15, 1918, and for the purpose of ascertaining the exact location of said road the sheriff is authorized and directed to summon T. S. Mitchell, the surveyor who shall point out the road as located by him. The sheriff will make a report of his action to the September term, 1919, of said court."

This order was spread on the books in the clerk's office of said circuit court on June 20, 1919.

On May 20, 1920, in term, the further order was entered by said circuit court in the proceeding commenced by said petition which is the order appealed from, which order, after reciting that the execution of the former order of June 20, 1919, was held up or suspended by direction of the court, and that meanwhile C. W. Daugherty's term of office as sheriff had expired, and that Creed Frayser had qualified in his stead as sheriff of the county, provided that it was—

"ordered * * * that Creed Frayser, sheriff, proceed forthwith to execute and carry out said order of June 20, 1919, and to remove said obstructions according to the direction of said order, and make report thereof to the next term of this court."

The foregoing statement shows all that is disclosed by the record in this case, upon which and upon the petition therefor the appeal was allowed. The petition for appeal, however, states that the real controversy in the case involves the right and title of the appellant, Gilmer, to the land west of the road as correctly located on the ground, in accordance with the orders of the board of supervisors and of the court establishing the same. As stated in the petition for appeal, the appellant—

"claims the center of the road to be on a line different from S. 19½° E.; that is, that the surveyor, in locating the road, actually located the same on a line different from S. 19½° E., but by mistake reported same on the degree S. 19½° E.," so that "the center of the road," as established by the orders aforesaid is not "where the surveyor actually ran the line * * * on the ground and drove the stakes."

And appellant further claims that he located his fence, which the order appealed from directed the sheriff to remove, so that it did not obstruct the road if the road were correctly located on the ground in accordance with the orders of the board of supervisors and the court aforesaid. Appellant further takes the positions in his petition that the circuit court has never had any evidence before it on which to adjudicate the question of the true location of the road on the ground in accordance with said orders establishing it, and further that the order appealed from was void, because the court had no ex parte jurisdiction to enter it, and no jurisdiction of the appellant, so as to authorize it to enter such order, since he was not summoned and made no appearance as a party defendant to the proceeding in which the order appealed from was entered. The petition for appeal also takes the position that, since the appeal was granted, the contempt proceeding against appellant above mentioned has been dismissed. The brief for appellee does not deny that the latter allegation is correct.

The brief for appellee, however, moves this court to dismiss the appeal, and the same motion was made in oral argument, on the ground that pending the appeal the sheriff has executed the order appealed from by removing the fence aforesaid from the road as located on the ground by the surveyor, and that the road as so located has been since and is now unobstructed. And these facts are made to appear before us by satisfactory evidence, which is not controverted by the appellant.

S. H. Bond and W. H. Nickels, both of Gate City, and L. P. Summers, of Abingdon, for appellant.

W. S. Cox and J. P. Corns, both of Gate City, for appellee.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

[1, 2] It appears from the statement preceding this opinion that we have nothing but a moot case before us, so that, upon well-settled principles, the appeal must be dismissed. Levy v. Kosmo, 129 Va. —, 106 S. E. 228, and cases cited.

The court below had no jurisdiction, in the ex parte proceeding, in which the appellant was not before the court, when the order appealed from was entered, to affect the right or title of the appellant to the land which he claims is in truth in controversy. So far as such right or title is concerned, if it exists, the order appealed from was and is plainly void, if it had no other support than appears from the record before us, as the appellant claims is the case. Whether the latter claim of appellant is correct or not, the record before us is insufficient for us to determine. It may or may not be that the question of the true location of the road on the ground in accordance with the course of the center of the road as established by the orders of the board of supervisors and the circuit court, was put in issue by the pleadings and proof in the injunction suit and decided by the final decree therein. If so, that matter would be res adjudicata so far as the appellant is concerned. If not so, and if not adjudicated in the road condemnation proceeding, or other proceeding in which appellant was a party, that matter is still undetermined and unaffected by the order of court under review. Neither the bill nor the evidence in the injunction suit, nor the evidence in the road condemnation proceedings, being before us, we cannot pass upon the question as to whether the matter is res adjudicata because of what took place in those proceedings.

In so far as the removal of the fence is concerned, since it has been removed pending the appeal (this having occurred, as we understand it, before the writ of supersedeas was executed), no order we could enter would prevent that removal. The case not being one in which the right of the appellant to restore or have the fence restored is involved, since such right, if it exists, has not been affected by the order appealed from, we have no jurisdiction to enter upon the consideration of the question of whether the appellant is entitled to the alternate relief of a decree against the appellee requiring him to restore the fence.

The appeal will therefore be dismissed, without prejudice to the appellant to assert in any other proper proceeding such right or title as he may have, if any, to the land which he claims in his petition for the appeal to be in controversy.

Dismissed.

HENINGER v. McGINNIS et al.

(121 Va. 70)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses §107(3) — In suit to enjoin diversion of spring water, complainant held not to have sustained burden of identifying water.

On a bill to restrain the defendants from continuing to pipe water from a spring, thus interfering with the natural course of the water therefrom across the complainant's land, held that complainant did not sustain the burden of identifying the water as having come on his land, unless it was in the form of seepages.

2. Waters and water courses §107(2)—Party receiving water from mountain spring through seepage is not entitled to enjoin piping water from spring.

Where the waters of a mountain spring appear in a hollow on complainant's land in the form of seepage, or percolating waters only, he is not entitled to relief by injunction against owners diverting the spring water through pipes.

3. Waters and water courses §107(3)—Evidence held not to show reduction of flow on complainant's land, due to defendants piping from spring.

In a suit to enjoin parties owning a mountain spring from piping water, evidence held not to show that reduction, if any, of the annual flow upon complainant's land is traceable to defendants' piping the spring.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Bill by C. T. Heninger against A. M. McGinnis and others. From decree dismissing his bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Werth & Werth, of Tazewell, for appellant.
Greever, Gillespie & Divine, of Tazewell, for appellees.

SAUNDERS, J. This is a controversy over the diversion of the waters of a spring, referred to in the record as the "mountain spring," and situated on the land of A. M. McGinnis, in Burk's Garden, Tazewell county, Va.

In March, 1904, McGinnis and wife conveyed a portion of this land, containing about 50 acres, to Cleveland T. Heninger and others. Later Heninger acquired several of the shares of the other tenants.

From a diagram in the record it appears that the 50-acre tract adjoins the balance of the McGinnis land on the west, and is at a lower level than the spring, which was on the northern slope of a mountain. The dividing line between the two tracts is indicated on the diagram as a due north and south line. North of the spring, possibly half a mile, and near the line on the McGinnis side, is a house which at successive periods has been occupied by parties who testify in this case. The "mountain spring" is described as a medium sized, constantly flowing spring. A couple of hundred yards, more or less, below this spring, and west of the dividing line that is on the McGinnis side, its waters disappear in a small piece of marshy ground. These waters flow in a defined gully, or drain, from the spring to this little marsh, or place of disappearance. Below this marsh there is dry ground and sod, and a slight elevation across the course of the gully. On the other side of this elevated ground is a hollow, starting on the mountain south of the "mountain spring," and running downwards in a somewhat northeasterly course. This hollow starts and runs on the McGinnis land until a point is reached just above and south of the house mentioned supra. Here the course of the descending hollow crosses the line between McGinnis and the 50-acre tract, and about 50 yards further on it terminates in a sink hole in said tract. All water coming from the mountain along this hollow or channel supra disappears in this sink.

In 1911 A. M. McGinnis and wife sold and conveyed to J. B. Meek and M. Castle the "mountain spring," with the right to maintain a pipe line therefrom, save "as to the amount of water that would be carried by a half-inch pipe, which was reserved for the benefit of the land on which the spring was situated." Thereupon the said Meek and Castle proceeded to wall in the spring, and lay a one-inch pipe therefrom in a ditch along the course of the boundary line between McGinnis' land and the 50-acre tract, crossing the water channel above mentioned near the house on the McGinnis side. This ditch was dug and the pipe line laid in May, 1911. At the spring a half-inch pipe was inserted in said line. This pipe ran to a trough on the McGinnis land, and the overflow of the trough flowed by gravitation along the old channel of the spring to the little marsh heretofore described. There it passed below the surface and disappeared.

It is the contention of the complainant, Heninger (appellant here), that the waters of the "mountain spring," after disappearing in the swamp south of the dry sod and little ridge supra, follow a subterranean channel, and appear on the other side of said ridge in the hollow which heads in the mountain. By natural flow in this channel, these waters would then run past the house previously described, and thence upon the 50-acre tract, where they would be lost in the sink hole 50 yards or more beyond said house.

In the year 1919, 8 years after the diversion of the waters of the "mountain spring" by Meek and Castle, Cleveland T. Heninger, part owner of the 50-acre tract, filed his bill in chancery against said Meek and Castle, and A. M. McGinnis, in which he set up his interest in said tract by reason of his purchase from McGinnis and others, and alleged that the operations of said parties in walling in the "mountain spring," and piping away the flow of same, had deprived him of water to which he was entitled. Complainant specifically alleged in said bill that after the establishment of said pipe line he was "wholly deprived of all water on said 50-acre tract," and to his very great detriment was compelled to drive his stock pasturing on said tract "off said land, a distance of about a quarter of a mile, to water." Further, that—

"This interruption of the natural flow of water to which he was entitled, and the consequent loss to his tract, operated to greatly depreciate the value of his land."

The court was asked to issue an injunction against the defendants, restraining them from continuing—

"to divert the flow of water from said spring away from its natural bed and channel * * * and to remove all of said obstructions to said natural flow, and to permit the whole of the natural flow of said spring to flow into and follow the natural bed and channel in which it would naturally flow, upon the removal of the obstructions, except so much as might be reasonably necessary for the reasonable use and purposes of A. M. McGinnis, to be used by him on his own land upon which said spring was situated."

The defendants answered this bill, denying:

First. That the flow of water from the "mountain spring" "had a fixed, permanent, and well-defined channel and bed through which it flowed to where it crossed the boundary line of the 50-acre tract."

Second. That "the water from said spring always flowed in a fixed, permanent, and well-defined bed and channel by gravitation through and upon the said 50 acres of land."

The answer alleged further by way of defense:

"That the water which for the greater part of the year flowed in the hollow heading in the mountain, and thence upon the 50-acre tract, came from sources other than the 'mountain spring'; that these sources of supply were springs in the hollow and seepages from the sides; that there was no evidence that the overflow from the 'mountain spring' after it sank at the little marsh on the McGinnis land ever reappeared at any portion of the course of the hollow below said spring; that the flow from this hollow upon the 50-acre tract had never been constant, but was dependent upon the rains, and was therefore irregular and capricious; that the hollow, or water course, was dry at times, both before and after the pipe line was established from the spring, and that the pipe line was in no wise responsible for any interruptions of flow in this channel at any time after its establishment; that the flow of water down said hollow which extends on to the 50-acre tract is not, and never has been, in any way diminished by reason of the removal of the water which respondents removed from the said spring through said pipe line."

The complainant filed certain exceptions to this answer, which were overruled. Thereafter both parties took depositions, and, the case coming on to be heard upon the pleadings and depositions, the court dismissed the plaintiff's bill. An appeal from this decree brings the controversy before this court for review. The questions presented are largely questions of fact, as the exceptions appear to have been properly overruled.

Conceding that the waters of the "mountain spring" flowed by a definite, marked channel to the point where they sank, and thence by a subterranean channel to the mountain hollow, reappearing there in such fashion that they could be identified, and thence proceeded by natural flow in the hollow to the 50-acre tract, it would be true that McGinnis would be entitled to such portion only of these waters as would be necessary for the reasonable use and purposes of the tract on which the spring was located, and could not dispose of or interfere with the natural flow of the surplus. But if the waters of said spring disappear wholly on the McGinnis land, and do not appear in the hollow below the ridge, save in the form of seepages in the hollow, resulting from percolations through the soil, or if the waters that run in the hollow cannot be identified with the spring waters that disappear on the McGinnis land, then McGinnis would be entitled to dispose at will of the waters of the "mountain spring."

"The only difference in the application of the law to surface and subsurface streams is in ascertaining the character of the stream. If it does not appear that the waters which come to the surface are supplied by a definite flowing stream, they will be presumed to be performed by the ordinary percolations of water in the soil. A stream or water course consists of bed, banks, and water, and to maintain the right to a water course it must be made to appear that the water usually flows in a certain direction, and by regular channel with banks or sides and having a substantial existence, but it need not be shown that the water flows continually, as it may be dry at times." Tampa Water Works v. Cline, 37 Fla. 586, 20 South. 780, 83 L. R. A. 876, 53 Am. St. Rep. 262; Roath v. Driscoll, 20 Conn. 533, 52 Am. Dec. 352.

In Gould on Waters (3d Ed.) § 280, it is said:

"Water percolating through the ground and beneath the surface, either without a definite channel, or in courses which are unknown, and unascertainable, belongs to the realty in which it is found."

The following from a note to the case of Wheatley v. Baugh, 64 Am. Dec. 727, is cited approvingly in Miller v. Black Rock Springs Imp. Co., 99 Va. 747, 40 S. E. 27, 86 Am. St. Rep. 924:

"Water percolating * * * beneath the surface, without a definite channel, or in courses which are unknown and unascertainable, is not subject to the settled law governing the rights of riparian owners. * * * Water which thus appears not to be supplied by a definite flowing stream is presumed to be the result of the ordinary percolations of water in the soil; such a presumption being necessary to obviate the difficulty of determining whether the water flows in a channel. * * * Where percolating water is found, it belongs to the realty where * * * found."

It is essential for the lower riparian owner who claims that an upper owner has diverted waters to which the former was entitled, to establish that the waters alleged to have been diverted would, without such diversion, flow in natural course upon his land. In other words, the flow on one man's land must be identified with that on the land of the neighbor.

The evidence in this case as to the source and volume of the water flowing by the mountain hollow upon the 50-acre tract is, in the highest degree, conflicting.

All of the witnesses agree that the "mountain spring" has a continuous flow which is but very little affected by weather conditions, but with respect to the other facts in issue they are in acute conflict. Nor is this a com-flict of witnesses with unequal opportunities of observation. In large measure the witnesses testifying have been so situated in the matters of location and occupation, with respect to the premises in question that their opportunities of observation with regard to the volume of water flowing in the hollow below the "mountain spring" are practically equal. The witnesses for the complainant with substantial unanimity state that from year to year until the spring was piped, enough water flowed in the hollow to supply the wants of the 50-acre tract. Several of these witnesses lived in the house mentioned supra. On the other hand, the witnesses of the defendant, with practically equal opportunities of observation, some having lived in the same house, and others in the immediate neighborhood of the spring, state that formerly, as now, the waters in the hollow ceased to run during several months of the year, the flow being dependent upon the character of the season, and that there is at present, taking the flow from month to month, as much water flowing in the hollow, and thence to the sink hole in the 50-acre tract, as flowed before the spring was walled in and the pipe inserted. An illustration of the sharp and direct conflict between the witnesses will be afforded by the following extracts from the record placed in immediate juxtaposition. This testimony relates directly to the volume and flow of the water in the hollow at the house supra before it entered upon the 50-acre tract.

The witness for the complainant whose testimony is cited in this connection is Nannie Rhudy; the witness for the defendant is H. Rosenbaum, now chief of police at Graham, Va.

Nannie Rhudy.

Q. Do you know the 50-acre tract and the "mountain spring" involved in this case, and which has been spoken of in the taking of these depositions?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever live near that spring and get water from it?

A. Got water for years from it. I was raised there.

Q. How old are you?

A. Fifty-eight.

Q. How close to that spring were you raised?

A. About a half a mile from the head of it.

Q. How long did you use the water from that spring?

A. On until I was married. I was married at 21.

Q. How long did you live by it after you were married?

A. Two years. [This witness lived in the same

H. Rosenbaum.

Q. What is your age, residence and occupation?

A. Forty-nine years old; live at Graham, Va.; chief of police.

Q. Did you ever reside in Burk's Garden, and, if so, how far from the "mountain spring" in controversy?

A. I lived on the McGinnis place 2 years.

Q. When was that?

A. I have forgotten the year, about 1900 or 1901; maybe just a little bit later, maybe a year or two later. * * *

Q. During the time you were there, where did the water from the spring run?

A. The water from the spring ran down possibly 200 or 300 yards, and most of it sank. The water from the spring in controversy never did run down to amount to anything, to where we had house subsequently occupied by Rosenbaum.]

Q. Where did you get your water during the two years you lived there, after you were married?

A. I got all my water to wash and do my housework out of that spring (I. e. from the water flowing in the channel by the house. The spring was some distance above the house.) We had another spring there on the other side of the house, that we got our drinking water from. This water got warm when it ran so far.

Q. How far had that water to run you got to use, from the "mountain spring"?

A. About a half a mile, I suppose. * * *

Q. How did you catch the water from the "mountain spring," for the purpose of using it? Did you dam the branch, or have a trough, or how did you get it?

A. We had a trough.

Q. Before you were married, you lived at or near this spring, and used this water?

A. Yes, sir, we moved there the year I was born, and lived there until I was married and 2 years thereafter.

Q. You used water out of that spring, then, 23 years?

A. Yes.

Q. You say you had a trough a half a mile below this spring. What became of the water after it left your trough?

A. It went into a sink hole on the Heninger land. * * *

Q. About how much water ran from the point where it entered the 50-acre tract to the sink hole? How much volume of water was there with reference to there being enough water to water stock on that 50 acres?

A. There was plenty of water when I was there. I never knew of any trouble.

Q. State during the 23 years that you lived there, whether the flow from that spring to the sink hole ever dried up, or not?

A. No, sir, I never saw it dry.

Q. During the summer time, did you have any scarcity of water, or plenty of water?

A. It would get low if there would come a right dry spell. I have known our watering trough. There was another spring below this that furnished the water down to the trough [a smaller spring] where our watering place was.

Q. Then you lived in the house below the spring next to what is now known as the Heninger 50-acre tract?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. During the time you were there, did the water dry up in that branch, or gully, that ran by the house on to what is now called the 50-acre tract where it sank?

A. It did. I had to take my stock over to the other branch, the other spring. * * *

Q. When you say you had to go to that spring to water stock, to which spring do you refer?

A. I refer to the spring on the right-hand side, where we used to get water for drinking purposes, and at the spring house. [This refers to a spring near the McGinnis house that did not empty into the mountain hollow, but flowed a little way, and sank on the McGinnis land. It was not a source of supply for the water in the hollow.]

Q. About how much of the time was this branch that ran by the house dry?

A. Well, during the hot months of summer, we had no water down there except when we had heavy rains.

Q. Was that true every summer you lived there, or not?

A. Yes, sir.

Cross-Examination.

Q. About how much of the year was it dry?

A. Well, I can't say just as to the time, but during the hot months of summer.

Q. You can say about how much of the year, can't you?

A. Maybe four or five months out of the year, except when we had heavy rains.

Q. Do you mean that the water ran four or five months of the year, or was dry that long?

A. No, sir; I mean it was dry. In the winter time we always had water in that branch. We had a watering trough right at the house.

Q. Do you know whether that water came from the "mountain spring" it to get low, but there was always water. Sometimes it would quit running in the trough in the daytime, but it would come in the night good.

Q. There was always water?

A. Always water.

Cross-Examination.

Q. This trough from which you got the water was about a half a mile below the spring?

A. Something near that. Don't know the exact distance.

Q. In speaking of the water, and water supply, you have reference to the place where you got the water at the trough?

A. Yes, sir.

Re-direct Examination.

Q. Where did all the water that flowed into that trough and on down into the sink hole come from?

A. From the spring, or along that branch. It all came down along the same way.

Q. By "that spring" you mean the "mountain spring"?

A. Yes, sir.

any part, or from the other spring you mentioned?

A. Well, there was never any water ran down from that spring [i. e., the "mountain spring"] while I was there; there was another spring up there that furnished the water for the trough.

Q. How do you know that no water ran down there from the "mountain spring"?

A. Well, sir, I lived there and was up there every day, and if there was any water running down from that place I would have seen it. There was a rise in that hollow [i. e. the hollow from the "mountain spring," not the hollow west of this spring], where the water could not run over. It didn't run over that place at all. It sank up there. How the water that came from this other spring could have been the same water; I don't know; I couldn't trace it underground; I don't know nothing about that.

Q. Is it not a fact that there is no constant and never-falling spring up that hollow [the mountain hollow] that could furnish the water to flow in the trough at the house where you lived, except the "mountain spring"?

A. Why there are two springs up there, Captain. Either one could come to the trough.

Q. Do you testify that both of these two springs are constant and never-falling springs?

A. I do; yes, sir. While I was there they were all right.

Re-direct Examination.

Q. You have stated that the spring or two springs below the "mountain spring" which fed the branch that ran by your house, were not dry the years that you were there, but the branch was dry.

A. Yes.

Q. Do I understand from this that the water from that spring, or those springs during the dry seasons always sank or disappeared before reaching the house?

A. Yes, sir; we didn't have any water there to use at all in the summer time, neither summer I was there. When there would come a wet spell, that water would run on Mr. Heninger's place, but it would dry up maybe in a day or so. Maybe there would be a few drops in the trough, just a little, but not enough to water stock at all, and then at times it would be dry—just as dry as it is on this floor.

The evidence relied upon by the complainant to establish his case is the evidence relating to the flow of water in the mountain hollow prior to 1911, and the evidence that this flow was greatly reduced after the pipe line was established. It is contended that the coincidence of the reduction of flow in the hollow in the summer months of the year, with the diversion of the waters of the spring by the pipe line, indicates that the spring waters in their natural flow supplied a measurable proportion of the water in the hollow above the McGinnis house. Apart from the evidence that the flow of water in the hollow was greatly reduced after May, 1911, when the water was piped from the "mountain spring" by the vendees of McGinnis, there is no sufficient evidence to identify the water in the hollow with the overflow from this spring. Undoubtedly, there was flowing water in this hollow during the greater portion of the year, but there were two springs in the hollow, the larger one on the left-hand bank of the hollow going north. This would be the west bank of the hollow, or the bank opposite to the marsh where the waters of the spring disappeared. Conceivably this might be the point of appearance of the waters of the "mountain spring," though they would be more naturally expected to appear on the east bank of the hollow. But if the waters of the "mountain spring," pursuing a distinct subterranean channel appeared at this point, after sinking at the marsh, it would seem that the flow of this spring, if not as great, would be measurably as constant and regular as the flow of the parent waters. But such was not the case. The evidence shows that the flow of this spring was uncertain and irregular, and at times was so slight as to run but a short distance in the hollow. The other sources of supply in the hollow were the second spring, of which little note is taken by the witnesses, seepages along the sides of the channel, and the flow from the head of the hollow due to rains, or melting snows, and persisting during wet seasons.

The defendants put on the stand various witnesses to establish the origin of the waters in the hollow. One of these witnesses was an elderly man named J. C. Kitts, who lived for two years a few hundred yards from the "mountain spring," and who testifies in great detail on the above line. The following extracts are from his testimony:

"Q. When you lived there 25 or 30 years ago, state how the water from the spring ran down the mountain, and what became of it.

"A. Well, it came down the mountain, not very far, * * * and sank there. It was a low, marshy place.

"Q. Did all of it sink?

"A. Yes, sir, all of it sank.

"Q. Did that water that sank reappear at any time, so far as you were able to tell?

"A. No, sir; it never did, so far as I was able to see.

"Q. Do you know where the water came from that ran down the hollow, and ran on to the 50-acre tract?

"A. There are some wet weather springs up there that seep out of the bank; one spring that ran about all of the time.

"Q. On which side of the gully [i. e., hollow] was this spring?

"A. On the right-hand side, as you went up the hollow [i. e. the west side].

"Q. During the two years that you were there, state whether or not water constantly flowed on to the 50-acre tract, or whether there were times when there was no water flowing on this tract.

"A. There were times when there was no water there. In dry times of the year, there wasn't any water that ran down on that tract.

"Q. Was that true of both years you were there?

"A. Yes, sir, both years.

"Cross-Examination.

"Q. During the 2 years that you knew it, how much of the time would you say that the water did not run down there, expressed in weeks, months, or days?

"A. Well, something like, I would say, three months out of the year that it did not run down there to amount to anything at all.

"Q. Would there be any time when no water flowed down on the 50-acre tract, unless it was unusually dry time?

"A. Well, there were times when there wasn't any flowing down there at all.

"Q. Would that be when it was unusually dry?

"A. Well it would be when the weather was dry; it would not be right after a rain.

"Q. Will you tell me where the water came from that you have testified did flow on the 50-acre tract, except in the dry weather you have described?

"A. I suppose it came from the seeps along where the branch ran.

"Q. Isn't it a fact that there is no constant spring that runs all the time anywhere along the hollow leading to the 50-acre tract, other than the 'mountain spring'?

"A. None that I know of, except the springs along the branch [i. e., hollow] below the spring there.

"Q. Do you call them constant springs?

"A. No. There is one spring up there that I never saw dry. It may not go dry, but it didn't afford much water.

"Q. Would it have afforded the water that you say ran on the 50-acre tract?

"A. No, no; there was no water there except them seeps, only in wet weather.

"Q. Well, you have just said when I asked you if that spring would have furnished the water, No, no, that it would not have furnished the water that ran on the 50-acre tract. Isn't that correct?

"A. Well, I don't suppose it would have furnished the water altogether. It would furnish it after a rain. In the wet part of the year, it would furnish the water all along down there."

This witness on re-examination stated that the bulk of the seepages into the hollow, or branch, were on the side of same next to the "mountain spring," that is to say on the other side of the little ridge from the marsh at which the spring waters disappear. Various witnesses for the defendants corroborate the above statements of the witness Kitts. There are no waters appearing in the hollow that are in any way sufficiently identified as the waters from the "mountain spring." It is possible that the seepages come from that spring, and it is further possible that the spring referred to by Kitts on the right-hand side of the hollow going up may be the re-appearance of the waters of the "mountain spring." This possibility is not denied by the witnesses for the defendants, though they do not consider that the identity of the waters is established. There is one noteworthy fact in the evidence proper to be mentioned in this connection. The pipe from the spring was laid in a ditch that followed the dividing line between McGinnis and the 50-acre tract, and crossed the hollow from the mountain near the McGinnis house, referred to supra. This ditch was dug in May, 1911. From the testimony of the complainant it would be expected that at this date water would be flowing in this channel upon the 50-acre tract, since the disappearance, or reduction of this flow is traced to the diversion of the constantly flowing waters of the "mountain spring" by the pipe line. At the time the ditch was being dug, the full flow of the waters of the "mountain spring" was emptying into the little marsh where they disappeared. Several, if not all, of the parties who dug this ditch testify that when they crossed the hollow near the McGinnis house, the same was "dry as a bone."

[1] The trial court was not satisfied that the complainant had identified the water in the hollow with the flow from the "mountain spring," unless it was in the form of seepages, or percolations through the soil, or had established by a preponderance of the evidence that the water diverted by the pipe line had reduced the flow of water upon the 50-acre tract. This burden was upon the complainant. After a careful review of the conflicting and highly contradictory evidence in the record, we are not able to draw a different conclusion from the evidence from that derived by the learned trial court, or to pronounce that conclusion to be erroneous.

[2, 3] If the waters of the "mountain spring" appear in the hollow in the form of seepage, or percolating waters only, the complainant is not entitled to relief. Taking the view most favorable to the complainant of the evidence in the record, it is not considered that he has identified the disappearing waters of the "mountain spring," save to the extent of these seepages, or percolations; nor upon the evidence as a whole are we able to conclude that he has demonstrated that the reduction, if any, of the annual flow of the water upon his land is traceable to the piping of this spring by the defendants, Meek and Castle.

Upon well-established principles, the decree of the trial court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SURRETT et al. v. ESKRIDGE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Bankruptcy § 303(3) — Evidence held to show bankrupt's conveyances to have been made with the bona fide purpose of preferring grantees to extent of bona fide debts.

In action involving validity of conveyances by bankrupt to his son and wife made within four months prior to filing of bankruptcy petition, evidence held to prove that the bankrupt, though he knew at the time he made the conveyances that he was insolvent, conveyed the land with the sole bona fide purpose of preferring the wife and son as creditors to the extent of their bona fide debts without the actual intent to deprive or defeat other creditors of any rights they might have under the Bankruptcy Act and without the contemplation that he would go or be forced into bankruptcy at any time.

2. Bankruptcy § 180 — Bankrupt's conveyances with bona fide intent to prefer creditors to extent of bona fide debts held valid; "hinder, delay, or defraud."

Bankrupt's conveyances, made with knowledge of his insolvency within four months prior to the filing of bankruptcy petition, to his son and his wife in payment of pre-existing bona fide debts, of land not exceeding in value the amount of such debts, for the sole bona fide purpose of preferring the son and wife as creditors to the extent of their bona fide debts and without actual intent to deprive other creditors of their rights under the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 9585-9586) or Code 1919, § 5184, relating to fraudulent conveyances, or under the common law, and without contemplation of going or being forced into bankruptcy, held not void, not having been made as a matter of law with the intent to "hinder, delay or defraud" creditors within Bankruptcy Act of 1898, § 67e, notwithstanding section 60b.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Hinder, Delay, and Defraud.]

3. Fraudulent conveyances § 15(1) — Conveyance preferring bona fide creditors valid.

Under the common law and statutes against fraudulent conveyances, an insolvent debtor, known by himself at the time to be insolvent, may make a valid conveyance of a portion or the whole of his assets to a bona fide creditor or creditors in satisfaction or on account of existing indebtedness if that is his sole purpose, and the transfer is for full value, although conveyance is intended to give such creditor a preference to the exclusion of others.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.

Suit by A. T. Eskridge, trustee in bankruptcy, against McNeal Surrett and others. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Reversed and suit dismissed.

This suit involves the question of whether certain conveyances of property, made by the bankrupt within four months prior to the filing of the petition upon which he was adjudged a bankrupt, to bona fide creditors, for a consideration not in excess of the debts of such creditors and of the full value of the property, were made "with the intent and purpose on his" (the bankrupt's) "part to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors, or any of them," and were hence null and void under the provisions of subsection "e" of section 67 (hereinafter referred to as 67e) of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as amended in 1908, 1909, 1910, and 1917 (Comp. St. § 9651).

The conveyances in question were made on March 15 and 16, 1915, and thereafter duly and promptly recorded. Grantor thereafter prepared and intended to file a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. This petition was completed and sworn to on April 21, 1915, ready to be filed, but before it was filed creditors of the grantor on May 15, 1915, filed a petition upon which the bankrupt was on May 28, 1915, adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt, at which time the appellee was appointed the trustee in bankruptcy of such grantor.

One of the conveyances was made to a son of the grantor in payment of a pre-existing debt to him and in accordance with a promise of the grantor made before the grantor became indebted to the creditors in bankruptcy. The other conveyance was made to the wife of the grantor, at the request of another son, in payment of a pre-existing debt to him, and likewise in accordance with a promise of the grantor made before the grantor became indebted to the creditors in bankruptcy. The indebtedness to these two sons, which furnished the consideration for the two conveyances aforesaid, as is affirmatively shown by the evidence in the case, arose in December, 1911, when the assets of a partnership in a mercantile business, theretofore owned by the father and sons, were sold and the purchaser paid the purchase money in part by conveying certain real estate to the father alone, instead of to him and the two sons, and the father, without objection on the part of the sons, afterwards sold this real estate and used the money in part to purchase the very real estate which was conveyed by said deeds of March 15, and 16, 1915, upon the promise on the part of the father that he would "protect the interest" of the sons in such money.

The evidence also shows that, when the father bought the real estate which was conveyed to the son, Stephen, by the deed of March 15, 1915, he intended it for this son at the time he bought it. This property had a tenant in it when it was bought, and, when the tenant moved out in October, 1913, the father put the son, Stephen, in possession of it, and the latter moved into it at that time, and has since been in possession of it claiming it as his own; that as of that time the father ceased to charge himself with interest on his $800 of indebtedness to this son, charged the son with this property at $800, the valuation of the property, in satisfaction of the debt, and, as he had put a lien on it in favor of the bank for $300, the father at this time gave this son his note for $300 as a set-off against the lien, and the son assumed the payment of this bank debt, and thereafter made payments of the interest and $50 on the principal of such debt. The $300 note given this son was unpaid at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy.

The evidence in the case shows that at the time the conveyances of March 15 and 16, 1915, were made the grantor was, as sole owner, engaged in the retail mercantile business, and that his stock of goods would have inventoried at cost prices about $3,800; that his bills receivable, consisting of store accounts on his books due him by customers would have aggregated about $1,800, and that, not including the real estate conveyed as aforesaid, he owned four vacant lots, which were subject to a lien, but which were afterwards sold by the trustee in bankruptcy at public auction at a price which, after paying such lien, left a balance of $179.62, making a total of $5,779.62; that his total indebtedness then outside of that satisfied by the conveyances aforesaid was about $4,000, leaving a net surplus upon these figures of $1,779.62.

The evidence further shows that there was at that time none of the debts of the grantor in the hands of any attorney or collection agency for collection, so far as the grantor knew. The grantor testifies in substance that he then believed that, if his creditors would give him a reasonable time to pay along on his debts he would be able to pay them all in full from his assets left after the conveyances aforesaid had been made.

The evidence further shows, however, that unknown to the grantor, an attorney had received for collection one of the debts of the grantor, an open account for $265, on March 13, 1915, but this attorney did not write to the grantor about it until March 16, and the letter does not appear to have been received by the grantor until after that date. On March 19 the grantor gave the attorney a note covering this debt, payable April 10, 1915, with interest, and on April 16 he made a small payment on it. Immediately following that time this attorney received a number of other claims against the grantor, and the attorney, without any further communication with him, instituted suits against the grantor as follows: On April 16, 1915, on the claim first above mentioned for $265; on April 17, 1915, on other claims for $606 and $38.83; and on April 19, 1915, on another claim for $19.60. This attorney testifies in the case to the effect:

That, while he was pressing the debtor for payment of the claim first mentioned before suit was brought on it, the debtor stated to the attorney "that he could not pay; that he owed a good many debts, but that he wanted to pay them if he could. I think he stated that he had been giving checks dated ahead and that creditors were pushing him for payment. I know that I was insisting very strongly for my claim, feeling as though he were in failing circumstances from information I had gotten from him and others. * * * My recollection is that he stated that, if his creditors would give him some time, he hoped to pull through, but, if they pressed him, he could not do it. He stated that he owed a large amount and was making an effort to pay off all his creditors. He seemed to be fighting for time. * * *

It further appears from the evidence that the debts of the grantor asserted in the bankrupt proceedings aggregated $3,764, which included the bank debt of $300, which was a lien on the real estate conveyed to the son, Stephen, as aforesaid. Deducting this, there were left of these debts $3,464.

The trustee had an inventory and appraisal made on June 3, 1915, which showed a total stock of goods valued at $2,121; it not appearing whether the inventory was made at or below cost.

There were bills receivable on the books of the bankrupt at this time aggregating $1,400, but which the appraisers "estimated and reported as being uncollectible, or probably 5 per cent. of same could be collected."

The trustee sold the stock "in June or July, 1915," and realized from same and bills receivable $1,559.44.

The evidence in the case further shows that at the time of said conveyances in March, 1915, the sons and wife of the grantor did not know that he was insolvent, if he was then insolvent, and did not know that such deeds were made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors of the grantor, if they were in fact made with such intent on the part of the grantor, nor did they or either of them have reasonable cause to believe that such conveyances were intended to effect a preference among the creditors of the grantor.

In the decree of November 15, 1917, which settled the principles of the cause, and upon which the final decree was based, this is said:

"* * * The court doth consider that the conveyance dated March 15, 1915, from McNeal to Stephen F. Surratt and the conveyance dated March 16, 1915, from McNeal Surratt to Alice M. Surratt, filed as Exhibits C and D, respectively, with the bill, were made within four months of the adjudication of said McNeal Surratt as a bankrupt when said McNeal Surratt was insolvent to his own knowledge, and were made in consideration of pre-existing indebtedness from said McNeal Surratt to Stephen F. Surratt and M. T. Surratt, filed as Exhibits C and D, respectively (the latter having directed the deed, Exhibit D, to be executed to Alice M. Surratt, his mother, instead of to himself), and with the intent to prefer said Stephen F. Surratt and M. T. Surratt as creditors, and as preferences to the extent of the value of the properties thereby conveyed respectively, voidable and recoverable, under the provisions of section 67e of the federal Bankruptcy Act, though not voidable under the Virginia statutes of fraudulent and voluntary conveyances." (Italics supplied.)

The final decree of February 24, 1919, held that the value of the real estate conveyed to the son, Stephen, by the deed of March 15, 1915, was $700, that the value of the property conveyed to the wife by the other deed was $800, and provided that the sum of $700 with interest from March 15, 1915, be charged as a lien against the former property, less the bank debt of $250 as it then stood, and that the sum of $800 with interest from March 16, 1915, be charged as a lien against the latter property, and that, unless these sums were paid to the trustee in bankruptcy within 60 days from the rising of the court, a special commissioner thereby appointed was directed to sell such property, etc.

F. W. Morton, of Pulaski, for appellants.
H. C. Gilmer, of Pulaski, for appellee.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

[1, 2] 1. We are of opinion that the evidence in the record before us presents a case in which the grantor knew, at the time he made the conveyances in question, that he was insolvent, in the sense that he did not have the then present ability to pay, and that his property would not realize enough to pay all of his creditors in full if they pressed for prompt payment. But we are also of the opinion that the grantor did not make the conveyances with any "intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, * * * or other persons of or from what they are or may be lawfully entitled to," within the meaning of the statute in Virginia against fraudulent conveyances (now Code 1919, § 5184), or within the meaning of the common law, but made the conveyances with the sole bona fide purpose of preferring the grantees as creditors to the extent of their bona fide debts, which did not, respectively, exceed the value of the property conveyed by the respective deeds. And we are of the further opinion that at the time the conveyances were made the grantor did not contemplate that he would voluntarily go or be forced into involuntary bankruptcy at any time, and did not make the conveyances with the intent to defeat or deprive his creditors of any rights they might thereafter have under the Bankruptcy Act; that the unlooked-for severity of the creditors in instituting suits against him forced the grantor into bankruptcy unexpectedly to and not anticipated by him at the time of the conveyances, and that the grantees at the time of the conveyances did not know or have reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give them a preference among the creditors of the grantor.

2. The sole question presented for our decision by the assignments of error is whether, upon this statement of facts, the conveyances in question were made with the intent and purpose on his (the bankrupt's) "part to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors or any of them," within the meaning of section 67e of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as amended in 1903, 1906, 1910, and 1917. This question must be answered in the negative.

The question under consideration is one of some nicety, but it is unattended with any real difficulty in so far as the principles involved are concerned. Difficulty often arises in the application of such principles to the facts of particular cases; but, in view of the circumstances of this particular case which appear in evidence, we have found no difficulty in such application.

The question we have to deal with was the subject of consideration by this court in Webb v. Lynchburg Shoe Co., 106 Va. 726, 56 S. E. 581, and again upon the rehearing of that case, reported in 107 Va. 807, 60 S. E. 130. In that case the facts adverted to in the opinion were that the bankrupt on October 1st sold the whole of her property, except household goods amounting to $250, which she claimed as exempt (the property sold consisting of a stock of goods and book accounts), for $7,500, $7,100 of which she distributed among three creditors, and paid the residue in small sums upon certain other debts, leaving other creditors' debts amounting to $5,864.47 on which nothing was paid. On the very next day after said sale the bankrupt employed counsel to prepare for her a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. This petition was sworn to on October 4th, filed on October 7th, and she was adjudicated a bankrupt on October 10th. Commenting on these facts, this court said in the opinion delivered by Judge Keith:

"* * * In the case before us it appears that the debtor, in contemplation of bankruptcy and immediately before filing her petition, being insolvent, disposed of substantially the whole of her estate to certain creditors," etc. (Italics supplied.)

What the case holds, as stated in the conclusion of the opinion, is as follows:

"In this case (without going into a discussion of the evidence in detail) we think the facts adverted to * * * were such as to entitle the plaintiff in error to have a jury say whether Webb made the payment under consideration with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud her creditors, and that instruction 5, asked for by the plaintiff in error [which would have submitted that question of fact to the jury] should have been given."

There are, it is true, expressions in the opinion in the Webb Case on the first hearing, and also upon the rehearing, which are capable of the construction that the court meant to say that, where the conveyance or transfer is made within four months of the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, the existence of the mere intention on the part of the bankrupt at the time of the conveyance to prefer certain creditors to the exclusion of others is such constructive fraud, or fraud per se, as must be regarded as embodying the "intent and purpose on his [the bankrupt's] part to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors," within the meaning of section 67e of the Bankruptcy Act aforesaid. Much of the argument before us has been over the question of whether this court in the Webb Case did so hold or intend to so hold, or whether it held or intended to hold that the mere intent of the bankrupt in such case to prefer certain creditors to the exclusion of others is not such constructive fraud or fraud per se as must be regarded as embodying the intent and purpose aforesaid mentioned in section 67e of the Bankruptcy Act. We think that the latter, and not the former, is the true meaning and intent of the holding of this court in the Webb Case. We think that what this court in that case meant to hold and actually held was that the "intent and purpose" in question, in order to bring the conveyance or transfer within the condemnation of section 67e aforesaid, must be an actual intent to defraud creditors—that is, an actual intent to deprive creditors of something to which they were lawfully entitled.

[3] Now at common law and under the Virginia statute against fraudulent conveyances it is well settled, and is unquestioned before us, that an insolvent debtor, known by himself at the time to be insolvent, may make a valid conveyance of a portion or the whole of his assets to a bona fide creditor or creditors, in satisfaction or on account of existing indebtedness, if that is the sole purpose of the debtor, and the transfer is for full value, although such conveyance may and is intended by the grantor and grantee or grantees to give such creditor or creditors a preference to the exclusion of others in the distribution of the assets of the debtor. In such case other creditors are not lawfully entitled to any share in the assets transferred to the preferred creditor or creditors. What the law sanctions cannot be regarded as unlawful. In such case it is only where the transfer is not made with the sole purpose on the part of the debtor of making a bona fide preference among his creditors, and where that is merely an incident of the transaction, used as a cloak for some other purpose which is fraudulent in actual intent, that the transfer is regarded as unlawful.

As said by Lord Mansfield in Codogan v. Kennett, 2 Cowp. 432, concerning the statute 13 El. c. 5, and the common law:

"* * * The statute does not militate against any transaction bona fide, and when there is no imagination of fraud. And so is the common law. But, if the transaction be not bona fide, the circumstances of its being done for a valuable consideration will not alone take it out of the statute."

And so in the case of a conveyance by the debtor, making a preference among his creditors, executed within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, which does not fall within the condemnation of section 60b of the Bankruptcy Act (Comp. St. § 9644), because there is an absence of the grantee's having reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of the transfer would effect a preference among the creditors of the grantor. But, while in such case the mere making of the preference does not show an intention on the part of the grantor to take from the other creditors anything to which they are lawfully entitled, so as to bring the case within the condemnation of 67e of the Bankrupt Act, if the conveyance were made by the grantor in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the actual purpose of defeating the operation of that act in the matter of the equal distribution of assets among creditors which it requires, that would be an actual intent to deprive creditors of something to which they would be lawfully entitled, and would bring the case within section 67e of such act. And so would any other actual fraudulent intent against creditors, existing on the part of the debtor at the time of the conveyance, superadded to the intent to make a preference. It is not the mere intent to make or the mere result of making a preference between creditors which section the condemns, but the superadded intent on the part of the debtor to do something further, to wit, to deprive the creditors, or some one of them, of something they are lawfully entitled to.

And such is the holding in the case of Coder v. Arts, 213 U. S. 223, 29 Sup. Ct. 436, 53 L. Ed. 772, 16 Ann. Cas. 1006, decided since the decision of the Webb Case, with respect to the proper construction of 67e of the Bankruptcy Act aforesaid. In that case the bankrupt was insolvent at the time he made the conveyance in question, and knew at the time that he was insolvent. The conveyance, a mortgage, was made May 2, 1904. The debtor filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy on July 27, 1904. At the time the mortgage was given neither the creditor preferred thereby nor his agent acting on the matter had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended to give him a preference. The Circuit Court of Appeals certified the above in its finding of facts, and also that the bankrupt "did not make the mortgage [of May 2, 1904] with any intent or purpose on his part to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or any of them."

What the Supreme Court says in the unanimous opinion of the court in the Coder Case is so exhaustive and conclusive upon the subject we have under consideration that we shall quote at length from the opinion as follows:

"The decision of the case requires consideration of certain sections of the Bankruptcy Act. Section 60, subd. 'a' (as amended by section 13, 32 Stat. at L. 799, c. 487; U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, p. 1031), provides:

"A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has, within four months before the filing of the petition, or after the filing of the petition, and before the adjudication, procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property, and the effect of the enforcement of such judgment or transfer will be to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class."

"Such preferences may be set aside under the condition named in subdivision 'b' of section 60 (as amended by section 13), which is as follows:

"If a bankrupt shall have given a preference, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person."

"Manifestly, this conveyance could not be set aside under the provisions of section 60b. For, while it is true that, under the facts found, the conveyance might be deemed a preference, as a transfer of property which would have the effect of enabling one creditor to obtain a larger percentage of his debt or claim than other creditors of the same class, yet, as it is distinctly found that neither the mortgagee nor his agent had any reasonable cause to believe that it was intended to give a preference, the same could not be avoided under section 60b.

"The reliance in this case is upon section 67e of the act. This section, so far as it is necessary to consider it, reads as follows:

"d. Liens given or accepted in good faith, and not in contemplation of or in fraud upon this act, and for a present consideration, which have been recorded according to law, if record thereof was necessary in order to impart notice, shall not be affected by this act.

"e. That all conveyances, transfers, assignments, or incumbrances of his property, or any part thereof, made or given by a person adjudged a bankrupt under the provisions of this act, subsequent to the passage of this act, and within four months prior to the filing of the petition, with the intent and purpose on his part to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors, or any of them, shall be null and void as against the creditors of such debtor, except as to purchasers in good faith and for a present fair consideration; and all property of the debtor conveyed, transferred, assigned, or incumbered as aforesaid shall, if he be adjudged a bankrupt, and the same is not exempt from execution and liability for debts by the law of his domicile, be and remain a part of the assets and estate of the bankrupt, and shall pass to his said trustee, whose duty it shall be to recover and reclaim the same by legal proceedings or otherwise for the benefit of the creditors." 30 Stat. at L. 564, c. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3449.

"It is the contention of the appellant that, as the necessary consequence of the giving of the mortgage under consideration was to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors of the bankrupt in the collection of their debts, Armstrong must be presumed to have intended such consequences, and the mortgage is therefore voidable.

"A consideration of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Law as to preferences and conveyances shows that there is a wide difference between the two, notwithstanding they are sometimes spoken of in such a way as to confuse the one with the other. A preference, if it have the effect prescribed in section 60, enabling one creditor to obtain a greater portion of the estate than others of the same class, is not necessarily fraudulent. Preferences are set aside when made within four months, with a view to obtaining an equal distribution of the estate, and in such cases it is only essential to show a transfer by an insolvent debtor to one who himself or by his agent knew of the intention to create a preference. In construing the Bankruptcy Act this distinction must be kept constantly in mind. As was said in Githens v. Shiffer, 112 Fed. 505: 'An attempt to prefer is not to be confounded with an attempt to defraud, nor a preferential transfer with a fraudulent one.' In Re Maher, 144 Fed. 503-505, it was well said by the District Court of Massachusetts:

"In a preferential transfer the fraud is constructive or technical, consisting in the infraction of that rule of equal distribution among all creditors which it is the policy of the law to enforce when all cannot be fully paid. In a fraudulent transfer the fraud is actual—the bankrupt has secured an advantage for himself out of what in law should belong to his creditors, and not to him.'

'Is the conveyance voidable under subdivision 'e,' § 67? Under the terms of that subdivision a fraudulent conveyance is made void as to creditors, except as to grantees in good faith and for a present fair consideration. The provision saving conveyances to purchasers in good faith and for a present fair consideration prevents such conveyances from being declared void by the act, although they have been made by the bankrupt with the intent on his part to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors. But the act does not dispense with the necessity of showing, to avoid a conveyance or transfer under section 67e, that the bankrupt had the actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. What is meant when it is required that such conveyances, in order to be set aside, shall be made with the intent on the bankrupt's part to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors? This form of expression is familiar to the law of fraudulent conveyances, and was used at the common law, and in the Statute of Elizabeth, and has always been held to require, in order to invalidate a conveyance, that there shall be actual fraud; and it makes no difference that the conveyance was made upon a valuable consideration, if made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors. The question of fraud depends upon the motive. Kerr, Fraud and Mistake, 196, 201. The mere fact that one creditor was preferred over another, or that the conveyance might have the effect to secure one creditor and deprive others of the means of obtaining payment, was not sufficient to avoid a conveyance; but it was uniformly recognized that, acting in good faith, a debtor might thus prefer one or more creditors. Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61, 20 L. Ed. 329, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1163; Huntley v. Kingman & Co., 152 U. S. 527, 38 L. Ed. 540, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 688.

'We are of opinion that Congress, in enacting 67e, and using the terms 'to hinder, delay or defraud creditors,' intended to adopt them in their well-known meaning as being aimed at conveyances intended to defraud. In section 60 merely preferential transfers are defined, and the terms on which they may be set aside are provided; in 67e, transfers fraudulent under the well-recognized principles of the common law and the Statute of Elizabeth are invalidated. The same terms are used in section 3, subd. 1, in which it is made an act of bankruptcy to transfer property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Such transfers have been held to be only those which are actually fraudulent. It was so held in Lansing Boiler & Engine Works v. Ryerson, 63 C. C. A. 253, 128 Fed. 701. Considering the language, which is identical with that in section 67e, the Circuit Court of Appeals, speaking through Judge Severns, said:

"The language of subsection 1 of section 3 is the familiar language of statutes against conveyances fraudulent as against creditors, and we think there can be no doubt that Congress intended the words employed should have the same construction and effect as have for a long period of time been attributed to those words. Githens v. Shiffer (D. C.) 112 Fed. 505. And, so construed, the test of the conveyances intended by subsection 1 of section 3 is that of the bona fides of the transfer. Loveland, Bankr. (2d Ed.) § 51. For it is the well-settled law that a conveyance made in good faith, whether for an antecedent or present consideration, is not forbidden by such statutes, notwithstanding the effect may be that it hinders or delays creditors by removing from their reach assets of the debtor.'

"And to the same effect is the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Second Circuit in Re Bloch, 74 C. C. A. 250, 142 Fed. 676, in which that court had occasion to consider the meaning of section 67e as applicable to 57g of the act, as amended 1903, requiring the surrender of preferences voidable under section 60, subd. 'b,' or of fraudulent conveyances voidable under section 67e, in order to make proof of a claim, and, in considering section 67e, Judge Townsend, speaking for the court, said:

"We think Congress must be presumed to have intended by the introduction of section 67e to require a surrender only of such transfers as would have been fraudulent at common law, or would constitute an act of bankruptcy under section 3 of the act. In Githens v. Shiffer, supra, the bankrupt used the proceeds of a sale of property to prefer certain creditors. The court, upon a review of the authorities, held that section 3 applied only to those transfers which, according to the established course of authority, constituted a fraudulent transfer at the time of the passage of the Bankruptcy Act, and held that a mere preferential transfer, as distinguished from a fraudulent one, was not an act in bankruptcy under said section 3.

"The question as to whether a transfer is made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud depends upon whether the act done is a bona fide transaction. Loveland, Bankr. 391; Cadogan v. Kennett, 2 Cowp. 435; Lansing Boiler & Engine Works v. Ryerson, supra. An intent to defraud is the test of the right to avoid a transfer under section 67e.'

"In dealing with this question this court said, in Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 49 L. Ed. 577, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 308:

"There is no finding that, in parting with the possession of the property, the mortgagor had any purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding his creditors or any of them. Without a finding to the effect that there was an intent to defraud there was no invalid transfer of the property within the provisions of section 67e of the Bankruptcy Law.'

"That it is essential to show actual fraud in order to invalidate conveyances under section 67e is the view of the text-writers upon this subject. Loveland, Bankr. (3d Ed.) 476; Collier, Bankr. (6th Ed.) 562; 1 Remington, Bankr. § 1498."

It is true the Coder Case was decided upon the finding of facts by the court below. The opinion more than once, in parts not quoted, alludes to that situation. And that finding of facts certified that the bankrupt did not make the transfer in question "with any intent or purpose on his part to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or any of them." But, if the Supreme Court in the Coder Case had had a case before it in which that actual intent existed at the time the transfer was made (the conveyance not having been made for a present consideration), there can be no doubt that the court would have held that the transfer was void under section 67e of the Bankruptcy Act. But this does not in any way impair the fact that the holding of the Supreme Court is precisely what we have set forth above as our understanding of the holding of our own court in the Webb Case.

And while, of course, the fact that an insolvent debtor has, by the conveyance or transfer in question, made a preference among his creditors, is a circumstance which, along with all the other circumstances in the case, will be taken into consideration in determining whether there was an actual intent to defraud creditors, our finding of facts, above set forth, is to the effect that in the case before us the superadded fact of the existence of an actual intent on the part of the grantor to defraud his creditors was absent. So that we have before us precisely the case which was before the Supreme Court in the Coder Case, that is, one in which the facts are that the insolvent grantor, knowing himself at the time to be insolvent, made the transfer in question with the sole intent and purpose to prefer certain bona fide debts to the exclusion of the debts of other creditors. Hence the conclusion necessarily follows that the case before us does not fall within the operation of section 67e aforesaid.

And it is not even contended before us that the grantees were affected with the constructive knowledge mentioned in section 60b aforesaid, so as to bring the case within the condemnation of that section.

It is true that in Dean v. Davis, 242 U. S. 438, at page 444, 37 Sup. Ct. 130, at page 131, 61 L. Ed. 419, at page 444, which is cited and relied on by appellee, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, delivered by Mr. Justice Brandeis, this is said:

"A transfer, the intent (or obviously necessary effect) of which is to deprive creditors of the benefits sought to be secured by the Bankruptcy Act 'hinders, delays or defrauds creditors,' within the meaning of section 67e."

But the court is there referring to the obviously necessary effect which the debtor actually had in mind, or in contemplation, at the time of the transfer. In that case the facts were, as stated in the opinion of the court, that the debtor not only knew that he was insolvent and that he was making a preferential payment, but that he made such preferential payment to avoid a threatened criminal prosecution, and the court said that he must have known that suspension of his business and bankruptcy would result from the giving and recording of such a mortgage; that is to say he must have made the transfer in actual contemplation of bankruptcy. And, although this was true, the court does not even then hold that such facts per se show that the case comes within section 67e aforesaid; but, immediately following the quotation next above, the opinion proceeds as follows:

"Van Iderstein v. National Discount Co., 227 U. S. 575, 582, 57 L. Ed. 652, 654, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 343, points out the distinction between the intent to prefer and the intent to defraud. * * * Making a mortgage to secure an advance with which the insolvent debtor intends to pay a pre-existing debt does not necessarily imply an intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. * * *"

On the other hand:

"The fact that the money advanced is actually used to pay a debt does not necessarily establish good faith. It is a question of fact in each case what the intent was with which the loan was sought and made."

All of which is in entire accord with the Coder Case.

This is made still plainer by reference to the case of Van Iderstine v. National Discount Co., 227 U. S. 575, 33 Sup. Ct. 343, 57 L. Ed. 652. The Supreme Court affirmed the Circuit Court of Appeals in that case. In the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, reported in 23 Am. Bankr. R. 345, 174 Fed. 518, 98 C. C. A. 300, this is said:

"There is a marked distinction between a preferential payment and a fraudulent conveyance. Every preferential payment must to some extent hinder and delay creditors, but it is not necessarily a fraudulent conveyance."

The Coder Case is here referred to and quoted from. The opinion then continues as follows:

"A preferential payment may be constructively fraudulent, but it is not in and of itself a fraudulent conveyance. It can only become the latter in the unusual case where actual fraud in addition to the preference is established. Thus a secret trust in favor of a person making such payments might turn a mere preference into a fraudulent conveyance. But there is no proof in this case of any intent to hinder or defraud creditors more than the preferential payments in themselves would have hindered them."

In the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case last cited (227 U. S. at page 582, 33 Sup. Ct. at page 345, 57 L. Ed. at page 654), this is said:

"There is no necessary connection between the intent to defraud and that to prefer, but, inasmuch as one of the common incidents of a fraudulent conveyance is the purpose on the part of the grantor to apply the proceeds in such manner as to prefer his family or business connections, the existence of such intent to prefer is an important matter to be considered in determining whether there was also one to defraud. But the two purposes are not of the same quality, either in conscience or in law, and one may exist without the other. The statute recognizes the difference between the intent to defraud and the intent to prefer, and also the difference between a fraudulent and a preferential conveyance. One is inherently and always vicious; the other innocent and valid, except when made in violation of the express provisions of a statute."

The decrees under review must therefore be reversed, and we will enter a decree dismissing the bill, with costs to applicants.

Reversed and dismissed.

JABBOUR BROS. v. HARTSOOK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(13) — Verdict for defendant held not supported by evidence.

Where the lease forbade subletting and provided for termination for arrears in rent, but defendant sublet part of the property and agreed to pay additional rent therefor, undisputed evidence in an action for unlawful detainer that the increased rent had not been paid when notice to quit was served, which terminated the lease, held insufficient to sustain a verdict for defendant.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨108(2)—Tender of overdue rent after termination of lease ineffectual.

Where a lessor gave notice of termination of the lease for nonpayment of rent, a tender of such rent after the time fixed by the notice for delivery of possession was too late.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨108(1)—Contract provisions as to termination of lease held controlling.

Where a lease authorized lessor, if the rent was in arrears and unpaid, to terminate at the expiration of 10 days from time of giving notice, neither the common-law rules as to procedure to terminate a lease for nonpayment of rent nor the statute on the subject had any application.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Roanoke.

Action by T. E. B. Hartsook against Jabbour Bros. A verdict for defendants was set aside, judgment rendered for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

This is an action of unlawful detainer instituted by the defendant in error, Hartsook, to recover of the plaintiffs in error, Jabbour Bros., a partnership (composed of several partners whose names need not be here stated), certain storerooms located in the city of Roanoke.

The several premises were all demised by Hartsook, the lessor, to Jabbour Bros., the lessees, by a single lease in writing, bearing date and executed November 9, 1918. The lease contained the following provisions with respect to the use of the premises, etc., namely, that the premises were—"to be used for general wholesale merchandise and for no other purpose, for the term of (36) thirty-six months, to commence on the 1st day of May, 1919, at the rent of * * * $295.00 per month, payable in regular monthly payments of $295.00 at the office of the agent of the lessor in the city of Roanoke on the 1st day of June, 1919, and each successive month thereafter during the continuation of this lease. The above letting is upon the following terms and conditions:

"First. Lessee will, without any previous demand therefor, pay the specified rent at the time, and in the manner above provided. * * *

"Second. Lessee shall not, without the written consent of the lessor first indorsed hereon, use the said premises nor allow them to be used for any purpose other than is herein provided, nor assign this lease, nor underlet the said premises or any part thereof for the whole or any part of the said term. * * *

"Seventh. It is further agreed that, if said rent shall at any time be in arrears and unpaid, or if the lessees shall fail to comply with any of the conditions of this lease, * * * lessor may cause a notice to be left on the premises of his intention to determine the same, and at the expiration of ten days from the time of leaving such notice this lease shall absolutely determine."

There was a trial by jury which resulted in a verdict for the defendants, the lessees, Jabbour Bros. This verdict the trial court set aside and entered judgment for the plaintiff lessor, Hartsook, and the lessees have appealed.

The material evidence, conflicts in the evidence, and other pertinent matters are as follows:

Some time prior to April 22, 1919, the said lessees underlet one of the storerooms, designated in the record as "the corner room (Market Square)," and also alike designated as "room No. 103 on Market Square," to one Constantine, to be used for a candy and fruit store—i. e., for sale of candy and fruit, among other things. This subletting was in fact for a period of one year to begin on May 1, 1919. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether the lessor, Hartsook, knew of the length of this subletting until the next February or March, but there is evidence tending to show that he knew of this prior to or on April 22, 1919, and we will regard that as a fact in the case. It is an uncontroverted fact that the lessor, Hartsook, on or before April 22, 1919, knew that Jabbour Bros. had sublet said corner storeroom to Constantine and objected to this subletting of such room, to be used for the sale of candy and fruit, in an interview, or interviews, with one of the partners of Jabbour Bros. On April 22, 1919, according to Hartsook's testimony, he went over to see one of the partners, whom he mentions, and said to him:

"I understand that you have rented this building [the said corner storeroom] to Mr. Constantine." And they said, 'He is a poor fellow, and we haven't any goods to go in there yet, and I thought I would let him go in there until we got some goods to go in there.' And I said, 'That is not in accordance with our contract, and I insist on your not putting him in.' And I went back and wrote a letter and said that, 'If you do put him in there I am going to charge you additional rent.'"

This letter was as follows:

"Hartsook & Cleaton,
"Real Estate—Rental Agents
"Roanoke, Va., April 22, 1919.

"Jabbour Bros., Market Square, City—Dear Sirs: This is to notify you that in subrenting the corner room (Market Square) for candy and fruit store is not in accordance with our contract, as it was distinctly agreed upon to use same for merchandise in dry goods line only and I told Mr. Jibran (Jabbour) that I understood the party on the corner had rented same and that it was unsatisfactory to do so, and by so doing I will demand an additional rent of $12.50 per month while he remains a tenant, so you will have to charge the new tenant the advance.

"This will be your sufficient notice to that effect.

"Yours very truly,

"Hartsook & Cleaton,
"By T. E. B. Hartsook."

The testimony of and for the lessor, Hartsook, is silent as to whether Jabbour Bros., on or after the receipt of this letter, consented to its stipulation for and agreed to pay the extra rent of $12.50 per month thereby demanded. Such testimony is to the effect that Jabbour Bros. never actually paid or offered actual payment of this extra rent until the tender of their check, dated April 8, 1920, which included this accrued extra rent to April, 1920, which tender was made on April 8, 1920, as is hereinafter further mentioned.

The testimony of one of the Jabbour Bros. as to what occurred on the last-named subject when they received the letter of April 22, 1919, is, so far as in point, as follows:

"Mr. Hartsook brought this letter and says, 'Being as you all are going to rent to this man, we must have $12.50 more for this store.' * * * I told Mr. Hartsook it would be all right. * * *"

Following this, Constantine took possession of said corner storeroom and entered upon his subtenancy on May 1, 1919.

There is other testimony of this witness in the record to the effect that his concern had a large expense in putting the corner store in condition for use, and that subsequently they did not pay the extra rent because they were asking Mr. Hartsook not to insist on it because of the said expense they had been put to and because they had been really trying to meet Mr. Hartsook's wishes and get Constantine to vacate the store and hoped to do so, but failed, and that when Mr. Hartsook rendered a bill in December, 1919, for the extra rent then accrued the witness "assured him if that was the only penalty we would be willing to pay it," but did not in fact then or afterwards pay it, as they were taking all the time they could get on it and hoped to get Hartsook to waive his demand for it up to the time of their receipt of the notice to vacate, presently to be mentioned.

The $295 monthly rent stipulated for in the original lease was promptly paid each month by the lessees and accepted by the lessor up to and including the month of March, 1920.

On the side of the lessor, Hartsook, the testimony is to the effect that he did not intend to insist on the payment of the extra rent for which he stipulated in the letter of April 22, 1919, and which the testimony for Jabbour Bros. shows they agreed to pay, if Jabbour Bros. had gotten Constantine to vacate the corner room aforesaid within a short time, and that they kept leading him along by fair promises as to getting Constantine out and hard luck talk from time to time until December 20, 1919, when he wrote them the letter, which so far as material, is as follows:

"Hartsook & Cleaton
"Real Estate and Rental Agents
"Roanoke, Va., Dec. 20, 1919.

"107 Terry Building.

"Jabbour Bros. Market Square, Roanoke, Va.—Dear Sirs: We herewith submit a bill for extra rents of $75.00 to December 1, 1919, on corner room now occupied by George Constantine, confectioner.

"My notice of April 22d notified you that the subrenting of same to this tenant was not in accordance with the terms of your contract, which was to be used for dry goods business. I agreed to allow you $12.50 on account of cleaning up Koontz & Feather's room. I must insist on your complying with our contract on the building in regard to kind of business.

"Your further subrenting No. 107 Market Square for wholesale fruit and produce, which we have repeatedly demanded be removed, and you have failed to comply, so we must insist upon the change of business in accordance as per contract and in violation of same will demand $12.50 per month rent on same as a penalty.

"Respectfully, Hartsook & Cleaton,
"By T. E. B. Hartsook."

(It will be noted that this letter refers to another subletting besides that to Constantine of another storeroom covered by the lease, but, as this is not material to the decision of the case, details of such alleged subrenting are omitted.)

Still the accrued and past due extra rent was not paid, and the matter dragged along, Constantine still remaining in the corner room, and Jabbour Bros. continued promising Hartsook to do all they could to get him out as soon as they could, when, on March 23, 1919, the following notice from the lessor was delivered to the lessees, to wit:

"Roanoke, Va., March 22, 1920.

"To Jibrán J. Jabbour, Raffley J. Jabbour and Abraham J. Jabbour, Trading as Jabbour Bros., Market Square and Nelson Street, Roanoke, Va.—Gentlemen: By the terms of my lease with you, dated November 9, 1918, covering storerooms on Market Square, Nos. 108, 106, 107, and on Nelson street, Nos. 210 and 212, No. 210 Nelson street being the room on the second floor above 212 and 214 Nelson street, it is provided that you as lessee shall not, without my written consent, use the premises nor allow them to be used for any purpose other than as provided in said lease, nor assign or underlet the premises or any part thereof for the whole or any part of the term.

"You have repeatedly violated these conditions and terms of the lease against subletting, and on that account I have elected to terminate said lease on Saturday, April 3d, and hereby demand that you vacate said lease premises on Saturday, April 3d, and give me possession of same that day.

"In my letters of April 22, 1919, and December 20, 1919, I protested against the use of the corner room on Market Square by George Constantine in his confectionery business, and I also objected to the subrenting of No. 107 Market Square to the Wholesale Fruit & Produce Company, and told you that, if you permitted these subtenants which I objected to, you would have to pay $12.50 additional per month on each of them. As you have not paid the additional sum of $12.50 per month, and refused to do so, and have insisted on violating the terms of the lease by allowing these subtenants to remain, I have also elected to terminate this lease, because of your failure to pay this additional rent, and hereby notify you that I have terminated the lease, and demand possession, as aforesaid, on April 3, 1920.

"Very truly yours, T. E. B. Hartsook."

On April 8, 1920, Jabbour Bros. tendered to the lessor, Hartsook, their check for the $12.50 per month unpaid and extra rent aforesaid, both on the room occupied by Constantine and No. 107 Market Square aforesaid, claimed by the lessor as aforesaid, to and including March, 1920, but the lessor then refused to accept payment of such rent, insisting upon the termination of the lease, per his said notice of March 22, 1920, delivered to the lessees on March 23, 1920; and the lessor on April 14, 1920, instituted this action.

Other matters are referred to in the opinion of the court.

A. B. Hunt, of Roanoke, for plaintiffs in error.

Woods, Chitwood, Coxe & Rogers, and Jackson & Henson, all of Roanoke, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

There are several assignments of error by the lessees, the plaintiffs in error, complaining of the action of the trial court in giving and refusing instructions; but, as the verdict of the jury was in favor of the lessees to the full extent of their claim, if there was error in such action of the court, it will not be considered by us, as it was manifestly harmless error so far as the lessees are concerned.

The sole remaining assignment of error is that the trial court erred in setting aside the verdict of the jury and in entering judgment for the lessor, defendant in error, Hartsook. This presents the following question:

[1] 1. Was the verdict of the jury plainly wrong or without evidence to support it?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

[2] In view of the fact that the evidence in the case shows that by mutual agreement between the lessor and the lessees, entered into before the term of the demise began, the monthly rent reserved was increased by $12.50 per month from the beginning of the term, that such extra rent was "in arrears and unpaid" when the notice was given on March 23, 1920, so that such notice terminated the tenancy 10 days thereafter, to wit, on April 3, 1920, in accordance with the seventh clause of the lease, and the tender on April 8, 1920, of the rent in arrears, being after such termination, was too late to prevent the termination which had already occurred, and as there was no conflict in the evidence on those subjects, it seems plain to us that there was no evidence before the jury to sustain the verdict for the lessees, and that the verdict was plainly contrary to the evidence.

This being so, all the other matters in controversy in the case concerning whether under the second clause of the lease there was a forfeiture because of the subletting or a forfeiture because of the use of the premises for a purpose other than for general wholesale merchandise provided for in the lease, or whether such forfeitures were waived by the lessor by his acceptance of rent prior to the giving of the notice last mentioned, and other interesting questions raised in connection with these subjects in behalf of the respective parties and the authorities cited and relied on upon those questions and subjects, become immaterial, and hence need not be dealt with in this opinion.

[3] The seventh clause of the lease provides that, if the rent shall "at any time be in arrears and unpaid," the lessor may terminate the lease at the expiration of 10 days from the time of giving the notice, such as was given as aforesaid. Hence neither the common-law rules on the subject of what a landlord must do to terminate a lease because of nonpayment of rent nor the statute in Virginia on the subject have any application. The subject is governed and controlled in the case in judgment by the express contract of the parties and by the action of the lessor in accordance therewith.

We are therefore of opinion that there was no error in the action of the trial court in setting aside the verdict of the jury and in entering judgment for the lessor.

The judgment under review will be affirmed.

POWERS et al. v. HOWARD et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Equity §446—Bill of review lies as to error of law apparent on the record.

A bill of review does not lie to review errors in the determination of facts, but if error of law be apparent from an inspection of the record in a cause, and a final decree has been entered, a proper case is prima facie presented.

2. Equity §446—Admission of deposition of incompetent witness held apparent on record.

A bill of review will lie as to error in admitting the deposition of an incompetent witness, where the decree expressly mentioned the deposition and the exception thereto; such matter thus appearing upon the record.

3. Witnesses §146—Husband of party to action held incompetent.

In a suit by an administrator to enforce liens against a husband and wife, the husband was incompetent to testify as to whether the wife was liable as surety only, in view of Code 1904, § 3346a, making the consort of a party to such a proceeding an incompetent witness.

4. Equity §460—Bill of review should specify errors relied on.

A bill of review ought to specify with some degree of accuracy and definiteness the errors relied on.

5. Appeal and error §172(1) — Matters not mentioned in bill of review not considered.

On appeal from the dismissal of a bill of review, an assignment of error as to a matter not mentioned in the bill will not be considered.

6. Equity §464—No relief on bill of review unless errors clear.

Where on bill of review, if the decree complained of should be reversed the parties could not be put in statu quo, the court will not grant relief unless the errors complained of are clear and have been specifically excepted to and pointed out in the original proceedings.

7. Equity §445—Infants may impeach decree only on same ground as adults.

While Code 1919, § 6316 (Code 1904, § 3335), extends the time within which infants may file a bill of review, it does not authorize them to attack decrees upon any grounds except those which would be available to adults.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County.

Bill of review by Marie Powers and another, by next friend, against D. H. Howard, trustee, and others. From a decree dismissing the bill on demurrer, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Oglesby & Burks, of Roanoke, for appellants.

Henry Roberts, Fulkerson & Davis, Peters, Lavinder & Peters, and Donald T. Stant, all of Bristol, for appellees.

KELLY, P. In a lien creditors' suit, styled N. P. Oglesby, Adm'r, v. M. F. Powers et al., formerly pending in the corporation court of the city of Bristol, and finally disposed of and dismissed from the docket of that court in April, 1909, certain real estate theretofore owned by M. F. Powers and Nora M. Powers, his wife, was sold to satisfy the liens thereon. Nora M. Powers was dead when the suit was brought, and her two surviving children, Marie and Bernice, both at that date under 14 years of age, were made parties defendant, and appeared by guardian ad litem.

In the summer of 1918, Marie and Bernice Powers, who had not as yet attained their majority, suing by their next friend, filed a bill of review, seeking to have corrected in their favor certain errors alleged to be apparent on the face of the record. The defendants to this bill of review, composed chiefly of the several purchasers of the property sold in the original cause, demurred thereto, and the circuit court of Washington county, to which the cause had been duly removed, entered a decree sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill. From that decree this appeal was taken.

[1] The general rules and principles by which the courts are to determine whether a bill of review will lie in a given case for errors apparent on the face of the record are well settled. The law on the subject is stated by Mr. Lile in his Equity Pleading and Practice, § 142, as follows:

"A bill of review does not lie to review or correct errors of judgment in the determination of facts. If there be error in this particular, after a final decree, it can be corrected only by an appellate court. But if error of law be apparent from an inspection of the record in the cause, and a final decree has been entered, a proper case for a bill of review is prima facie presented."

To the same effect is the opinion by Judge Christian in Thomson v. Brooke, 78 Va. 180, 163, wherein he says:

"It is well settled that a bill of review can only be brought upon two grounds: First, upon newly discovered evidence; and, second, upon errors of law apparent upon the face of the record. * * * As to errors of law, they must be such as appear on the face of the decrees, orders, and proceedings in the cause, arising on facts either admitted by the pleadings or stated as facts in the decrees. Such errors of law, and such only, may be corrected by a bill of review. But if the errors complained of be errors of judgment in the determination of facts, these can only be corrected by appeal."

In 2 Beach on Modern Equity Procedure, § 857, the author says:

"For the purpose of examining all errors of law, the bill, answers and other proceedings are, in this country, as much a part of the record before the court as the decree itself; for it is only by a comparison with the former that the correctness of the latter can be ascertained."

In 1 Hogg's Equity Procedure, § 211, p. 272, it is said:

"The meaning of the phrase, 'error apparent upon the face of the decree,' is not so restricted as the words would seem to imply. It embraces all that appears upon the face of the proceedings, including whatever was embodied in the issue. It really means error of law, disclosed by the record, as contradistinguished from a mistaken conception of fact as shown by the evidence in the cause. To determine on bill of review whether or not error of law exists, the court will examine the original bill, the answer filed in the cause, all orders and decrees made and entered therein, the commissioner's report so far as errors on the face thereof are concerned, and all the other proceedings, to ascertain whether upon the whole case error of law has been committed."

While there are occasional expressions on the subject in the decisions and the textbooks which might seem to suggest a more restricted rule, the propositions asserted in the last two of the above quotations are generally recognized and fully supported by authority. Cary v. Macon, 4 Call (8 Va.) 605; Wroten v. Armat, 31 Grat. (72 Va.) 228, 260; Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 76, 88, 89; Pracht & Co. v. Lange, 81 Va. 711, 721; Daingerfield v. Smith, 83 Va. 81, 93, 1 S. E. 599; Gills v. Gills, 126 Va. 526, 543, 101 S. E. 900; Bank v. Shirley, 28 W. Va. 563; Whiting v. Bank, 13 ret. 6, 10 L. Ed. 33, 37; Putnam v. Day, 22 Wall. 60, 22 L. Ed. 764, 765; Story's Eq. Pl. § 407.

[2] The first alleged error apparent on the face of the record is that the court in the original proceedings held M. F. Powers to be an incompetent witness, on the ground that the previous death of his wife, Nora M. Powers, rendered him incapable of testifying. Counsel for appellees contend that, even if this ruling of the court was an error, and material, it did not "appear upon the face of the record" in such way as to be reached by bill of review. We do not take this view of the question. The deposition of Powers was taken before the commissioner appointed to report on liens and their priority, and was excepted to on the ground above indicated; and the commissioner, without specifically passing upon the objection, but plainly indicating that he gave no weight or effect to the deposition, made up his report, and along therewith returned the deposition, referring the objection to the court for action. The decree expressly mentioned the deposition and exception, and in terms sustained the latter. This action clearly appears upon the face of the record, and if it is error and material, it is not a conclusion of fact depending upon the evidence, but is an error of law, which under the above authorities may be taken advantage of by bill of review.

[3] Upon the merits of the question, however, we are of opinion that there was no error in the ruling of the court as to the competency of M. F. Powers as a witness. The material facts in this connection are as follows: Among the liens sought to be enforced in the original suit were two deeds of trust and three judgments in respect to which it appeared from the records that M. F. Powers and Nora Powers, his wife, were jointly liable as principal debtors. The purpose of the Powers deposition was to prove that as to these deeds Mrs. Powers was liable only as surety for her husband. The property of both was heavily incumbered, but it is claimed that a substantial part of the real estate owned by Mrs. Powers, mother of the appellants, would not have been reached and subjected to sale if she had been treated as a surety of instead of as a principal with her husband. Assuming that this latter proposition would have been true—namely, that the M. F. Powers property would, if first exhausted in satisfaction of the liens against him and his wife, have prevented the sale of a substantial part of her property—was he a competent witness to prove the essential fact of her relationship as his surety? We think not. The entire discussion of this point upon the part of counsel for appellants is addressed to the provisions of section 3346, clause 2, Code 1904, upon the apparent assumption that the court held M. F. Powers to be an incompetent witness under that section. In answer to this assumed ground of the decision by the lower court, it is argued: (a) That since Powers and his wife were parties of the same part, or on the same side of the contract represented by the deeds of trust, he was not incompetent under the terms of the statute; and (b) that "he was not testifying in his own favor or in favor of any other person whose interest was adverse to that of the party who was incapable of testifying," and was therefore not within the interdiction of the statute. The soundness of this argument may be conceded, but the court probably based its conclusion, not upon section 3346, clause 2, but upon section 3346a, which contains the following disqualification:

"Where one of the original parties to a contract, matter, or other transaction which is the subject of investigation is incapable of testifying by reason of death, insanity, infancy, or other legal cause, and the other party to such contract, matter, or transaction is made incompetent to testify by subsection 2 of section 3346 of the Code of Virginia, then in such case the consort of either party shall be incompetent to testify in relation to such contract, matter or transaction," etc.

In this case, as correctly stated in the petition for appeal, and as pointed out and insisted upon by counsel for appellees, "the parties to these two contracts were M. F. Powers and Nora M. Powers, his wife, of the one part, and Kirkpatrick & Howard, trustees, and H. G. Peters, trustee, of the other part." The contractual relationship of Mrs. Powers was the subject-matter of the investigation, so far as the exception here under consideration was concerned. Nora M. Powers was dead at the time the deposition of M. F. Powers was offered and objected to on that ground. In this situation, all three of the trustees were incompetent to testify by virtue of the provisions of section 3346, clause 2, and the result was that by the terms of section 3346a, just quoted, when Powers was called on as the consort of Nora M. Powers, deceased, he was clearly incompetent as a witness.

[4] The second ground upon which the bill of review sought to have the decree of sale in the original cause reversed was stated thus:

"It was error to cancel the sale to H. G. Peters of the James W. Jefferson property."

This is the only allegation in the bill with reference to the Jefferson property. It is probable that the validity of this complaint depended upon the competency of M. F. Powers, and that the adverse decision upon that point renders any further discussion of this alleged error immaterial, but we need not rest our decision of the question upon that ground. The decree confirming the sale of the various properties in the original cause contained this statement:

"As to the lot reported as sold to H. G. Peters at the purchase price of $305 being the J. W. Jefferson lot, it appearing that the proceeds from the sale of the other property was sufficient to satisfy all liens in these proceedings reported prior to the conveyance by M. F. Powers to J. W. Jefferson, this sale to the said H. G. Peters is annulled and set aside."

It might be possible to go through the record in the original cause and find out all about the Jefferson property, but it is not deemed necessary or proper to undertake this task. A bill of review ought to specify with some degree of accuracy and definiteness the errors relied upon. It nowhere appears that the action of the court in this respect was excepted to, and there is nothing so far as we observe upon the face of the record to show that such action was erroneous. No error having been pointed out in the bill of review, we dismiss this point from further consideration.

The two alleged errors already discussed are the only ones which were directly alleged in the bill of review. There is a statement in the bill "that the rents and profits of the real estate of Nora M. Powers was ample to pay within five years" the amount, if any, for which she was liable. And, while there is no direct charge to that effect, it is possible to interpret the reference to the rents and profits as an allegation that the court ought to have had an account taken and a report made thereon, and that its failure to do so was error. As a matter of fact, however, there was a report as to the rental value of all the properties in the original suit, and the point here made was not raised there at all. Its efficacy, in any event, depends upon the deposition of Powers, which we have held was properly excluded.

[5] It is claimed in the petition for appeal that the court erred in the original case in not selling certain property, of the estimated value of $250, referred to as the James O. Powers property. As this matter is not even mentioned in the bill of review, the assignment of error based thereon is not good, and we need not consider it further.

It is also said in the petition for appeal that the court erred in the original cause in allowing 5 per cent. commission to the commissioner, or trustee, who sold the property, but, like the matter referred to in the last paragraph, this error was not in any way adverted to in the bill of review, and must be disregarded here.

[6] The numerous properties involved in this case were sold to sundry purchasers in February, 1909, for a total price of $14,885, the money was all paid in cash, and the sales to the various purchasers confirmed in April, 1909. Since that time there have been various changes in the ownership. It is practically certain that if the decree complained of should be reversed, the court could not put the other parties in statu quo. Under these circumstances the courts are properly reluctant to undertake to grant relief unless the errors complained of are clear and have been specifically excepted to and pointed out in the original proceedings. Phipps v. Wise Hotel Co., 116 Va. 739, 82 S. E. 681.

[7] It is true that the appellants are infants, but as a general rule in cases like this they can only impeach the decrees complained of on grounds which would be available for that purpose to an adult. The statute (section 6316 of the Code of 1919; section 3335, Code 1904) extends the time within which infants may file a bill of review, but it does not authorize them to attack decrees as a general rule upon any grounds except those which would be available to other parties. Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Grat. (87 Va.) 517, 528.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the circuit court was right in sustaining the demurrer to the bill of review, and its decree will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

HINES, DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS, v. GARRETT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error §994(2)—Truth of testimony for jury.

In action by passenger wrongfully discharged beyond place of destination for damages for being raped while walking back, the court, on appeal from judgment for passenger, will not consider the questions of the passenger's veracity and the truth of her story as to being raped, but must treat the narrative as true; the veracity and the truth of her story being questions for the jury.

2. Carriers §276(3)—Evidence held to prove rape of passenger discharged beyond destination.

In action by passenger wrongfully discharged beyond place of destination for damages sustained in being raped while walking back, evidence held to sustain passenger's story as to the assault, notwithstanding failure to find assailants.

3. Carriers §247(4)—Relationship of carrier to passenger continues until passenger reaches destination or voluntarily departs at other point.

The relationship and liability of a carrier to a passenger will ordinarily continue until the passenger has reached his destination, but may be terminated at some other point by the passenger's voluntary departure from the carrier's vehicle.

4. Carriers §271—Carrier's duty in general as to passenger carried beyond destination stated.

Generally carrier must stop train at station for which a passenger holds a ticket and must give passenger reasonable opportunity to disembark and must return passenger carried beyond destination to the station for which he holds a ticket, but is not required, in all cases, to run the particular train back to the station; the question of its duty to so do depending on the circumstances, including the distance the train has traveled before mistake is discovered.

5. Carriers §278(1)—Whether train carrying passenger beyond destination should have backed to station held for jury.

In action for being carried beyond destination, whether the train should have been backed to place of destination, on discovery of mistake less than a mile beyond the station, notwithstanding a railroad rule prohibiting movement against current of traffic without orders from superintendent of transportation, held for the jury.

6. Carriers §278(1)—Whether passenger carried beyond destination voluntarily left train held for the jury.

In action by 18 year old passenger carried a mile beyond destination for being raped while walking back, whether she voluntarily left the train and terminated the relationship of carrier and passenger held for the jury.

7. Carriers §271—Not liable for rape of passenger walking back after having voluntarily left train beyond station.

Eighteen year old passenger, who was an intelligent young woman, in business for herself, and accustomed to riding on trains, and who voluntarily left train after having been carried one mile beyond her station, could not recover from the railroad damages sustained in being raped while walking back to station, having voluntarily terminated her relationship as a passenger and having assumed the risk.

8. Carriers §278(1)—Whether rape upon passenger walking back to station was proximately caused by wrongful ejection held for jury.

In action against railroad by 18 year old passenger wrongfully discharged beyond her station, requiring her to walk back a distance of one mile along unprotected route known to have been infested by tramps, hoboos, and other disreputable characters, whether rape committed on her while walking back was proximately caused by the wrongful ejection from train held for the jury.

9. Carriers §271—Bound to know character of place at which it wrongfully discharges passenger.

A carrier, in the discharge of the high duty which it owes to its passengers, is bound to know the character of the place at which it wrongfully discharges them.

10. Carriers §271—Passenger ejected from train after having been carried beyond station did not assume risk of walking back.

Eighteen year old girl carried beyond her station, who was, in effect, ejected from train, having been required to act hastily and without reasonable opportunity for deliberation, and who was raped while walking back to station, did not assume the risk of walking back.

11. Negligence §62(3)—Exposing to act by third person causing injury actionable.

The rule that no responsibility for a wrong attaches when an independent act of a third person intervenes between the negligence complained of and the injury does not apply where the very negligence alleged consists of exposing the injured party to the act causing the injury.

12. Carriers — 284(2)—Must protect passenger against anticipated danger.

A carrier having reason to anticipate danger of an assault on a passenger must protect the passenger against such danger.

13. Appeal and error — 1178(6)—Case remanded for determination of one question only where on all other questions parties have had a fair trial.

Under Code 1919, § 6365, the appellate court, in reversing judgment for failure to submit issue to jury, will remand the case merely for determination of such issue and not for a trial de novo, where the parties have had a fair trial upon all other questions.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fairfax County.

Action by Julia Mae Garrett against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Barbour, Keith, McCandlish & Garnett, of Washington, D. C., for appellant.

C. Vernon Ford and Wilson M. Farr, both of Fairfax, for appellee.

KELLY, P. The plaintiff is a young girl between 18 and 19 years of age, and the object of the suit is to hold the defendant, Director General of Railroads, liable in damages for two acts of rape upon her person, committed by two men shortly after she had been, as she alleges, negligently required to leave the defendant's train in a dangerous and unprotected place.

The evidence was in some material respects conflicting, but substantially the following facts were either conclusively established or supported by evidence which would have justified the jury in accepting them as true: The occurrences complained of transpired in daylight, but very shortly before dark, on the 2d day of February, 1919. The plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train and held a ticket from the city of Washington, D. C., to a station called Seminary, in Fairfax county. The train failed to stop at Seminary, and thereupon another passenger, one W. L. Garnett, who also held a ticket for that station, called the attention of a flagman to the fact that he had bought a ticket for that place and wanted to get off. The train was then stopped, and Garnett alighted and walked by a near way to his home. About that time the plaintiff told the conductor she had a ticket to Seminary, and she was about to get off, but he directed her to wait, as he intended to back the train to the station. This occurrence took place about seven-tenths of a mile beyond Seminary. She did step back, but the train, instead of moving backward, pulled ahead, and she asked the conductor what he intended to do, saying she thought he was going back to the station. He then said that he could not go back because he was afraid he would run into another train, and that she would therefore have to go on through and be sent back to Seminary on the next train, or else get off at that point. She testified that the conductor's manner was very rough, and that he seemed indifferent to what happened to her; and it is fairly inferable from the evidence (if his testimony in conflict be rejected) that she understood him to mean that if she did not get off at that point he would carry her on all the way through to Richmond before starting her on the return journey, which would involve a long trip in the night and much discomfort and inconvenience. Thereupon she said to him, "Let me off;" and he stopped the train and she left the car. About the same time a man wearing a United States army uniform, generally referred to in the record as a soldier, got off the train on the opposite side. The plaintiff started back in the direction of Seminary, walking alongside the track. The soldier followed, and shortly overtook her, taking hold of her arm and asking if he might accompany her home. She denied this request, and he thereupon forcibly carried her across the track and down a high embankment to an obscure spot, where he pushed her to the ground and ravished her. After accomplishing his fiendish purpose, he left her, and has never been identified. Within a few moments thereafter, and while she was still trying to arise from the ground, a man dressed in citizen's clothes, described by her as a civilian, appeared and ravished her the second time. He likewise disappeared, and has never been identified. A vigilant and extensive search for the assailants was made, but without success. After both of these horrible occurrences, she struggled to her feet, came back to the surface of the railroad grade, and was then met by two citizens living in the neighborhood, who escorted her to her home. One of these parties, a Mr. Cockrell, had, from his home a few hundred yards away, seen the plaintiff leave the train, with the soldier following. His attention was diverted and he did not see them leave the railroad grade, but a few minutes later saw that they had disappeared. This fact aroused his suspicion, and he called a companion and they sat out to see what had become of the young woman. They testified that when they met her she was in a most pitiable condition, her clothing soiled and disarranged, her mouth bleeding, her face dirty, and her mental condition plainly evidencing that she had been subjected to some horrible treatment. Her mother testified that upon an examination of her person she found that the plaintiff had been subjected to physical violence, and that there were convincing evidences that she "had been misused." A physician who was called and examined her next day was summoned as a witness in her behalf, and was in attendance at the beginning of the trial, but did not testify because before a convenient and orderly point for his testimony had been reached he was called away by professional duties and plaintiff's counsel deemed it unnecessary to require him to come back.

[1, 2] There is no direct claim made before us that the plaintiff fabricated in whole or in part the story upon which she brings this suit, but there seems to be an implied contention to this effect. The questions involving her integrity and veracity and the probable truthfulness of her narrative, however, if, indeed, such questions are intended to be presented to us, were peculiarly questions for the jury; and we must now treat that narrative as true. And it is proper to add that upon a critical examination of the record we do not think her story is seriously discredited. Her character for chastity and for truth and veracity is not impugned or discredited by anything which appears in the record; and her account of the alleged outrages was so fully accredited in the community where she lived that earnest and prolonged, though futile, efforts were made to locate and arrest her assailants.

The point at which the plaintiff left the train was about four-fifths of a mile from the flag station known as Seminary, and there was abundant evidence to show that on the right-hand side of the railroad track, leading back from that point to Seminary, there was a ravine or depression locally known as "Hoboes' Hollow," "Tramps' Hollow," and "Tramps' Den," which was then, and had been for at least a year (during the whole of the régime of the Director General of Railroads), habitually frequented and infested by hoboes, tramps, and questionable characters. The attractiveness of the place for such characters is fully explained in the record.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings the case here for review.

There were 12 general assignments of error, and the actual number was materially larger, owing to the fact that 2 of the assignments dealt more or less particularly with each of the unnecessarily numerous instructions involved, but we think the merits of the case and the substantial differences between the parties may be reduced to two questions: (1) Was the plaintiff ejected from the defendant's train under such circumstances as to entitle her to claim the relationship of a passenger until she had returned to Seminary station, the point to which she held a ticket? (2) If so, can the assaults to which she was subjected be regarded as proximately caused by such wrongful ejection from the train?

1. It is contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover because she had voluntarily terminated her relationship as a passenger by accepting the alternative which the conductor offered her and leaving the train. This defense is good if the proposition upon which it rests is supported by the facts.

A brief discussion of the principles of law applicable in this connection will be helpful in reaching a correct answer to the question now under consideration.

[3] The relationship and liability of a carrier to a passenger, having once commenced, will ordinarily continue until the passenger has reached his destination; but such relationship and liability may be terminated at some other point by the passenger's voluntary departure from the carrier's vehicle. 4 R. C. L. § 499, p. 1046; 6 Cyc. 541; 10 C. J. 628; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) pp. 497, 500; Commonwealth v. Boston & M. R. Co., 129 Mass. 500, 87 Am. Rep. 382.

[4] When a passenger holds a ticket for a particular station, the general rule is well settled that the train must be stopped at that station and a reasonable opportunity given the passenger to disembark. If it does not stop and the passenger is carried beyond his destination, then it is the duty of the carrier to return him to the station to which he holds a ticket. This does not mean, however, that in all causes the carrier is bound to run the train back to the station; that, of course, will depend upon circumstances, including, in particular, the question as to how far the train has gone beyond the passenger's destination before the mistake is discovered.

In Samuels v. Richmond, etc., R. R. Co., 35 S. C. 493, 14 S. E. 943, 23 Am. St. Rep. 883, 888, a case in which a female passenger had been carried perhaps 400 yards beyond the destination called for in her ticket and then rudely ejected at a damp and rough place, the court, in dealing with the general duty of the carrier under such circumstances, said:

"If the carrier can with safety discharge his passenger at the point of destination, such passenger has the right to such action; and if from any cause and in a reasonable distance from such station that has been passed without the passenger having been afforded an opportunity to alight at his destination such omission is discovered, it is the duty of the carrier to return such passenger to that destination. It will not be excused because it is inconvenient or troublesome; it will only be excused upon the proof of some controlling exigency, and the burden of such proof is upon the carrier the moment the passenger proves that he had the right of passage to a certain point and a compliance on his part with ordinary care, and that such point of destination was passed by the carrier without giving the passenger an opportunity of getting off."

The general rule, as stated in the above quotation, is undoubtedly sound and just, and is fully supported by authority and by common sense and justice; but it must be remembered that the passenger who has been carried beyond his destination is not the sole person to be considered. See Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Hardie, 100 Miss. 132, 55 South. 42, 967, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 740, 742, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 323. If it would be imprudent or unsafe, or a manifest inconvenience to other passengers, by reason of the distance beyond the station to which the train had proceeded before the mistake was discovered, to back to the station, the only alternative left, with a due regard to the safety and rights of other passengers and a proper consideration for an efficient public service, is to allow the passenger to get off, if he requests to do so, or, if he prefers, carry him on to the next station and return him, free of charge, by next train, to the station to which he held a ticket. In such case, whether the passenger elects to leave the train and return on foot or by other means to his destination, or to accept the other alternative suggested, he would have a right of action against the carrier, and could recover such damages as naturally and proximately resulted from its default in carrying him by his station. By a voluntary departure from the train at some other than the point of destination the relationship would be terminated, and the question of damages might very materially be affected.

[5] In the instant case the train had proceeded nearly a mile beyond the station. There was a rule of the company, as disclosed by the evidence, which in itself was a reasonable rule, to the following effect:

"On a double track (as in this case) no movement must be made against the current of traffic without orders from the superintendent of transportation."

But there was also evidence upon which the jury might properly have found that under a reasonable interpretation and application of this rule the conductor would not have violated it nor caused the other passengers any risk or disproportionate inconvenience if the train had been backed to Seminary. No scheduled train was to follow soon, and under the block system in effect upon that road, if any train followed it could only enter the block under caution.

[6] Furthermore, the evidence was such as that reasonable men might have differed as to whether the plaintiff could be said to have voluntarily left the train at the point in question. She was suddenly placed in a perplexing situation. She says the conductor treated her rudely, and made no explanation as to what he meant by carrying her through and sending her back, and there is room to contend that she did not, in legal contemplation, voluntarily sever her relationship as a passenger by leaving the train under these exciting and embarrassing circumstances. In other words, there is a view of the evidence under which she might be regarded as having been coerced or unduly induced to take the course which she did in leaving the car. In such a case she certainly could not be held, as a matter of law, to have forfeited her relationship as a passenger. Stevens v. Kansas City Elevated Ry. Co., 126 Mo. App. 619, 105 S. W. 28.

On the other hand, the testimony of the conductor and other witnesses on behalf of the defendant, if taken alone and accepted at its face value, would have warranted the jury in finding that she did voluntarily and deliberately give up her rights as a passenger, and voluntarily terminate the relationship. The question thus became one which should have been submitted to the jury on proper instructions.

[7] The plaintiff's instructions did not, in our opinion, adequately submit this question to the jury, and those asked for by the defendant on that subject were rejected. This was error. We shall not discuss the instructions in detail. What we have said will be a sufficient guide for the trial court in formulating instructions when the case comes to trial again. It only remains to say that, if the jury should find that the plaintiff did exercise a free will and deliberate judgment, unhampered by any improper conduct on the part of the conductor, and decided to leave the train rather than incur the inconvenience of taking the other course, then she did terminate her relationship as a passenger and assumed the risk of the consequences which befell her. She had not attained her majority, but she was an intelligent young woman, in business for herself, accustomed to riding on trains, and legally competent to make a deliberate choice.

[8] 2. Coming now to the second question, and assuming in this discussion that the plaintiff did not, in legal contemplation, voluntarily leave the train and thus end the relationship of carrier and passenger between her and the defendant, could the jury, under the evidence as to the character of the place, have been permitted to find that the assaults to which she was subjected were proximately caused by her wrongful ejection from the train?

With this question we have no difficulty; it is clearly to be answered in the affirmative.

In the case of N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Whitehurst, 125 Va. 260, 263, 99 S. E. 568, 569, Judge Burks, delivering the opinion of this court, said:

"The 'foreseeableness,' or reasonable anticipation of the consequences of a wrongful or negligent act, is not the measure of liability of the guilty party, though it may be determinative of the question of his negligence. When once it has been determined that the act is wrongful or negligent, the guilty party is liable for all the consequences which naturally flow therefrom, whether they were reasonably to have been anticipated or not, and in determining whether or not the consequences do naturally flow from the wrongful act or neglect, the case should be viewed retrospectively; that is to say, looking at the consequences, were they so improbable or unlikely to occur that it would not be fair and just to charge a reasonably prudent man with them. If not, he is liable. This is the test of liability, but when liability has been established, its extent is to be measured by the natural consequences of the negligent or wrongful act. The precise injury need not have been anticipated. It is enough if the act is such that the party ought to have anticipated that it was liable to result in injury to others. City Gas Co. v. Webb, 117 Va. 269, 84 S. E. 645; Pulaski Gaslight Co. v. McClintock, 97 Ark. 576, 134 S. W. 1189, 1199, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 825; Cooley on Torts (Student's Ed.) p. 33; Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251; 25 Harvard Law Review, 245, 246; 1 Shear. & Red. (5th Ed.) § 28, and cases cited."

See, also, to same effect, Tripp v. City of Norfolk, 129 Va. —, 106 S. E. 360; Judy v. Doyle, 130 Va. —, 108 S. E. 6.

Applying the rule above quoted, bearing in mind the high degree of care due by a carrier to its passengers, and assuming that the plaintiff did not voluntarily leave the train, but was coerced or persuaded to do so at an improper and dangerous place, the case, to say the least of it, was clearly one in which the jury might have properly found in her favor. It requires no resort to a retrospective view of the facts to reach this conclusion. The consequences which overtook this young woman were sufficiently probable to charge any responsible party with the duty of guarding against them. No 18 year old girl should be required to set out alone, near nightfall, to walk along an unprotected route, passing a spot which is physically so situated as to lend itself to the perpetration of a criminal assault, and which is infested by worthless, irresponsible and questionable characters known as tramps and hoboos; and no prudent man, charged with her care, would willingly cause her to do so. The very danger to which this unfortunate girl fell a victim is the one which would at once suggest itself to the average and normal mind as a danger liable to overtake her under these circumstances. It is no answer to the proposition to say that the presumption is that crimes of this character will not be committed. The presumption applies under ordinary circumstances, but it is not to be indulged, and ordinarily prudent men do not indulge it, to the extent of regarding it safe to expose a young woman to such a risk as the plaintiff in this case incurred in passing "Hobo Hollow" as the shades of night were approaching. The fact that there were numerous houses within a few hundred yards of the place does not relieve the situation, if the jury believed, as it might have done, that the place itself was dangerous and unprotected. And when it is recalled that the care which the carrier owed to her, assuming that she was still a passenger, was not merely ordinary care and prudence, but the highest degree of care which could be expected from human foresight, it is clear that there was a view of the evidence under which the defendant was liable for the injuries which she sustained as having been proximately caused by its breach of duty.

[9] There is a suggestion that the evidence does not show that the defendant in this case knew of the dangerous character of the vicinity through which the plaintiff would have to walk in order to reach her destination. In view of the evidence, it is difficult to see how the defendant could have failed to know the general reputation of this place. But it was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to show such knowledge. A carrier, in the discharge of the very high duty which it owes to its passengers, is bound to know the character of the place at which it wrongfully discharges them; and if the defendant wrongfully required the plaintiff to get off at a dangerous place without knowing it, it did so at its peril.

[10] Nor can it be said that the plaintiff assumed the risk of the danger. That depended upon whether she acted deliberately and voluntarily; and under the present branch of the case we are assuming, that which the jury might under proper instructions have found, that she was, in effect, ejected from the train by having to act hastily and without reasonable opportunity for thought or deliberation in an emergency which was wrongfully brought about and improperly dealt with by the defendant.

The chief defense under this branch of the case seems to be based upon the proposition that, even if the plaintiff was negligently required to leave the train, the assaults upon her cannot be regarded as the proximate cause of that negligence, because they resulted from an independent act of third persons over whom the defendant had no control and with whom it had no relation. Numerous authorities are cited in support of this proposition. We shall content ourselves, in the main, by saying that only a few of the cases relied upon appear to us difficult of substantial distinction from the present case, and that to such as are in conflict with the views herein expressed we are unable to give our approval. A case very strongly relied upon by the defendant in this connection is that of The Lusitania (D. C.) 251 Fed. 715, 732. In that case the opinion by the District Judge was devoted principally to the consideration of the question of negligence, and after a very full and careful review of all the evidence the conclusion was reached that there was no negligence shown, and that therefore the claimants were not entitled to recover. After having reached this conclusion, the opinion proceeds to say that, even if the evidence had established negligence, there could have been no recovery because the destruction of the vessel resulted from an independent illegal act, and could not be regarded as the proximate result of such negligence. This latter proposition may therefore very properly be regarded as a dictum in the Lusitania Case, but, whether so or not, we cannot give our assent to it as applied to the case in hand.

[11, 12] We do not wish to be understood as questioning the general proposition that no responsibility for a wrong attaches whenever an independent act of a third person intervenes between the negligence complained of and the injury. But, as pointed out by Judge Keith in Connell v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 93 Va. 57, 24 S. E. 467, 32 L. R. A. 792, 57 Am. St. Rep. 786, this proposition does not apply where the very negligence alleged consists of exposing the injured party to the act causing the injury. It is perfectly well settled and will not be seriously denied that, wherever a carrier has reason to anticipate the danger of an assault upon one of its passengers, it rests under the duty of protecting such passenger against the same.

The Virginia cases relied upon by the defendant do not sustain its position. Neither in the case of Connell v. C. & O. Ry. Co., supra, nor in Fowlkes v. Southern Ry. Co., 96 Va. 742, 32 S. E. 464, could the defendant have been reasonably expected to anticipate the consequences for which the plaintiff sought to recover. Those cases applied the same rule which we have applied in this case, and held that the proximate result of negligence is a result which ought to have been foreseen in the light of attending circumstances.

[13] Upon this branch of the case, there was no error in the instructions, or otherwise, to the prejudice of the defendant, and we think, therefore, that the plaintiff should recover the amount of the damages fixed by the verdict of the jury, unless at another trial a jury, upon instructions in accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed, should find for the defendant upon the question as to whether the plaintiff exercised a free and voluntary choice in leaving the train. If they should so find, there should be a final judgment for the defendant. Upon all other questions, including the amount of damage, the parties have had a fair trial, and we shall therefore remand the cause solely for the determination of the one question indicated. This course is taken pursuant to section 6365 of the Code of 1919, which provides that—

"A civil case shall not be remanded for a trial de novo except where the ends of justice require it, but the appellate court shall, in the order remanding the case, if it be remanded, designate upon what questions or points a new trial is to be had."

Reversed.

ADDINGTON v. GUESTS RIVER COAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Trial  $\S$  139(1)—Demurrer to evidence overruled if reasonably fair-minded men might have differed.

On demurrer to the evidence, the court must decide in favor of a demurree if the evidence is such that the jury might have found a verdict for him, or if reasonably fair-minded men might have differed.

2. Master and servant  $\S$  236(1)—Servant must protect himself from known dangers.

A servant must provide for his own safety from such dangers as are known to him, or which are discernible by ordinary care on his part.

3. Master and servant  $\S$  154(1)—Warning necessary only where servant is ignorant of danger.

The master is required to inform servant of dangers ordinarily incident to the service only where the danger is known, or ought to have been known, to the master, and is not known to and cannot reasonably be expected to be discovered by the exercise of ordinary care by the servant on account of youth or inexperience.

4. Master and servant  $\S$  107(5)—Rule requiring safe place inapplicable to work changing character of place.

A master who employs a servant to engage in dangerous work must use ordinary and reasonable care to make the place of work as reasonably safe as the nature of the work permits, but such rule does not apply when the work consists in constantly changing the character of the place for safety as the work progresses.

5. Master and servant  $\S$  217(1)—Risk of known dangers assumed.

A servant assumes all ordinary risks of the service, and generally all risks from causes known to him, or readily discernible by a person of his age or capacity in the exercise of ordinary care.

6. Master and servant  $\S$  247(1)—Servant's negligence, proximately contributing to injuries, precludes recovery.

A servant cannot recover for injuries by master's negligence if he has himself been guilty of negligence that either solely caused or proximately contributed to the injuries.

7. Master and servant  $\S$  217(23)—Coal miner held to have assumed risk of fall of slate.

An experienced coal miner familiar with the use of props to prevent fall of draw slate from ceiling of mine, assumed the risk of the fall of draw slate by continuing to work with knowledge that there was a loose slab of draw slate in ceiling after the danger thereof had been called to his attention without setting prop, which had been furnished by master to support the rock.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by W. B. Addington, Administrator, against the Guests River Coal Company. Judgment for defendant on demurrer to evidence, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Fulton & Vicars, of Wise, for plaintiff in error.

Bullitt & Chalkley, of Big Stone Gap, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries to the plaintiff in error's intestate.

The defendant company demurred to the evidence, and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff subject to this demurrer. This demurrer was sustained by the court, and judgment entered for the defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff applied for and secured a writ of error from one of the judges of this court. The action of the trial court sustaining the demurrer to the evidence is assigned as error.

The defendant was the owner and operator of a coal mine near Tacoma in Wise county, Va. Some time during the year 1918, John M. Sparks (plaintiff's intestate) applied for and secured work as a miner in this mine, his particular assignment being to dig and load coal. While engaged in this work, in August, 1918, a large piece of rock, called draw slate, fell upon Sparks, inflicting injuries causing his death.

This draw slate is an intervening rock stratum in the roof, or ceiling of a coal mine lying between the coal and the sandstone top. The thickness of this stratum varies in different mines. The quality of this draw slate also varies. In some mines it is rotten and friable; in others it is tough. The slate in this particular mine was blue slate, "tough slate," as it is described by one of the witnesses. This overhanging slate stratum is liable to fall from the ceiling when the support of the underlying coal is removed. Hence, as the work of removal proceeds, the draw slate must be supported by wooden props. Loose, or cracking slate, carries its own indication of danger, and affords a warning that its possible fall must be provided against by suitable props.

Hinton, a colored man who was hauling, or "pulling coal," for Sparks at the time he was injured, testifies that when he returned to the room, after taking out a car, he found intestate under the rock which had fallen during his absence. This rock the witness describes as "9 or 10 feet long, or probably longer."

The defendant stated the following grounds of demurrer, which will be considered in connection with the evidence:

I. The evidence fails to show that the defendant was guilty of any negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

II. The evidence shows that the plaintiff's decedent, John M. Sparks, was guilty of negligence, and that such negligence was the sole cause of, or contributed to the injury complained of.

III. The evidence shows that the plaintiff's decedent had knowledge of the danger complained of, and assumed the risk thereof.

IV. The evidence shows that the injury complained of resulted from danger ordinarily incident to mining, and from a danger which was open and obvious, and therefore one which the plaintiff's decedent in accepting the employment, and remaining in the employment, assumed.

V. The evidence shows that the injury complained of happened in the working place of plaintiff's decedent, at the face of the coal, and further shows that it was the duty of plaintiff's decedent to protect himself against such dangers in his working place.

VI. The evidence shows that plaintiff's decedent violated the law of the commonwealth of Virginia, after discovering the danger overhead in his working place from loose slate, in not staying from under said slate, in the roof of said mine in his working place, until after he had propped same, or otherwise made same safe.

VII. The evidence shows that plaintiff's decedent was reasonably experienced in mines, and in coal mining and loading; that he knew of, and had been warned of, the danger of loose draw slate hanging overhead, in the roof of his working place where he was working; shows that he had at hand sufficient props with which to protect himself against danger from such loose slate; shows that there was no compulsion upon him to remain under such loose slate in his working place, and shows that it was his duty either to protect and prop such loose slate in his working place, or else to remain from under same, and that, nevertheless, he continued to work thereunder, assuming the risk of such danger, and that as a result of such negligence, and such contributory negligence on his part, he received the injury complained of, from the falling of such loose slate from the roof in his working place.

One of the allegations of the declaration is that the decedent was not an experienced miner, and that his knowledge and understanding of mining was not such as to enable him to know, understand, or appreciate, the very great dangers that surrounded him on account of the dangerous condition of the roof of the room in which he was at work.

This allegation raises an issue of fact, and testimony is not lacking to establish the extent of the decedent's intelligence and experience, and the sufficiency of both to enable him to apprehend that a cracked stratum of slate in no wise attached to the upper sandstone would be likely to fall when the support of the underlying coal was removed.

T. L. Flanary, a witness who had been mining coal "off and on for something like 18 years," testifies in part as follows:

Examination in Chief.

"Q. Did you know John M. Sparks?

"A. I had known him ever since he was a kid.

"Q. Do you know whether he was an experienced miner, or not?

"A. I would not think John was an experienced coal miner from what I know about him.

"Q. Knowing him as you do, and having seen the place, and judging from your experience, would you, as a mine superintendent, or foreman, have put him in this place to work?

"A. Knowing what I do about John's coal digging. He came to me while I was foreman on Whiteoak, two or three times, for a job. I had bad top, and did not give him any work. I did not think he was a man who could run a place safe, and did not give him any work to do.

"Q. Would you have given him work in this place by himself?

"A. No, sir; he nor any other man I knew as well as I knew him.

"Q. Do you know the character of that roof there where he was killed generally, whether it was good or bad?

"A. Well, I never done any work in this mine that John was killed in, but it was the same seam of coal that Campbe worked and Bruce worked at Greeno, and it is all bad top."

It will be noted that this witness does not state when decedent came to him for a job, or how much experience as a miner decedent had acquired after that time, nor does he testify as to any association with him as a miner, or any opportunities that he had had to form a personal judgment from association and observation. His statement as to the character of the top in Guests River Company's mine is based upon observation of top elsewhere in other mines on the same seam of coal.

Cross-Examination.

"Q. You had known of him doing work in the mines, for how many years back before he was killed?

"A. I never worked in the mines with John, but I had heard him talk about working in the mines a right smart bit.

"Q. Running back over a period of several years?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You had never worked with him?

"A. I do not remember that I ever worked a day with him in the mines. I knew of him doing work; he had told me and others would tell me that he was working in the mines at Greeno, backhanding for some fellows down there, but I never worked any with him.

* * *

"Q. About how old was Mr. Sparks?

"A. Well I would guess John must have been about 35."

A. G. P. Corder—Cross-Examination.

"Q. How long have you known John Sparks?

"A. I have known him well since 1903, when I moved to Tacoma.

"Q. This happened in 1918?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. About 15 years?

"A. Yes, known him well—I have known him off and on all my life.

"Q. What did he do during that time that you knew him?

"A. Well, I reckon he worked around the mines the most of the time.

"Q. He had been a miner ever since you have known him this 15 years?

"A. Well, I believe that I have known him working around Greeno mines, about 1904 he was working there.

"Q. Do you know what he was doing there?

"A. No, sir, he was working around the mines.
* * *

"Q. You lived close to him and knew that he worked in the mines during that time?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was he a man of reasonable intelligence?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. A man of pretty fair intelligence?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Knowing him as you did, if you had had work for him in the mines you were running, would you have hesitated to employ him to work in the mines?

"A. No, sir, I don't know that I would.

"Q. Do you know of any reason why you should not have done so?

"A. No, sir; I don't know that I would object to his working.

"Q. You thought that he was a man of reasonable experience?

"A. Yes; I guess so. * * *

Re-Examination.

"Q. You never observed Mr. Sparks working in the mines yourself?

"A. No, sir, I don't know anything about his work in the mines. I don't really know much about that, only he worked around the mines. I never was in the mines where he was at work, as I remember of.

"Q. And never observed him in the manner of his work, and you could not positively say whether you would have felt that they were doing right to put him to work by himself, or not?

"A. Well, I suppose if he had come and wanted to work, I would have let him work. Of course, as I say, I am not an experienced miner myself. I do not think that I would have hesitated to let him work."

A. J. Sexton.

"Q. What experience have you had mining?

"A. I have had 40 years, went into the mines when I was 11 years old. * * *

"Q. In pillar work as a mine superintendent, would you put a man to work by himself, or would you require some one with him?"

"A. I would not put a man to work by himself, unless he was an experienced hand.

"Q. Did you know John Sparks?"

"A. Yes; I have known him ever since he was a little boy.

"Q. Did you regard him as an experienced miner?"

"A. No, sir; I did not.

"Q. Did you regard him sufficiently experienced to work without some experienced hand with him?"

"A. No, sir; I did not.

"Q. Would you, or not, have put him to work there?"

"A. No, sir; not in a place like that by himself."

Cross-Examination.

"Q. How much has John Sparks ever worked in the mines with you?"

"A. He never worked but two days to the best of my recollection. First work he ever done, I hired him to back hand for me at Greeno. He worked two days, and little pieces of slate commenced falling, and he said, 'I ain't going to work here; I will get killed;' and I told him it would not hurt him—I would watch the top—but he says, 'No, I won't do it.'"

"Q. How long ago was that?"

"A. About 10 years ago.

"Q. They were the only two days you ever worked him in the mines?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You never saw him work in the mines any since that?"

"A. No, sir; but I knew of his working. I knew of his whereabouts.

"Q. You knew he was working?"

"A. Yes, sir; he worked outside a good deal.

"Q. You know he has worked in the mines since that?"

"A. I know that he worked some few days at a time, off and on.

"Q. Do you know the month or so he worked at Greeno was all the work he ever done?"

"A. He worked at Mr. Weeks a while, that was all I ever heard of him.

"Q. If he ever worked any more, you do not know it?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. If he just worked with you two days 10 years ago, how do you say that he was not an experienced miner?"

"A. Well, I knew his whereabouts all the time, and would say he has not been in the mines over a year since that. * * *

"Q. You haven't the slightest idea of how much experience he has acquired since 20 years ago?"

"A. I don't believe he has worked in the mines over a year.

"Q. You do not know how well he did his work?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Or how much he learned?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Or how much he had opportunity to learn?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Isn't the top in the Greeno mines and the Weeks mines about the same?"

"A. No, sir; the Weeks mine [i. e., the mine in which the decedent was working] has fairly good top for that seam of coal. * * *

"Q. Was Mr. Sparks a regular sort of worker?"

"A. Sometimes he would work, sometimes take a notion to lay off a week. * * *

"Q. He was one of those men who worked now and then?"

"A. Yes; he worked a week or two; he was a man who liked to be out in the woods and hunt. * * *

"Q. He was a man of pretty good sense?"

"A. Yes; he was a man of pretty good sense.

"Q. Good, sound horse sense?"

"A. Yes; good sense.

"Q. He was not a fool, or idiot, or anything of that sort?"

"A. No fool by any means, plenty of sense. * * *

"Q. I say in slate you can tell pretty well [i. e., test it readily]?"

"A. Yes; you can tell about slate.

"Q. When you have draw slate and there is a crack between it and the standstone top that you can put your finger in, what does that indicate?"

"A. It is pretty loose.

"Q. Is it dangerous?"

"A. Yes, if it is not propped. * * *

"Q. What kind of slate was this?"

"A. Blue slate, tough slate.

"Q. Would that indicate it was coming down?"

"A. If it was cracked, and drawn down, I would consider it dangerous.

"Q. What would be a man's duty to do?"

"A. Duty to take it down, if he could see it was dangerous.

"Q. If he could see a crack in there, what was it his duty to do?"

"A. It was his duty to prop it, or take it down.

"Q. It was his duty to prop it, or take it down as a miner? (Italics supplied.)

"A. Yes, or get out from under it.

"Q. You would not say that John Sparks was not a man of enough intelligence, if he saw a place like that, cracked and drawn down, to prop it, or take it down, or get out from under it?"

"A. It was like myself. I have worked under top like that, see it that way and work on.

"Q. But you knew you were taking a risk?"

"A. Yes; I took the risk.

"Q. And you knew you were taking a risk, and if it fell on you that was the end of it?"

"A. Yes, I have worked under it, still I would think it would hang there. I have worked in places, and the foreman would come in and say, 'Don't you know that top there is bad,' and I says, 'Yes,' and he says, 'Prop it,' and I would say, 'I will prop it directly,' and he says, 'You will prop it now, or you will quit,' and I would prop it, or he would prop it himself. Some places the miner sets the timbers, and some places the company sets them.

"Q. It was the miner's duty there at this place to set the timbers?"

"A. Yes; they set the timbers, the straight timbers. (Italics supplied.)

"Q. A straight timber back of the car was all that was needed there?"

(188 S.E.)

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you would work on, and load the car, finish the car, or finish the day?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. But you knew you were doing it at your risk?

"A. Yes; I have done that many times.

"Q. Yet you knew you ought to get out?

"A. Yes; I ought to get out.

"Q. Did you do that during the first 20 years, or after that?

"A. It was after I learned something about the top.

"Q. That was after you knew something about mining?

"A. Yes, sir; the first 8 or 10 years I kept the timbers up close, and then I thought I knew all about it, and then—

"Q. You got careless. You were a good, careful miner, until you got to be an experienced miner?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And after you got to be an experienced miner, you became a careless miner?

"A. Yes; that is what causes men to get killed most of the time.

"Q. That was what happens the most of the time?

"A. Yes, sir.

Re-Examination.

"Q. I believe you told Mr. Chalkley that if these two props had been set, and one back in the roadway, the rock could not have fallen?

"A. If the one had been set back in the roadway, I do not think the work would have fell.

"Q. Wasn't one set there?

"A. No, sir."

The testimony of this witness has been extracted freely, because it contains a substantial proportion of the plaintiff's case. Most of the features relied upon to support the verdict are found therein, and the citations from other witnesses are mainly corroborative.

The father of the decedent states that his son did not understand mining very well, but could make more money by taking a place, and digging by himself; that he didn't think that he had worked as much as a year and a half in the coal mines; that when the weather was bad he would work in the coal mines a while. On cross-examination he made the following statements in part:

Cross-Examination.

"Q. You knew that your son had been working there in the place by himself for some little while?

"A. Yes, a while, a few weeks maybe. I would go out when he would pass in front of my door, and ask him if he did not think it was dangerous, and he said it was.

"Q. But he was making good money?

"A. Yes, sir; he said he was. * * *

"Q. You knew then he was working by himself?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He told you he was?

"A. Yes, sir; he said he was afraid he could not keep the props up, and I asked him several times to quit, and he said he would try it a little longer."

The defendants took the testimony of one witness, a colored man named Hinton, who was hauling coal for decedent. His testimony affords an intimate account of the circumstances immediately preceding the fatal accident:

William Hinton—Examination in Chief.

* * * * *

"Q. How long before he was hurt was it that you were in his room?

"A. I guess 12 or 15 minutes. * * *

"Q. Did you notice his roof, or anything about the condition of his room at that time?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What was the condition of the slate where he was working and over and immediately behind the car that he had there?

"A. Well, he had a rock up over the car that had given down, I guess near half an inch.

"Q. What do you mean by rock?

"A. Draw slate.

"Q. How big a piece?

"A. I don't exactly know, but it was a big one; I guess, 9 or 10 feet long, probably longer.

"Q. State whether you regarded that rock, or draw slate, dangerous the way it was hanging up in the roof?

"A. Yes; when I went up there, the time before I went up there, I was scared of the rock. I would not go under it, told him I would pull at the front, and he could push at the other end of the car, if he wanted to, that I would not go under that rock. He said that he did not think there was very much danger in it; he would get out another car that day, and probably it would come down in the night.

"Q. Did he see the rock you were talking about?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How close were you to it?

"A. Three feet.

"Q. How close was he?

"A. Under it.

"Q. You refused to go under it, to go to the back end of the car and push it out?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did he have any talk there about the rock at that time?

"A. No, sir; he didn't say anything more about it, any more then. I only had three timbers there at that time, no, four timbers, and I went and got another one, me and the mine boss (Taylor). We had carried him one that day, and I went and got and carried him another.

"Q. What sort of prop?

"A. We got a 4½-foot prop.

"Q. How many props had you hauled earlier?

"A. I had hauled him one, and we carried him up one, and I took him one by myself, and then I got the bank boss, and we carried him another one. * * *

"Q. Why did you use shorter props in the roadway?

"A. Generally set them on top of the ties.

"Q. Did you carry him a short prop that day?

"A. Yes; one 4-foot prop.

"Q. Why?

"A. He asked me to bring him a timber.

"Q. Mr. Sparks?

"A. Yes, after I spoke to him about the rock. He said he wanted a 4-foot timber. * * *

"Q. About how long had Mr. Sparks been working there?

"A. About three months, I suppose, as far as I remember, all the time I was there.

Cross-Examination.

"Q. You say you regarded the rock that fell as dangerous?

"A. Yes. * * *

"Q. What was exactly what you said to Sparks?

"A. Why, when I went in after the car, I saw the rock had given down; he said, 'Let's push it out,' and I says, 'No; that rock up there is going to fall.' He says, 'Oh, ain't no danger in that rock,' and he went to push behind, and I says: 'I wouldn't go back there; we can pull it here.'

"Q. Sparks said there was no danger in the rock?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I thought you said a while ago he thought it would fall that night?

"A. He did.

"Q. He thought it was going to fall that night; it would not be dangerous then; would not fall then?

"A. Yes, sir. * * *

There is a good deal of evidence to the effect that the place where Sparks was working was not, as a whole, properly timbered. But, conceding this to be true as to the rest of the room, it is unimportant in this connection. The rock that killed decedent was one immediately over the car that he was loading. It is shown that the erection of a single prop would have prevented the fall of the rock.

Flanary.

"To the best of my recollection, the piece of slate went back over the rear of the car, I guess, 5 feet. If a jack prop had been set at the rear of the car under the slate, the slate would have been safe at the present time."

Sexton.

"Q. If there had been a timber set there [i. e., at the car], would it have held the rock?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Good mining would have required a timber to have been set there?

"A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. But a prop set behind the car would have held it [i. e., the rock that finally fell]?

"A. Yes."

Further, it was the duty of the miner to set the props where he was working.

Sexton.

"Q. It was the miner's duty at this place [i. e., defendant's mine] to set the timbers?

"A. Yes; they set the timbers, the straight timbers. * * *

"Q. If he [i. e., Sparks] could see a crack in there, what was it his duty to do?

"A. It was his duty to prop it, or take it down."

The evidence establishes that the necessary props were afforded decedent, and while one or two of them were too short to reach from the floor to the roof, it is shown that these short timbers were intended to be set upon the ties. When this was done they were long enough.

The witness Hinton testifies that before the rock fell, he carried the decedent a short prop at the latter's request.

The evidence of plaintiff's witnesses as to the extent of decedent's experience is conflicting, but the aggregate of that experience was considerable, certainly sufficient to enable him to know the danger of draw slate. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff (Corder) testifies that he had known decedent off and on all his life, and when asked what he did during "all that time that he knew him," replied that he "reckoned he worked around the mines the most of the time." Other witnesses limit his aggregate time of actual work in the coal mines during his life period to a year, or a year and a half.

Decedent is described as "no fool, by any means; plenty of sense, good sense."

A part of the plaintiff's case is a statement made after the fatal injury by Weeks, the superintendent of the mine. This statement was made in the presence of several witnesses, and in the language of one of them is as follows:

"Mr. Weeks said there was a piece of rock fell while he was in there—I don't remember whether he said it was a small piece of rock; I believe he said a small piece of rock fell—he said the rock give down until he could about put his finger over it, and he said to John, he said he warned John; said to John, 'We must watch, or notice, these little things.' He said to John, 'We must watch, or notice these little things.'"

This warning was 10 or 15 minutes before the rock fell. Weeks' statement is proven by several witnesses, and the forms in which it is repeated are variant, but substantially the same. For instance, another witness, Corder, states that Weeks said that he was in John's place a few minutes, or a little while before he was killed, and noticed the rock had given down, so that he could put his finger over the rock, and he said to John: "You will have to watch these little things."

Plaintiff in error insists that Weeks' statement and the testimony of Hinton are conflicting, and therefore the jury would be justified in rejecting all of Hinton's testimony. This conflict is supposed to be found in that portion of Hinton's testimony in which he says that "he was in decedent's room he guessed 12 or 15 minutes before he was hurt," and that "Mr. Weeks was not up in his [i. e. Sparks'] room; he was coming down from up in the heading."

This statement of Hinton's is not in necessary conflict with the statement imputed to Weeks. The latter was with Sparks a "few minutes before he was killed," or "a little while before he was killed," or "10 or 15 minutes before he was killed," or "about 15 minutes before he was killed," using the language of the witnesses who repeat Weeks' statement. Hinton guessed that he was in Sparks' room 12 or 15 minutes before his death.

These statements of time are flexible estimates, that can be no more given a precise and definite interpretation than the word "several," as ordinarily used. But even as made, one party might readily have been with Sparks shortly before his death, and left before the other arrived. Hinton was pulling coal for Sparks, and regularly coming and going. He was undoubtedly in the latter's room at various times in the course of the day, and his statement that when last there he did not see Weeks does not cast doubt upon his assertion that he saw decedent in his room 12 or 15 minutes before his death. A jury dealing with these statements of Weeks and Hinton would not be justified in concluding that they were in necessary opposition, and unless they were in such opposition credence is to be given to both witnesses. The alleged contradiction between the respective statements furnishes no ground upon which this court, under accepted rules, should reject the entire testimony of Hinton.

[1] The rule of consideration on demurrer to the evidence is succinctly stated in Milton v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 108 Va. 768, 62 S. E. 961:

"If upon demurrer to the evidence the evidence is such that the jury might have found a verdict for demurree, the court must so find, and grant judgment in his favor. * * * And, further, where reasonably fair-minded men might differ upon a question, such question must be decided against the demurrant."

The evidence in the instant case and the effect of same will be considered in the light of these as well as of other principles of recognized authority, now to be cited.

[2] A servant must "provide for his own safety from such dangers as are known to him, or which are discernible by ordinary care on his part, and * * * this duty is as obligatory upon him as the duty of the master is upon the master to provide for him." Iron, Coal & Coke Co. v. Munsey, 110 Va. 163, 164, 65 S. E. 479, 481.

[3] "The rule that it is the master's duty to inform his servant of dangers ordinarily incident to the service * * * only applies where there is a danger known, or which ought to be known, to the master, of which the servant, on account of his youth or inexperience, is ignorant, and which he cannot reasonably be expected to discover by the exercise of ordinary care." Jacoby Co. v. Williams, 110 Va. 6, 65 S. E. 493.

[4] "Unquestionably where a servant is employed to engage in a dangerous work * * * the master, as a general rule, owes him the duty to use ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to make his place of work as reasonably safe as the nature of the work admits of, but this general rule does not apply when the work which the servants are employed to do consists * * * in constantly changing the character of the place for safety as the work progresses." Jacoby v. Williams, supra, 110 Va. 63, 65 S. E. 494.

"Where the dangers of the employment are visible so that any man of ordinary intelligence, though not an expert, could not fail to see and comprehend them, an employer is under no * * * obligation to warn the servant of their existence." Id., 110 Va. 62, 65 S. E. 493.

There is also the rule of assumed risk.

[5] "A servant, when he enters the service of the master, assumes all the ordinary risks of such service, and also as a general rule assumes all risks from causes which are known to him, or should be readily discernible by a person of his age or capacity, in the exercise of ordinary care." Clinchfield Coal Co. v. Wheeler, 111 Va. 265, 68 S. E. 1001.

In the case of Crane's Nest Coal & Coke Co. v. Mace, 105 Va. 624, 54 S. E. 479, it appears that the miner, in order to make more runs, that is, a larger daily output, failed, before undercutting, to test the overhanging coal which had been improperly left in position by other employees. The miner knew that the coal might fall, and could have made a test by tapping this coal with a pick. When the coal bulged, it was the duty of the undercutter to report the fact to the foreman, and stay out of danger until the coal was properly faced. The plaintiff said that he knew it was dangerous to cut under bulging coal, but thought it was solid, and did not think that it was his duty to test it before cutting. The court held in that case that the plaintiff was confronted with an open and obvious danger, which he could and should have avoided, and that the facts showed an assumption of risk on his part, which precluded recovery. Crane's Nest Coal & Coke Co. v. Mace, 105 Va. 626, 54 S. E. 480.

In Mason & Perkins v. Post, 105 Va. 500, 54 S. E. 313, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1038, the court said that when the plaintiff entered the service of the defendants, he assumed, "not only the usual ordinary risks and perils of the service, but also such other risks as became apparent by ordinary observation." His performance was optional, and he took the chance of such perils.

A ruling case in Virginia on the subject of perils obvious to a man of ordinary intelligence is that of Fields v. Virginian Ry. Co., 114 Va. 558, 77 S. E. 501. In that case the method of doing the particular work in progress was to cut into the bottom of an embankment under and along the front, and then make a trench along the top of the embankment, parallel with the face of the same. This work completed, the next stop was to break off the front of the embankment which had been cut under, by the use of crowbars. While the trench was being cut, and the holes bored, preliminary to prizing off the face of the embankment, the face gave way, carrying down the foreman and an employee who was helping him. A laborer who was at work on the embankment at this time, engaged in undercutting, was injured. Said the court, in passing on his claim for damages:

The injured party was "of mature years and of ordinary intelligence and capacity. He knew how the work * * * was being done, and that there was some risk in doing it in that manner. The risk was open and obvious and incident to the work as it was being done."

A verdict for the railway company was sustained.

Generally speaking, it is the duty of the servant to provide for his own safety from such dangers as are known to him, or are discernible by ordinary care on his part, and this duty is as obligatory on him as the duty of the master is upon the master to provide for him.

[8] A plaintiff seeking recovery for injuries on the ground of negligence of the master, and alleging such negligence as the proximate cause of said injuries, must not be guilty of negligence that either solely causes, or proximately contributes to, the injuries complained of.

Negligence has been authoritatively defined as follows:

"Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. The duty is dictated and measured by the exigencies of the situation." B. & P. Ry. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 442, 24 L. Ed. 506.

Decedent was a man 35 years old, in complete possession of his faculties, and naturally endowed with "plenty of sense," "good sense." The witnesses do not seem to think that he was an "experienced miner," though they do not advise us in any clear and definite fashion as to what is necessary to constitute such a miner. However, one of these witnesses, a miner, "guessed he [i. e. Sparks] was a man of reasonable experience," and, speaking for himself, said that he "didn't know that he would have hesitated to let him work," if he "had come and wanted to work." At any rate, decedent had secured the experience that would come from working off and on about coal mines for a large portion of his life. In the aggregate he had done much actual work, and at the time of his death he was working in a place where, as his work progressed, he constantly changed the character of the place for safety. The danger to be apprehended was an open and obvious one and the perception of this danger called for no acute powers of observation. When a man first enters a mine, and observes props in position, the necessity and purpose of their use is obvious. Decedent had not only observed these props in position during many years of actual observation which had acquainted him with their use, but at the time he received his fatal injuries was engaged in work in which it was his duty, as that work progressed, to place his own props, and thereby assure his own safety. (See statement of Sexton, supra.) His obligation in that respect was definitely imposed, and he had been supplied with the props necessary to support the very rock that ultimately fell and killed him. When he called for a prop of specified length, that prop was promptly furnished, and was in his room at the time of his death.

As touching on decedent's knowledge of the danger ever present when a miner is working under partially detached, or rotten, roof, it will be recalled that the witness Sexton states that over 10 years ago, when Sparks was working for him in a coal mine, little pieces of slate commenced to fall. At once decedent said: "I ain't going to work here; I will get killed." In response to Sexton's suggestion that "it would not hurt him, that he (Sexton) would watch the top," decedent replied: "No; I wont do it." It is possible that as decedent increased in experience, and acquired greater knowledge of top, he took greater chances, but this would not furnish ground for a recovery. According to Sexton, after he (i. e., Sexton) "got to be an experienced miner, he became a careless miner," and would work under "cracked and drawn down" top, observing it all the while, and knowing that it was his duty to prop it, or take it down, or get out from under it, but not doing any one of these things, simply "taking the risk."

Sparks' father states that his son told him that he was afraid he could not keep up the props, and when he asked him several times to quit, he replied that he would try it a little while longer. This was certainly an assumption of risk, since he was under no compulsion to continue to work.

Decedent's colabórer, the witness Hinton, noticed the draw slate shortly before it fell, and called Sparks' attention to the fact that it had given down "near half an inch." He was "scared of the rock," and "refused to go under it," telling Sparks that "he could push at the other end of the car, if he wanted to," but that "he would not go under that rock." If Hinton was an experienced miner, this suggestion on his part was certainly a warning to be regarded; if he was not an experienced miner, his perception of danger should not have been more acute than that of decedent. Hence, what was obvious to him should have been obvious to Sparks. In response to Hinton's warning of danger, and expression of personal apprehension, decedent responded:

"That he did not think there was very much danger in it [i. e., the rock], that he would get out another car that day, and probably it would come down in the night."

In addition to the warning of danger conveyed by the condition of the roof, and the freely expressed alarm of Hinton over the threatening aspect of the piece of draw slate immediately over the decedent's car, it appears that Weeks, the superintendent of the mine, was in decedent's room shortly before his death, and, noticing that the rock in question had given down to such an extent that he could put his fingers in the crack, warned him that this was a portent of danger, saying that these little things must be watched. Having in mind that the danger of falling draw slate is an open and obvious one to a man accustomed to work in mines; that decedent saw the crack between the sandstone and the rock that ultimately fell; that his attention was particularly called to the meaning of this crack, and the specific warning that it conveyed; that his fellow laborer, mindful of danger to his own life, refused to go under this rock; that the necessary prop to support this rock was furnished, and ready to hand; that it was the duty of the miner to set this prop; that this prop once set would have supported the rock—what was the duty of a reasonable and prudent person under the circumstances; what would such a person have done?

If negligence is doing what a reasonable and prudent person would not have done under the circumstances, then in the situation reviewed the decedent was guilty of negligence.

[7] Ordinary prudence and natural good sense brought to bear upon such a situation imperatively indicate that the miner should have removed, or propped, the rock, or withdrawn himself from danger. It may be that the superintendent did not think that the rock would fall at once, it may be that decedent concurred in that view, but he did think that it was likely that it would fall that night. With that thought in mind, he took the risk of its falling sooner, and of the danger to his life when he continued to work under a loose and unpropped slab of draw slate. He cannot be relieved from the charge of contributory negligence proximately contributing to his death. If the warning of Weeks might have been more emphatic than it was, still there was nothing in what he said to create a situation in which the miner's continuance in his work was at the risk of the company. With respect to the general danger of falling draw slate, the miner in the instant case assumed the risk.

Plaintiff in error cites us to the cases of Riddle v. Clinchfield Coal Corporation, 119 Va. 711, 89 S. E. 926, and Va. I., O. & C. Co. v. Munsey, supra, in support of plaintiff's right to recover. The facts of these cases are very different from the facts of the case in judgment. In Riddle's Case the master assured the servant that if he would act as brakeman for a reckless motorman, the latter would operate the motor slowly during the period of their joint service. The court held that under this assurance, notwithstanding the brakeman's antecedent knowledge of the recklessness of the motorman, he did not assume the risk of the injury that resulted therefrom, as a matter of law. It was further held by the court that the brakeman had the right to rely upon the company's assurance that if he worked with the motorman, "the motorman would operate the motor slowly." Hence his subsequent association with the motorman was at the company's risk.

In Munsey's Case, the miner abandoned the room where he was working because he considered it dangerous. He did not return to work until the mine boss assured him that the room had been made safe. This miner was inexperienced, and positively stated that he did not understand the danger of working in his room on his return. Moreover, in this case it was the duty of the company to prop the rock that ultimately fell on the plaintiff. Held, that under the circumstances the miner did not assume the risk.

After a careful review of the facts of this case, and of the authorities cited, we find no error in the action of the trial court sustaining the demurrer to the evidence, and its judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CLINCHFIELD COAL CORPORATION v. HAWKINS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Master and servant  $\S$  153(2)—Mine operator required by statute to give inexperienced employees immediate personal direction.

Under Code 1919,  $\S$  1840, providing that an inexperienced coal miner shall work under direction of a foreman, or other experienced worker, until he has had reasonable opportunity to become familiar with ordinary dangers, furnishing an inexperienced miner with competent foreman and experienced workmen is not sufficient, but he must be given such immediate personal direction as to afford him a reasonable opportunity to become familiar with the ordinary dangers incident to the work.

2. Master and servant  $\S$  289(11)—Contributory negligence of inexperienced coal miner held for jury.

In an action for injuries to an inexperienced coal miner 21 years old, who had worked with an experienced miner about nine days before he was hurt by falling slate about and after a shot, held on the evidence that it was a question for the jury whether he had been instructed as to the dangers as required under Code 1919,  $\S$  1840, so as to be guilty of working in a place known to be unsafe in violation of section 1863, and of failure to use props in violation of section 1867.

3. Master and servant  $\S$  243(12)—Inexperienced miner injured by falling slate held not precluded from recovering by employer's rule.

Coal mine operator's rule posted under Code 1919,  $\S$  1878, directing miners not to go to work after a shot until sure roof of mine was safe, merely required miner to use diligence not to work under unsafe roof and did not preclude inexperienced miner, who resumed work after a shot, from recovering for injuries by a fall of slate an hour after a shot, where the condition of the roof was not glaringly dangerous.

4. Master and servant  $\S$  243(1)—Employee must obey reasonable rules.

The employee is required to obey reasonable rules of employer.

5. Master and servant  $\S$  204(2)—Risk of employer's breach of statutory duties not assumed.

Employee does not assume risk of employer's breach of statutory duties.

6. Master and servant  $\S$  288(11)—Coal miner's assumption of risk of falling slate held for jury.

Whether an inexperienced coal miner, 21 years old, who had worked in the mine about nine days before he was hurt by falling slate about an hour after a shot, assumed the risk under the common-law doctrine held for the jury.

7. Master and servant  $\S$  190(14)—Fellow servant doctrine inapplicable to inexperienced miner directed by superior.

Where a miner injured by falling slate after a shot was inexperienced and did not work under such direction of an experienced miner as Code 1919,  $\S$  1840, requires, the negligence of the latter in not examining the roof was not that of a fellow servant.

Error to Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Action by Edgar Hawkins against the Clinchfield Coal Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Morison, Morison & Robertson, of Bristol, John W. Flannagan, Jr., of Clintwood, and W. H. Rouse, of Bristol, for appellant.

A. A. Skeen and J. O. Smith, both of Clintwood, for appellee.

KELLY, P. This action was brought by Edgar Hawkins against the Clinchfield Coal Corporation to recover damages for personal injuries received by him when he was caught under a piece of falling slate in a mine owned and operated by that corporation. At the trial of the case the defendant interposed a demurrer to the evidence which the court overruled, and a judgment followed in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the damages fixed by the jury in their conditional verdict. Thereupon the defendant obtained this writ of error.

There were three counts in the declaration, but the charge upon which the plaintiff's recovery depends is that he was an inexperienced miner, and that the defendant negligently failed to properly instruct him as to the dangers incident to the work.

The plaintiff was a bright, intelligent young man nearly 21 years of age, but prior to entering the service of the defendant as a miner his principal experience at manual labor had been obtained on a farm. He had, however, done some work cutting timber in the woods, and had also been employed a short time on the railroad grade outside of but near the mine in which he was subsequently injured. While engaged at this last-named work he boarded at a house where some of the miners also boarded, and heard them talk in a general way about their work.

He had been employed by the defendant as a miner for about two weeks before he was hurt, and during that period had actually worked in the mine eight or nine days. This was his first and only experience in that capacity, and he was not instructed by any one as to the dangers attending the work. This is his unqualified statement on the subject, and while there are some general and rather indefinite statements to the contrary by the witness Bob Dickenson, whose evidence is hereinafter more fully considered, the plaintiff's statement on the demurrer to the evidence must prevail.

He was put to work with Bob Dickenson, an experienced miner, who seems to have assigned his work to him; and it appears that two other miners of experience worked with him during a part of the time. His duty was to load coal into the mine cars, and so far as the record discloses or indicates he was never at any time while in the mines directed to do any other work. On the morning of the accident he went into a place in the mine known as room 15 with Dickenson, who "shot the coal" for him by placing a charge of dynamite in holes drilled on top of the coal seam next to the roof of the mine so as to spring the coal loose from the top. The plaintiff stood by and saw Dickenson prepare the shot, and they both withdrew to a place of safety until the shot went off. Dickenson did not go back to investigate the result of the explosion, and the plaintiff, to whom Dickenson had assigned the task of loading into the mine cars the coal thus shot down, returned and had been working an hour or two when a piece of "draw slate" fell from the roof and injured him. The plaintiff very frankly admits that he did not look at the roof, but says he would not have been able to tell by looking whether it was going to fall or not.

The remaining facts, so far as material to a decision of the case, will appear in the discussion of the various grounds which the defendant urges upon us in support of its demurrer to the evidence.

It is insisted that any recovery by the plaintiff is barred because he violated section 1863 of the Code of 1919, a part of the Virginia mining statute, which says that—

"No minor shall continue to work in any working place known by him to be unsafe, or which might have been so known to him in the exercise of ordinary care."

This point would be conclusive of the case if we were able to say as a matter of law upon the evidence certified that the plaintiff was a miner of sufficient experience to have known, or to have been able to ascertain by the exercise of ordinary care, that the roof was unsafe. The case depends, in our opinion, entirely upon whether he had been sufficiently instructed and whether he was an "inexperienced person" within the meaning of section 1840 of the Code. That section, so far as material here, is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the mine foreman or assistant mine foreman of every coal mine in this state to see that every person employed to work in such mine shall, before beginning work therein, be instructed as to any unusual or extraordinary danger incident to his work in such mine which may be known to or could reasonably be foreseen by the mine foreman or assistant mine foreman. * * *

"Every inexperienced person so employed shall work under the direction of the mine foreman, his assistant, or such other experienced worker as may be designated by the mine foreman or assistant until he has had reasonable opportunity to become familiar with the ordinary danger incident to his work."

The foregoing section of the mining law imposes two nonassignable duties upon employers engaged in mining operations: First, to instruct every employee, whether experienced or not, as to the unusual and extraordinary dangers incident to his work in the mine which may be known to or could reasonably be foreseen by the mine foreman or assistant mine foreman; and, second, to see that every inexperienced employee works with a man of experience until he has had an opportunity to become familiar with the ordinary dangers incident to the work. The former requirement of the statute is merely declaratory of the common law, and the latter was intended by the lawmakers to provide a practical and effective method for giving to inexperienced miners the instructions which at common law it was the duty of the employer to provide.

If, as contended by counsel for defendant, the danger that draw slate would under the circumstances fall on the plaintiff was not "an unusual or extraordinary danger," then the defendant did not violate the first branch of section 1840 above quoted, and we may go further and say that while the difference between "draw slate" and the sandstone or permanent roof is not very fully brought out in the record, we think it sufficiently appears that the accident which happened to the plaintiff was one which any experienced miner would have as a matter of law been bound to anticipate and protect himself against.

[1] Upon the other branch of the statute, however, we are of opinion that on the evidence demurred to a jury might reasonably have found that the plaintiff was an "inexperienced person," and as such entitled to the protection plainly intended by the statute for such person. Underground mining is in itself a hazardous business, and the ordinary and usual risks and dangers incident thereto may be quite extraordinary and unusual to one not experienced in that line of work. For example, it is stated in the petition upon which this writ of error was granted that "the draw slate is a shaly, loosely formed layer of slate, lying on top of the coal seam immediately under the sandstone or permanent slate roof, and always must be taken down." If this statement be amplified by saying that draw slate must always be either taken down or propped, it embodies a proposition which is doubtless familiar to all experienced miners, and which, furthermore, may fairly be implied from the evidence in this case as a whole, and yet that proposition is by no means a matter of common knowledge to men of even very wide experience in other fields of labor. It seems very clear from the record before us that certain very common roof conditions in the mines are treacherous and dangerous, and yet an inexperienced miner might not know how to safely guard against such conditions. In so far as the conditions are usual and ordinarily found in mines, the statute requires no more than the common law did with reference to instructing experienced men; but as to inexperienced miners the statute provides a specific practical method designed to effectively acquaint them with such dangers by requiring that they shall work under the direction of a mine foreman or his assistant, or such other experienced worker as may be designated by the mine foreman or assistant, until they have "had reasonable opportunity to become familiar with the ordinary dangers incident to the work." The plain meaning of this requirement is that the inexperienced miner shall receive such direction as will insure either a familiarity with the dangers of the work or a reasonable opportunity to acquire such familiarity. Now, it is contended in this case that the plaintiff did work under the direction of a competent foreman who visited the place every day and an experienced miner who assigned his tasks, and in a sense this contention is true. The foreman was a competent man, and he did visit the plant every day, and Dickenson, the miner with and under whom the plaintiff worked, was a man of long practical experience in mining operations. But the difficulty with the defendant's case is that neither of these men, and no other coemployee can, upon the demurrer to the evidence, be said to have given the plaintiff any demonstrations, directions, or instructions as to the danger of the roof, or the means of securing himself against such danger. He had never worked in a mine before, and we cannot say, from the proof before us, that his eight or nine days' experience in this mine, had unquestionably afforded him a sufficient opportunity, from his observation of the work by others, to understand and guard against the danger. The manifest purpose of the statute, as we construe it, is not complied with by merely furnishing inexperienced miners with competent foremen and experienced co-workmen. Its purpose was to impose upon the employer the legal duty of giving inexperienced persons such immediate personal "direction" as to afford them "a reasonable opportunity to become familiar with the ordinary dangers incident to the work." And if there be a fair doubt under the evidence as to whether this duty has been performed, the question must be settled by the jury.

It is true that the plaintiff himself, on being asked by his counsel the following question, gave the following answer:

"Q. When the coal is removed, do they do anything to keep the rock from falling?"

"A. Yes, they are supposed to take it down or prop it up one."

And it is also true that on cross-examination he was asked, "You know what draw slate is, don't you?" and answered, "Yes, I think so."

But it must be remembered that he was testifying long after he received the injury, and after it is entirely reasonable to suppose that the circumstances and cause of the accident had been the subject of much discussion by others with him or in his presence, and his answers at that time do not necessarily mean that he knew before he was injured what draw slate was or how to deal with it. It is quite easy to see from reading this record that some mine roofs require props and some do not; that draw slate is dangerous and treacherous, and that experienced miners have no trouble in distinguishing between draw slate and permanent roof; but it is by no means clear that an inexperienced man would possess such knowledge, or that the plaintiff had acquired it prior to the accident. The miner, Bob Dickenson, says he regarded him as an inexperienced man, and treated him as such, and the plaintiff testified that he had nothing to do with shooting the coal or setting the props, and that he had never been given any instructions in regard thereto by anybody. And while it is true that Dickenson, after saying that the plaintiff had nothing to do with shooting the coal or setting the props, added that, "In case the slate had to come down he [plaintiff] was supposed to set a jack prop"—a jack prop being the first or temporary prop to secure the slate while the coal last shot down and immediately over it is being removed—the force of this statement is lost when taken with the testimony as a whole. Dickenson does claim in general terms that he cautioned the men, including the plaintiff, about the draw slate, but he admits that he said nothing to him about setting a jack prop after the coal had been shot, and, as we have seen, the plaintiff testified that he had received no instructions whatever with respect to the roof, and would not have known by looking at it whether or not it was liable to fall.

[2] We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff cannot be denied a recovery as a matter of law on the ground of having violated section 1863 of the mining law as found in the Code of 1919.

And for like reasons we reach a like conclusion as to the contention that plaintiff violated section 1867 of the Code. That section, after providing for daily visits by the mine foreman or assistant foreman, and for direction as to securing their working place in the mine by props, directs that such props "shall be placed and used by the miners working therein, as in this chapter provided, to the end that such working places be made safe." The mining law must be read as a whole, and the section here under consideration of course has no effect upon the right of the plaintiff to recover if he did not know and had not had a reasonable opportunity to understand when and how to render his place safe by the use of props.

[3] And, for similar reasons, we are unable to sustain the defense based upon the alleged violation by the plaintiff of the rule that miners were not to go to work, especially after a shot, until sure the roof was safe. The defendant had complied with section 1878 of the Code, requiring the adoption and posting of rules for the government and operation of the mine, and under the terms of that section the plaintiff was charged with notice of such rules. Among them was a rule which said:

"Don't start to work, especially after a shot, until you are sure your roof is safe."

[4] Obviously all that this rule requires is that the miner must use due diligence to see that he does not work under an unsafe roof, and due diligence in every case depends upon the attending circumstances. The plaintiff admits that he did not look at the roof at all after the shot was fired, but states without qualification that he would not, with his limited knowledge and experience, have been able to tell whether it was liable to fall. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the condition of the roof over him was glaringly dangerous. He was permitted by Dickenson to go back after the shot with no instructions except to load the coal into cars. As a matter of fact the roof remained in place for an hour or so before it fell. The ruling purpose of the statute, which is the safety and protection of the miners, would be to a large extent frustrated if the employer could, by making and publishing such a rule as is here relied upon, relieve himself of the duty of seeing that inexperienced employees were given the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the dangers of the work. It is of course well-settled law that the employee is under as imperative obligation to obey reasonable rules as the employer is to make them. Shumaker's Administrator v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 125 Va. 393, 401, 99 S. E. 739, and cases cited. But the employee must have an adequate opportunity to understand the purpose and meaning of the rules before he is bound by them. Under the facts of this case, as they are presented by the demurrer to the evidence, we are unable to say that a jury must have found that the plaintiff negligently violated the rules in question.

[5,6] The doctrine of assumed risk cannot avail the defendant. It does not apply as to breaches of the statutory duties of the master (Carter Coal Co. v. Bates, 127 Va. 586, 105 S. E. 76); and, independent of that proposition, we are not prepared to hold as a matter of law from the facts of the case that under the common-law doctrine unaffected by statute, the danger was so patent and obvious as to bar the plaintiff's recovery.

[7] It is claimed that Dickenson, who was neither a foreman nor assistant foreman, was a fellow servant with the plaintiff, and that if he was guilty of any negligence in not examining the roof and propping or taking it down, the risk of that negligence was assumed by the plaintiff. But it must be remembered that if the plaintiff was an inexperienced miner, the statute imposed upon the defendant the nonassignable duty of seeing that he worked under such direction of a foreman, assistant foreman, or experienced miner as to give him a reasonable opportunity to become familiar with the dangers incident to the work. Under the evidence the jury might have found as a fact that he was an inexperienced miner, and that he did not work under such direction as the statute plainly contemplated. The fellow-servant doctrine does not apply to such a situation.

We do not mean to say that the case is plainly one for a recovery, but merely that in our opinion reasonable men might fairly differ upon what we have endeavored to point out as being the controlling facts, and that therefore the court was right in holding for the plaintiff upon the demurrer to the evidence.

It may be added that the case of Addington, Adm'r, v. Guests River Coal Co., decided to-day, 108 S. E. 695, is clearly distinguishable from this case, for the reason that in the former the plaintiff's decedent had, as shown by the evidence therein fully recited, worked in and around the mines to such an extent as to have necessarily become entirely familiar with the nature of draw slate and the danger of working under it without props, and, furthermore, had actual knowledge of the particular danger which resulted in his death.

CARTER v. KEESLING et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Trusts  $\Leftrightarrow$ 191(1)—Life tenant on whom "and" daughter, if she survived him, was conferred power to sell, had exclusive power during his lifetime.

Under a will bequeathing to testator's son all the residue of his estate, to revert to testator's other children if he and his daughter died without issue, but providing that he "and" his daughter, if she became 21, survived her father and became his heir, or devisee, should have the power to sell and convey in absolute right, such power could be completely executed during such son's lifetime, so as to enable him to pass good title to the purchaser, the word "and" meaning "and also."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, And.]

2. Trusts  $\Leftrightarrow$ 202—Purchaser from trustee with power to sell and invest proceeds need not look to application of purchase money.

Under a will bequeathing to testator's son the residue of his property, to revert to testator's other children if such son and his daughter died without issue, but conferring on him and his daughter, if she survived him, the power to sell the property and invest the proceeds in other property, to be held subject to the same provisions as to reversion, there was no obligation on a bona fide purchaser for full value from such son, without actual or constructive notice of any breach of trust committed or intended to be committed by him, to look to the application of the purchase money, the property being held in trust by the son during his lifetime with a general power of sale and unlimited discretion as to the time and terms thereof.

3. Trusts  $\Leftrightarrow$ 202—Purchaser from trustee with power to sell and invest proceeds in other property, on discovering his intention to divert proceeds to personal use, should pay money into court.

Where a purchaser of land from a trustee, with power to sell and invest the proceeds in other property, to be held subject to the provisions of the will as to the reversion, discovered, after a decree adjudging him under no obligation to look to the application of the purchase money, that the trustee intended to use it to pay his own personal obligations, it was his duty, by interpleader, to convene all those interested, and pay the money into court, to avoid liability as particeps criminis in such devastavit.

4. Equity  $\Leftrightarrow$ 456—No error in requiring petitioner to pay into court moneys due opposite party.

Where a purchaser from a trustee under a will with power to sell and invest the proceeds in other property, after a decree adjudging that he need not look to the application of the purchase money, sought leave to file a bill of review on the ground of his discovery that such trustee intended to use the money to pay his personal obligations, the court did not err in requiring that he pay into court the portion of the purchase money past due at the time of such decree, the granting of leave, which is necessary when the bill is founded on newly discovered evidence, and there is no error of law on the face of the record, resting in the sound discretion of the court, which may impose terms.

5. Equity  $\Leftrightarrow$ 456—No error in requiring that petitioner pay into court money due opposite party, where decree could be changed only to allow payment into court instead of to opposite party.

Since a bill of review on the ground of newly discovered evidence entitles complainant to relief only to the extent that such evidence would have changed the character of the former decree, the court did not err in requiring a purchaser from a trustee under a will with power to sell and invest the proceeds in other property, before being granted leave to file a bill of review on the ground of his discovery that such trustee intended to use the purchase money to pay his personal obligations, to pay into court the amount due under the contract at the time of the entry of the former decree, the only possible change in such decree being to allow payment of the money into court instead of to such trustee, and the relief asked, assurance of a clear title, being afforded by paying the money into court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Smyth County.

Suit by Oreed F. Carter against James B. Keesling and others. Bill dismissed, and complainant filed a bill of review, which was also dismissed. From the decrees, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

On September 1, 1919, the appellant bought of the appellees James B. Keesling and Edith Keesling Cole a tract of 509 acres of land and considerable personal property, which constituted portions of a larger amount of land and personal property which were devised and bequeathed to James B. Keesling and Edith Keesling Cole by the residuary clause of the will of the father of the former and grandfather of the latter, one Emory S. Keesling, deceased, duly probated in the year 1915.

The appellant agreed to pay for said property, purchased as aforesaid, the sum of $65,000, to be paid as follows: $17,000 on the 1st day of January, 1920, and the residue in eight equal installments of $6,000 each, to be evidenced by eight negotiable notes dated September 1, 1919, for such amount each, bearing interest from date, and payable respectively September 1, 1920, September 1, 1921, September 1, 1922, September 1, 1923, September 1, 1924, September 1, 1925, September 1, 1926, and September 1, 1927. Deeds were to be made by the vendors to the vendee on January 1, 1920, upon the payment of the first payment of $17,000 aforesaid, which deed was to reserve a vendor's lien to secure the payment of the said residue of the purchase money.

On September 1, 1919, the vendee executed a deed of trust on certain property belonging to him to secure the payment of said $17,000, the first payment aforesaid.

On September 23, 1919, the appellant wrote the attorney for J. B. Keesling the following letter:

"Dear Sir: In the matter of my purchase from James B. Keesling and others, I have discovered that the title of the vendors is not good. I have requested my attorneys to look into it and advise me as to the condition thereof. They have reported to me that the title, in their judgment, is defective and dependent on contingencies which could defeat the title entirely. They have further advised me to say to Mr. Keesling, and I make this statement to you as his attorney, that I shall be ready and willing to make my first payment on the farm as soon as Mr. Keesling can make me good title, provided this can be done within reasonable time.

"I had made all my plans to complete the purchase of this property, and I regret to find the title in the condition it is.

"Very truly yours, C. F. Carter."

The said $17,000 payment was not made on January 1, 1920, and upon request of James B. Keesling, the trustee in said deed of trust advertised for sale the property thereby conveyed.

Thereupon the appellant instituted this suit.

The material portions of the bill are as follows:

"Your complainant would further state that the vendors received their title as devisees (under the will) of Emory S. Keesling, deceased. That under said will, by the 5th clause thereof, there is this provision:

"But should my son James B. Keesling, and his daughter Edith, both die without lawful issue living, then my will is that the property, both real and personal, which by this clause I have devised to my son James B. Keesling, should revert to my other children, or their descendants,' thereby depriving the vendors of your complainant from having the right at the present time of conveying said property, their title to said property being wholly dependent upon the contingency as to whether James B. Keesling and his daughter Edith should die with or without issue.

"Your complainant would further state that there is a further provision in said will that if Edith Cole, the daughter of James B. Keesling, should survive her father and become 21 years of age, and become his sole heir or devisee, she should have the power to convey said property, but that the purchase money received from such sale should be invested in other property to be held and owned in the same way, and subject to the like provisions that, if they should both die without issue living at the time of their death, the property hereby devised should revert to the testator's other children. All of which will fully appear from a copy of the will marked Exhibit B and prayed to be considered as a part of this bill.

"Your complainant would further state upon receiving the opinion of his attorneys that vendors had no right to make a conveyance, that he immediately notified his vendors of the opinion he had received, through a letter dated December 23, 1919, to W. R. D. Moncure, the attorney of vendors, in which letter your complainant stated that he was ready and willing to comply with the terms of his contract provided his vendors could make a good title to the land; all of which will fully appear from a copy of letter herewith filed marked Exhibit C.

"Your complainant would further state that his vendors did nothing to perfect the title, but proceeded to advertise a sale of all the property embraced in the deed of trust, to take place at Marion, as to the real estate on February 14, 1920, and of the personal property embraced in said trust to take place at Cedar Springs, Va., on Tuesday, the 17th day of February, 1920; all of which will fully appear from a copy of the advertisement herewith filed, marked Exhibit D. * * *

"Your complainant is advised that a court of equity will not compel him to take this property with the title in the condition it is; that, while he is willing and ready and able to comply with his contract, provided the title were good, he ought not to be compelled to pay for property when, if certain contingencies occur that might occur, he would have no title at all to said real estate so contracted for as aforesaid.

"Being without remedy at law, and only relievable in equity, the prayer of your complainant is that J. B. Keesling, Edith Cole, and W. R. D. Moncure, trustee, may be made parties defendant to this bill, and they be required to answer the same, but not under oath, an answer under oath being waived; that your honor will enjoin the said W. R. D. Moncure from making the sales as aforesaid, and that your honor will construe the will of Emory S. Keesling as to whether or not the said J. B. Keesling and Edith Cole have the power to convey the said real estate, and to relieve your complainant from being compelled to carry out his contract under the circumstances, and will protect the right of your complainant in the premises; that all proper accounts may be ordered; and that your honor will grant unto your complainant such other, further, and more general relief as to equity seems meet and the nature of his case may require; and your complainant will ever pray, etc."

The residuary clause of the will, filed as Exhibit B with the bill, the construction of which clause is involved in this suit as aforesaid, is as follows:

"Fifth. I devise and bequeath (subject to my wife's interest in same) to my said son, James B. Keesling all the remainder of my property real and personal, including my farm on which I now reside situated partly in Smyth county and partly in Wythe county, Virginia, but he is to pay my funeral expenses, including suitable monument to my grave and all the debts, which I owe at the time of my death and he shall also pay the legacies of six thousand dollars ($6,000) each to my two daughters as above set forth. But should my said son James B. Keesling and his daughter Edith both die without lawful issue living, then my will is, that the property both real and personal which by this clause, I have devised to my said son James B. Keesling shall revert to my other children or their descendants. But my will is, that notwithstanding the provisions in this clause of my will, that the property shall revert to my other children in the event that my said son, James B. Keesling and his said daughter, Edith, shall die without issue living at the time of their death, the said James B. Keesling and his said daughter, if she shall survive her father and becomes twenty-one year of age, and becomes the heir or devisee of her father, shall have the full power and authority to sell and convey in absolute right the property I have hereby devised and bequeathed to my said son James B. Keesling and to invest the proceeds of such sale in other property, to be held and owned in the same way, and subject to the like provisions that if they should both die without issue living at the time of their death, the property hereby devised by this clause shall revert to my other children, or their descendants."

A preliminary injunction was awarded in accordance with the prayer of the bill on February 13, 1920, and by order entered February 23, 1920, this injunction was enlarged until the further order of court on condition that the complainant execute a bond conditioned according to law, etc., within three days from that date, in the penalty of $6,000, and the cause was continued.

On October 26, 1920, the appellee James B. Keesling filed his demurrer in writing to the bill, setting forth certain grounds of demurrer, of which only the following need be stated, namely:

"Fourth. The bill and exhibits show that this defendant can convey good title to the lands in the bill and exhibits mentioned.

"Fifth. The plaintiff, as vendee of the lands in the bill mentioned, is under no duty to see to the reinvestment of the purchase money, and therefore has no interest entitling him to ask the court to supervise such reinvestment."

At the same time the appellee, Edith Keesling Cole, demurred in writing to the bill on the following single ground set forth therein namely:

"Because it appears from the bill and exhibits that she has no interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and is neither entitled to nor subject to any decree in the premises."

On the same day, October 26, 1920, the court entered the first decree which is under review on this appeal, in which it was decreed that the said demurrer of James B. Keesling to the bill, "upon the fourth and fifth grounds, as set forth in the written demurrer this day filed, is well taken"; and that the court "is of opinion that the defendants, J. B. Keesling and Edith Keesling Cole, under the will of E. S. Keesling, deceased, can convey good title to the land sold to the plaintiff without any obligation on the part of the plaintiff to see to the application of the purchase money." And by this decree the injunction theretofore awarded was dissolved and the bill dismissed.

Thereafter, on November 22, 1920, the appellant tendered to the judge of the court below, in vacation, a bill of review, and asked leave to file the same, and that it might be taken as a bill of review to rehear the final decree entered at the October term of the court, which was the decree of October 26, 1920, aforesaid. And thereupon the defendants James B. Keesling and Edith Keesling Cole appeared by counsel and objected to the filing of the bill of review, and the matters arising upon the motion of appellant to file such bill and the objections of the appellees to the filing of the same were argued by counsel. Whereupon the following decree was entered, which is also under review on this appeal, namely:

"Upon consideration whereof, the court doth sustain the objection of the said defendants to the filing of said bill unless and until the complainants shall pay to H. L. Kent, clerk of the circuit court of Smyth county, the sum of $23,000, representing the principal of the purchase-money notes of the complainants due on the 1st day of January, 1920, and the 1st day of September, 1920, with interest on the said sum of $23,000 from September 1, 1919, until so paid, and with interest from September 1, 1919, on $42,000, balance of purchase money, to September 1, 1920.

"And the said complainants are given until the 20th day of December, 1920, to pay said sums to H. L. Kent, clerk, as aforesaid.

"It is agreed by counsel for complainants that the amount of purchase money and interest hereinbefore decreed to be paid is now due."

The bill of review just referred to, so far as material to be stated, contained the following allegations:

"(1) That heretofore, your orator has exhibited in your honor's court a bill of complaint against J. B. Keesling, Edith Cole, and W. R. D. Moncure, trustee; that process was duly executed on the said defendants, and that they filed their demurrer thereto, and issue was joined thereon; that upon argument of counsel, your honor entered a decree on the 26th day of October, 1920, sustaining the fourth and fifth grounds of demurrer, and dismissing the bill of your orator.

"(2) That the object of the bill of your orator was to construe the will of Emory S. Keesling, deceased, and determine whether or not, under the provisions of the said will, the said James B. Keesling had the right to convey certain land to your orator; that the only evidence adduced before your honor was the will of Emory S. Keesling, and that, by sustaining the fourth and fifth clauses of the demurrer, your honor decreed that J. B. Keesling had the right and power to sell the said land under the will.

"(3) That your orator has discovered new matter of consequence and material in said cause, which new matter your orator did not know, and could not, by reasonable diligence, have known, so as to make use thereof in this cause. * * *

"(5) That, by the fourth clause of said will, the said Emory S. Keesling bequeathed to his two daughters, Carrie K. Lantz and Minnie Cornett, the sum of $6,000 each, with interest from the time of his death, to be paid by James B. Keesling.

"(6) That, after the death of Emory S. Keesling, the said James B. Keesling filed a bill in your honor's court, under the name and style of Jas. B. Keesling et al. v. Theresa A. Keesling and others, asking, among other things, that the will of Emory S. Keesling be so construed as to permit him, the said James B. Keesling, to sell the property devised him, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of paying off the legacies to Mrs. Carrie K. Lantz and Minnie K. Cornett, and also to pay $6,000 agreed upon between Theresa A. Keesling and James B. Keesling as the value of the dower interest of Theresa A. Keesling in the property devised to J. B. Keesling, the said Theresa Keesling being the widow of Emory S. Keesling, deceased.

"(7) That your honor, by decree entered in said cause on the 17th day of December, 1917, and herewith filed as Exhibit Decree, expressly held and decreed that the legacies of Carrie K. Lantz and Minnie K. Cornett were personal obligations of J. B. Keesling, and that the prayer of the said bill that the said J. B. Keesling be permitted to sell the real estate devised to him for the purpose of paying those legacies of $6,000 each, and the amount due the widow, Theresa Keesling, be denied.

"(8) That, therefore, by the said decree, your honor expressly denied to J. B. Keesling the right to sell said property for the purpose of paying the debts and legacies, but did not deny him the right to sell for the purpose of reinvestment, and that your honor's decree in the last-named respect, viz. granting him the right to sell, or rather construing the will to the effect that he could sell and convey for the purpose of reinvestment, as provided by the will, was upheld and affirmed by your honor in the last decree in this cause.

"(9) Your honor has decreed that James B. Keesling has no right under the will to sell the said real estate for the purpose of paying the legacies, and the amount due Theresa A. Keesling.

"Your orator alleges that James B. Keesling has sold a large amount of the said real estate, and in direct defiance of the terms of the will of his father, Emory S. Keesling, and of your honor's court, has applied the proceeds to the payment of said legacies.

"That your orator alleges that, in contravention of the terms of the will of Emory S. Keesling, the said James B. Keesling has sold a large amount of said property, and has appropriated the proceeds to his own personal use, and paid his own personal debts therewith.

"That your orator is advised that it is not the intention of the said James B. Keesling to invest the proceeds of the sale to your orator as provided by the will, but on the contrary, to appropriate the same to his own personal use.

"(10) That the said James B. Keesling has advertised and sold a large amount of acreage of the farm devised to him by his father, under the power of sale conferred upon him, and that he has not invested the proceeds as required by the will; on the contrary, has paid his personal obligations therewith, * * * to wit, the legacies, etc.

"(11) That your orator, purchaser of the property in the bill and proceedings mentioned knows these facts. That he has learned since the institution of this suit that they exist. That he could not have learned them by using ordinary diligence before he did, and he, knowing personally the wrongful use which has been made of the proceeds of the sale of this property, and knowing that the proceeds of sale have been and will be diverted from the channel in which they are legally required to be placed, to the possible detriment of the contingent legatees and devisees under said will, does not know whether he can safely pay the purchase money for said property to James B. Keesling.

"(12) That James B. Keesling is the executor of the will of his father, with power of sale, under the decision of your honor's court. That the property devised to him, upon the happening of a contingency, viz. that both he and his daughter die without issue living, reverts to the other children of Emory S. Keesling, and their descendants, and that it is his duty, known to your orator, if he exercises the power to sell, to reinvest the proceeds as commanded by the will under which he acts, and since your orator knows that that duty has not been complied with, he asks that the money which he pays be required to be invested under the terms of the will, or that the said James G. Keesling, executor with power to sell, execute sufficient bond to properly execute his executorship.

"(13) Your orator is willing, ready, and anxious to carry out his contract, in the bill and proceedings set out. All he asks is that he be given a clear title, against the claims of all persons on account of any action of executor, of which he has knowledge.

"(14) Your orator is advised that Carrie Keesling Lantz, Minnie Keesling Cornett, and P. P. Keesling are the living children of Emory S. Keesling, other than James B. Keesling; that L. N. Keesling and E. B. Keesling and E. G. Keesling are sons of P. P. Keesling, and grandchildren of Emory S. Keesling; that Margaret Keesling, Jessie Keesling, and E. G. Keesling, Jr., are great-grandchildren of Emory Keesling, and children of W. G. Keesling, and are infants, and that — Cole is the great-grandchild of Emory Keesling, the infant child of Edith Keesling Cole.

"(15) Your orator is advised that the above parties would be entitled to all the property, real and personal, devised and bequeathed to James B. Keesling, on the happening of the contingency mentioned in the will.

"(16) Your orator understands that the decree entered in this cause provides that he, as purchaser, does not have to look to the investment of the purchase money, but alleges that by this after-discovered evidence, actual knowledge of the diversion of the fund arising from the sale of the property is brought home to him, and, infants being involved, and persons not in being, he asks the court to direct, under a proper construction of the will, what is the legal effect of the will under such circumstances.

"(17) The premises considered, therefore, the prayer of your orator is that James B. Keesling, Edith Keesling Cole, and W. R. D. Moncure be made parties defendant to this bill, and be required to answer the same, but not under oath; that the decree entered in this cause be reviewed and reversed; that, pending the decision of the court an order be entered suspending the operation of said decree; that this bill be considered a bill of review, or as a petition for a rehearing; that the said Carrie Keesling Lantz, Minnie Keesling Cornett, L. N. Keesling, E. B. Keesling, E. G. Keesling, Margaret Keesling, Jessie Keesling, E. G. Keesling, Jr., and ——— Cole, infant child of Edith Keesling Cole, be made parties defendant to this suit, and be required to answer the same, the adults not under oath; that a guardian ad litem be appointed for the said infants, who shall answer the same under oath, and the infants answer by their guardian ad litem, also under oath; that, upon a rehearing of this cause, your honor will direct that the purchase money to be paid by him be invested under the terms of the will of Emory S. Keesling, with power to sell, and that your honor further construe the will of Emory S. Keesling, and determine whether or not your orator shall, under the circumstances, pay to James B. Keesling the balance of the purchase money, and your honor will enjoin the said James B. Keesling, Edith Keesling Cole, and W. R. D. Moncure from collecting said purchase money unless and until the will of Emory S. Keesling be complied with, and that your honor will grant all such other, further, and more general relief shall demand, and your honor think proper; and your orator will ever pray," etc.

The decree in the collateral suit referred to in the bill of review, a copy of which is filed therewith as Exhibit Decree, is as follows:

"James B. Keesling, in His Own Right, and as Executor and Trustee under the Will of Emory S. Keesling, Deceased, v. Theresa Keesling, J. W. Lantz, Trustees, Edith Keesling, Jessie B. Keesling, Carrie Keesling Lantz and J. W. Lantz, Her Husband, Minnie Keesling Cornett and Lon C. Cornett, Her Husband, P. P. Keesling and Margaret Neff Keesling, His Wife, E. G. Keesling and Bessie W. Keesling, His Wife, L. N. Keesling, E. B. Keesling, Margaret Keesling, Jessie Keesling, and E. G. Keesling, Jr., the Last Three Infants, and John P. Buchanan, Guardian Ad Litem for Said Infants. In Chancery.

"This cause having been by an order entered on the third day of March, 1917, made a vacation cause, but not having been heard and determined in vacation, this day came on to be heard in term upon process duly executed as to the adult defendants, upon the bill of complaint and exhibits therewith duly matured for hearing at first November rules, 1916, as to the adult defendants, and taken for confessed as to said adult defendants, and upon the answer of the infant defendants Margaret Keesling, Jessie Keesling, and E. G. Keesling, Jr., by John P. Buchanan their guardian ad litem appointed to defend them in this suit, and the answer of the said guardian ad litem, duly sworn to, and upon replication to said answer, upon the depositions of witnesses duly taken and filed on the 3d day of February, 1917, and upon the exhibits therewith, upon orders heretofore entered, and upon the argument of counsel; and the court, having maturely considered the matters presented by the complainants' bill, is of the opinion and doth adjudge, order and decree:

"(1) That the complainant James B. Keesling, under the will of Emory S. Keesling, deceased, in his own right, takes a fee-simple estate in the real estate of Emory S. Keesling, deceased, embraced in the fifth clause of the will of the said Emory S. Keesling, and an absolute estate in the personal property bequeathed by said clause, both estates defeasible in the event of, and upon the death of the said James B. Keesling and his daughter, Edith Keesling, without lawful issue of the said James B. Keesling living at the death of the survivor of the said James B. Keesling and Edith Keesling, in which event, that is to say, in the event of the death of the survivor of the said James B. Keesling and Edith Keesling without lawful issue of the said James B. Keesling living at the death of such survivor, the estate, real and personal, devised to the said James B. Keesling, shall pass to the other children of the said Emory S. Keesling, or their descendants.

"(2) That the said James B. Keesling, during his lifetime, has full and complete power and authority to sell, convey, and dispose of the real and personal estate devised and bequeathed to him by the fifth clause of the testator's will, and to pass to the purchaser or purchasers thereof absolute and fee-simple title thereto, free and discharged from the defeasance in the testator's will set forth, and without any responsibility on the part of the purchaser or purchasers to follow or see to the reinvestment of the purchase money, and that the defendant, Edith Keesling, daughter of the said James B. Keesling, in the event she shall survive her father and become his heir or devisee, upon the death of her said father shall be vested with like authority and power to sell, convey, and dispose of the said estate, or any part thereof. Upon such sale, the proceeds thereof must be reinvested in other property, to be held subject to the same defeasance and trust, with like power of sale and reinvestment.

"(3) The court is further of opinion that, under the will of the said Emory S. Keesling, the said James B. Keesling takes the estate, real and personal, devised and bequeathed to him by the fifth clause of said will, subject to a personal obligation on the part of the said James B. Keesling to provide for and discharge the claims of the widow in and against the said estate, and pay off and discharge legacies bequeathed by the said will to Carrie (or Clara) Keesling Lantz, wife of J. W. Lantz, and Minnie Keesling Cornett, wife of L. C. Cornett, of $6,000 each, with interest from the death of the testator, to be paid in three equal annual installments from the date of such death, as provided in the fourth clause of the testator's will, and also subject to personal obligation to pay the debts of the testator, and that the provisions in said will in favor of the widow, Theresa A. Keesling, and of Carrie (or Clara) Keesling Lantz and Minnie Keesling Cornett are not intended to be and are not made charges upon the real and personal estate devised to the said James B. Keesling by the fifth clause of the testator's will, but that only the estate devised to the said James B. Keesling in said real and personal estate is subject to such charge.

"It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the prayer of the complainant's bill that he be allowed to sell so much of the real estate of Emory S. Keesling, deceased, as may be necessary to pay off and discharge the legacies to Clara Keesling Lantz and Minnie Keesling Cornett, with interest, and any other unpaid indebtedness against the estate, or that he be authorized out of the proceeds of sale of all or any greater part of said real estate to pay off and discharge such legacies and obligations, be, and the same is hereby, denied, but the denial of the prayer of complainant's bill to be allowed to appropriate sufficient of the proceeds of sale to pay off said legacies and obligations shall not in any way abridge or impair his right to dispose of the said estate or any part thereof for the purposes of reinvestment, as hereinbefore provided for.

"It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed, the object of this suit having been accomplished, that the same be stricken from the docket. * * *

Hutton & Hutton, and J. J. Stuart, both of Abingdon, and J. P. Buchanan, of Marion, for appellant.

W. R. D. Moncure, of Marion, and W. B. Kegley and E. Lee Trinkle, both of Wytheville, for appellees.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). We will first dispose of the questions presented in argument which arise upon the assignments of error before us to the action of the court below in sustaining the demurrer to the original bill by the decree entered October 26, 1920.

There is no controversy over the conclusion that the estate vested in James B. Keesling by the clause of the will in question is a defeasible fee in the real estate and a defeasible absolute estate in the personal property, devised and bequeathed thereby, subject to be defeated by the happening of the event of the death of the survivor of the said James B. Keesling and his daughter, Edith Keesling Cole, without leaving any descendant of the said James B. Keesling living at the death of such survivor; and that upon the happening of that event the estate, real and personal, devised and bequeathed by such clause of the will, shall pass to the children of the testator other than James B. Keesling or to their descendants. And we hold that such is the proper construction of such clause of such will.

The controverted questions before us which arise upon the assignments of error to the action of the court below in sustaining the demurrer to the original bill are only two. They will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. Was and is the power to sell and convey given by said clause of the will a power which cannot be completely executed during the lifetime of James B. Keesling?

This question must be answered in the negative.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the language of the will on the subject under consideration at least leaves this question in doubt, the language being:

"The said James B. Keesling and his said daughter, if she shall survive her father and become twenty-one years of age and become the heir or devisee of her father, shall have the full power and authority to sell and convey * * * and to invest the proceeds of such sale in other property, to be held and owned in the same way, subject to the like provisions that if they should both die without issue living at the time of their death," etc. (Italics supplied.)

The use of the particle "and" where it first occurs in the quotation is, however, plainly with the meaning of "and also," when construed with reference to the exercise of the power, as it is manifest from a reading of the whole sentence that the power is conferred, indeed, upon the father and daughter, but that it may be exercised by the father in his lifetime, and also by the daughter, "if she shall survive her father and become twenty-one years of age and become the heir or devisee of her father."

[2] 2. Upon the case made by the original bill, was there any obligation on the appellant as purchaser to look to the application of the purchase money?

This question must be answered in the negative.

It was a purchase of property which in equity will be regarded as held in trust by James B. Keesling during his lifetime, but with general power of sale and conveyance given him, with discretion as to time and terms of sale, with express provision that the property in absolute right should pass to the purchaser; and also, along with the duty to reinvest the proceeds of sale in other property to be held upon the same trust, the trustee is given unlimited discretion as to the kind of property and as to the time in which reinvestment shall be made. And, according to the original bill, the appellant was a bona fide purchaser for full value of such property from such a trustee, without actual or constructive notice of any breach of trust committed or intended to be committed by the trustee.

It is well settled that in such case there was no obligation on the purchaser to look to the application of the purchase money. Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. 115, 40 S. E. 630; Hughes v. Tabb, 78 Va. 313; Claborne v. Holland, 88 Va. 1046, 14 S. E. 915; Potter v. Gardner, 12 Wheat. 498, 6 L. Ed. 706; Elliott v. Merryman, 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 1, 109, 119, and notes.

As said in Claborne v. Holland, supra, 88 Va. 1046, 1049, 14 S. E. 915, 916:

"* * * It is well settled in Virginia, and the prevailing doctrine in this country is, that where a sale is made by a trustee under a power to sell and reinvest upon the same trusts, a bona fide purchaser who pays the trustee will be protected"—citing Hughes v. Tabb and Elliott v. Merryman, and notes to latter case, supra.

As said in Hughes v. Tabb, supra, 78 Va. 313, 325:

"The rule is, that wherever the trust is of a defined and limited nature, the purchaser must himself see that the purchase money is applied to the proper discharge of the trust; but wherever the trust is general, and of an unlimited nature, he need not see to it. 2 Story Eq. Jur. § 1131; 1 Lom. Dig. 302, 304; Potter v. Gardner, 12 Wheaton, 498.

"There is much reason in the doctrine that, where the trust is defined in its object, and the purchase money is to be reinvested upon trusts which require time and discretion, or the acts of sale and reinvestment are manifestly contemplated to be at a distance from each other, the purchaser shall not be bound to look to the application of the purchase money, for the trustee is clothed with a discretion in the management of the trust fund, and if any persons are to suffer by his misconduct, it should rather be those who reposed confidence than those who have bought under an apparently authorized act. Opinion of Justice Story in Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheaton, 442; Sugden on Vendors, c. 11, § 1. So, when a sale is made by trustees under a power to sell and reinvest upon the same trust, it has been held in America that the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money. 2 Story's Equity, § 1184, and authorities there cited."

In Redford v. Clarke, supra, 100 Va. 115, p. 119, 40 S. E. 630, 631, this is said:

"In this case, there was a discretion vested in the trustee to determine in what particular property he would reinvest the fund, a discretion over which the purchaser had no control, and for the due exercise of which, if he acted in good faith, he was not responsible."

[3] We come now to the questions which arise upon the assignments of error to the action of the court below in refusing to allow the bill of review to be filed except upon the condition imposed by the decree of November 22, 1920, which is also under review on this appeal; or, what is the same thing, the action of the court in imposing the condition aforesaid upon the leave to file such pleading.

These questions are also but two in number, and they will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

3. Upon the case made by the allegations of the bill of review, what was the situation and duty of the appellant and of the court?

According to the case made by the allegations of the bill of review, the appellant, at the time of his purchase, was under no obligation to look to the application of the purchase money. But after his purchase, and, indeed, after the decree upon the original bill, it is alleged by the new pleading that the appellant discovered, and, in substance, became possessed of actual knowledge, that the sale to appellant by the trustee was for the purpose of enabling the trustee to commit a devastavit by the diversion and use by the trustee of the purchase money to pay his own personal obligations, and that, if the purchase money was paid by appellant to the trustee, the latter would so use such money, and thus be enabled to commit and would commit the devastavit.

This plainly presents a situation in which the purchaser occupies the position of a stakeholder with respect to the unpaid purchase money, and, in equity and good conscience, it was his duty, by interpleader, to convene all of the persons in being who might have an interest in such money before the court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and pay the money which was due and to become due and payable into the hands of the court, so that it might be reinvested by the trustee under the terms of the trust, subject to the supervision of the court. And this, in substance, was precisely what the appellant conceived to be his duty under the circumstances set forth in his new pleading, and was the relief he himself prayed, if not by the specific prayers of his new pleading, certainly by his submitting the matter to the jurisdiction of the court, and by his prayer for general relief.

The situation presented by the new pleading is not one in which, accurately speaking, the purchaser has the right to look to the application of the purchase money. The discretionary powers vested in the trustee by the terms of the will, with respect to the undesignated character of property and unlimited time within which the reinvestment is to be made, prevent this. The purchaser has no right of control of the action of the trustee in these matters. Nor, indeed, would the court. But the court could prevent the devastavit and yet permit the trustee to exercise the discretion vested in him by the will.

The sole right which the purchaser has under such circumstances is to take such action as will enable him to avoid becoming liable as particeps criminis with the trustee in the commission of the devastavit aforesaid.

As said in the note to Elliott v. Merryman, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. Pt. 1, p. 119:

"* * * The purchaser will unquestionably be liable to the cestui que trust, if he knows that the trustee is acting in violation of his trust, or even that he entertains such a design and sells as a means of accomplishing it"

—citing, among other cases, Jackson v. Updegraffe, 1 Rob. (40 Va.) 107; Graff v. Castleman, 5 Rand. (26 Va.) 195, 16 Am. Dec. 741; Pinckard v. Woods, 8 Grat. (49 Va.) 140.

As stated in the note to Pinckard v. Woods,

8 Grat. (49 Va.) in Va. Rep. Ann., at bottom pages 471, 472:

"It is a well settled doctrine that all who participate in a breach of trust are jointly and severally liable; thus a party knowingly dealing with the executor in such a way as to enable him to commit a devastavit will be held liable therefor."

The Virginia cases there cited to sustain this proposition undoubtedly do so.

It is true, as appears from the above-cited authorities, and numerous others on the same subject which might be cited, that, when the purchaser of trust property from a fiduciary derives a peculiar personal benefit, such as the payment of an existing personal debt of the fiduciary to him, or the payment of less than full value, or other fruit of the collusion, it is a plain case of liability on the part of the purchaser, upon the principle that he is particeps criminis with the defaulting fiduciary. It is also true, as stated in Graff v. Castleman, supra, 5 Rand. (26 Va.) 195, at page 201 (16 Am. Dec. 741):

"In the cases of Nugent v. Giffard, 2 Ves. 269, and 1 Atk. 463, Meade v. Ld. Orrery, 3 Atk. 235, and Tanner v. Ivis, 2 Ves. 466, Lord Hardwicke would not suffer creditors or legatees to follow assets into the hands of a purchaser from the executor or administrator, unless there was evidence of fraud or collusion between them. Nor did he consider it evidence of such fraud and collusion that the executor was applying the assets to the payment of his own individual debt, and this with the knowledge of the purchaser."

And as stated in the same opinion in Graff v. Castleman, 5 Rand. (26 Va.) pp. 201, 202, 16 Am. Dec. 741:

"In Whale v. Booth, cited 4 Term Rep. 625, note, Lord Mansfield went quite as far. He said [however]: 'There is one exception * * * where a contrivance appears between the purchaser and the executor to make a devastavit.'"

But, as appears from the opinion in this Virginia case and in others of the Virginia cases on the subject above cited and referred to, it would seem to be now settled that a party knowingly dealing with a trustee or other fiduciary in such a way as to enable him to commit a devastavit will be held liable therefor, although such party himself may pay present money and full value and derive no peculiar benefit as the fruit of the transaction. And this conclusion seems to us to be sound in principle certainly where the party himself not merely suspects, but affirmatively states that he knows as an actual fact, that the trustee will commit the devastavit if he deals with the trustee by paying money belonging to the trust fund into the hands of the trustee.

We are therefore of opinion that there was no error in the decree of October 26, 1920, in so far as it treated the case presented by the bill of review as one of which it was proper for the court to take jurisdiction.

[4] 4. Is the decree of November 22, 1920, erroneous in that, in granting leave to file the bill of review, it imposed the condition or terms upon the appellant that he should pay into court that portion of the purchase money which was owing by the appellant in accordance with his contract of purchase and past due at the time of the entry of the decree?

This question must be answered in the negative.

No authority is cited for appellant to sustain the contention that such action was erroneous, nor have we been able to find any.

On the contrary, we see that in 16 Cyc. 523, 524, cited for appellees, this is said:

"It is not necessary to obtain leave of the court to file a bill of review to correct an error of law apparent on the face of the record; but such leave is necessary where the bill is founded on new matter or newly discovered evidence. The granting of such leave is not a matter of right, but rests in the sound discretion of the court, subject to review; * * * and in granting leave terms may be imposed."

The bill of review in the case before us is founded on alleged newly discovered evidence, and must rest solely on that ground; because, as we have above held, there was no error of law apparent on the face of the record as it stood at the time of the entry of the former decree.

[5] Further, it is well settled that a bill of review filed on the ground of newly discovered evidence entitles the complainant to relief only to the extent that the newly discovered evidence, if it had been brought forward in time, should have changed the character of the former decree sought to be reviewed. And it is plain from what we have said above that, if the allegations of the bill of review are all taken to be true, the only change in the character of the former decree which the appellant would be entitled to ask would be that the decree allow him to pay the purchase money into court instead of to the said trustee. The alleged newly discovered evidence in no way gives the appellant any right to decline payment into court of the part of the purchase money which is past due, nor, indeed, of the residue as it falls due, under his contract of purchase. Indeed the bill of review itself states that appellant "is willing, ready, and anxious to carry out his contract in the bill and proceedings set out. All he asks is that he be given a clear title against the claims of all persons on account of any action of executor of which he has knowledge." This relief will be undoubtedly afforded to the appellant if he pays the money into court. The condition or terms imposed upon the appellant by the decree under consideration violates no right of the appellant, grants him the full relief to which he was entitled at the time such decree was entered, and was, indeed, in entire accord with his rights as a stakeholder, which was the position he himself took before the court by his bill of review. For the court to allow the appellant to use the action of the court, in allowing the bill of review to be filed as a ground for withholding the payment of the purchase money past due and payable, would be to allow the appellant to impugn his own good faith in seeking to file the bill of review.

Without passing upon the sufficiency of the bill of review with respect to the well-understood essential requisites of such a bill, since no objection as to such particulars is urged before us, and confining our holding to the points aforesaid raised by the assignments of error before us, we are of opinion that there was no error in the decree of November 22, 1920.

As to both decrees under review, therefore, the case will be
Affirmed.

OLD NAT. BANK OF WAUPACA v. PEOPLE'S BANK OF HARRISVILLE.
(No. 4267.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers §58—One discounting sight draft and receiving therewith bill of lading acquires special property in the goods to secure the draft.

A party discounting a sight draft and receiving therewith a bill of lading for the goods, against the purchase price of which the draft is drawn, acquires a special property in such goods, and has a complete right to have them held as security for the payment of the draft.

2. Carriers §58—Bank discounting draft with bill of lading is not answerable for consignor's performance, in absence of bad faith.

A bank which discounts a draft with bill of lading attached is not, in the absence of bad faith, answerable to the drawee for the performance of the consignor's contract.

3. Carriers §59—Buyer waiving inspection, upon later rejecting goods, may not recover from assignee of draft with bill of lading attached.

A consignee of goods, who is required to pay for the same before delivery, is entitled to inspect the goods before receiving the same and paying therefor. He may waive this right, however, by paying for the goods and receiving them before such inspection, and in case he does so he cannot, upon later deciding to reject the goods, require repayment of his money to him from a bank who is the assignee in good faith of a draft for the purchase money with bill of lading attached. His remedy, after paying the draft and receiving the goods, is an action against the seller for damages.

4. Banks and banking §169—Correspondent bank may not deliver bill of lading to consignee on payment of attached draft on condition of repayment on rejection unless so authorized by assignee bank.

A bank which discounts a sight draft for the purchase price of goods, with a bill of lading attached, is entitled to recover the amount of such draft from a correspondent bank to which it is sent for collection, where it is shown that such correspondent bank delivers such draft and bill of lading to the consignee upon deposit with it of the amount of the draft, who, in turn, surrenders such bill of lading to the carrier and receives the goods, even though it appear that the correspondent bank delivered the bill of lading with the understanding that the consignee might have his money back if he determined to reject the goods. Such correspondent bank has no authority to deliver such bill of lading upon such conditions, unless it is specifically authorized to do so by the assignee bank.

Error to Circuit Court, Ritchie County.

Action by the Old National Bank of Waupaca against the People's Bank of Harrisville. Directed verdict for defendant, and judgment of nil capiat, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

Merrick & Smith, of Parkersburg, for plaintiff in error.

Adams & Cooper and S. O. Prunty, both of Harrisville, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. The plaintiff brought this suit for the purpose of recovering the amount of a draft drawn by Leonard, Crossett & Riley upon R. C. Marshall, to which was attached a bill of lading for a carload of potatoes, which draft had been indorsed, together with the bill of lading, to the plaintiff, and by it sent to the defendant for collection. A trial in the court below resulted in a directed verdict in favor of the defendant, and a judgment of nil capiat thereon, to review which this writ of error is prosecuted.

The facts out of which this controversy grew are that, on the 4th day of October, 1918, Leonard, Crossett & Riley, pursuant to an order received by them from R. C. Marshall, shipped from Waupaca, Wis., a carload of potatoes to Cairo, W. Va., consigned to their own order, with instructions to notify R. C. Marshall, and at the time of shipment of this carload of potatoes received from the carrier a bill of lading showing the consignment aforesaid. On the 7th of October Leonard, Crossett & Riley drew a sight draft on the said R. C. Marshall for the sum of $856.64, the purchase price of the potatoes, and attached to this draft the said bill of lading. This draft, with the bill of lading attached, was transferred or assigned to the plaintiff bank upon full payment therefor, and it forwarded the same, with the bill of lading attached, through the Marine Bank of Milwaukee, Wis., to the defendant bank at Harrisville for collection. Not having received a remittance from the defendant bank to cover this draft, the plaintiff bank, on the 24th day of October, telegraphed to the defendant stating that it was advised that the draft had been paid, and requested that the amount be remitted. To this telegram the defendant replied by a letter dated the 24th day of October, in which it made a statement at some length as to the facts as represented to it. It advised the plaintiff bank that, upon the arrival of the carload of potatoes at Cairo, Mr. Marshall telephoned to it that the railroad agent would not permit inspection except upon production of the bill of lading, and that he, Marshall, accordingly remitted to it the amount of the draft, and had the bill of lading forwarded to him by mail, together with the draft, in order that he might inspect the potatoes; that after inspecting them he returned the draft with a letter dated October 15th, stating that the potatoes were refused for the reason that the same were not satisfactory. The railroad agent declined to return the bill of lading, it having been surrendered to the carrier by Marshall, so that he was unable to return it to the bank. The defendant advised that, under the circumstances, it had decided to keep the money which was in its possession until the rights of the parties thereto were determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, and this suit resulted. What became of the carload of potatoes does not appear. As to whether or not the potatoes were of inferior quality, and were for that reason rejected, does not appear in the record, except from statements contained in the letter from the cashier of the defendant to the plaintiff, and these statements purport to be made by him upon information derived from the purchaser and the county food administrator, and the rejection of the potatoes appears only in the same way. The court below, however, evidently treated this as proof, and the parties upon this hearing likewise considered these facts as sufficiently proven by the introduction of the aforesaid letter by the plaintiff. The question thus presented is purely one of law.

[1] It is very well established that, where the consignee of goods discounts a sight draft representing the purchase price thereof, to which draft is attached a bill of lading, the holder of this draft has a property in the goods, and is entitled to have the same held by the carrier until he surrenders the bill of lading. Neill & Ellingham v. Produce Co., 41 W. Va. 37, 23 S. E. 702. The bill of lading is in the nature of a muniment of title, the holder of it being entitled to demand possession of the goods shipped when they reach their destination, and the carrier being relieved of liability on account of the carriage of said goods when it delivers the same to the holder of such bill of lading.

[3] That Marshall had a right to inspect these goods before receiving them is true. The bill of lading provided for this inspection, and whether it did or not he would be entitled to make it before receiving the goods. 10 C. J. 253. The railroad company did not have the right to require the surrender of this bill of lading before permitting inspection of the goods. It might be proper for the carrier's agent to require that the bank holding the bill of lading direct him to permit inspection simply for the purpose of knowing that the party making such inspection was authorized thereto by the holder of the bill of lading. The defendant bank, when it received this draft, was acting as an agent of the plaintiff. Its authority in the premises was limited to collecting the draft and delivering it with the bill of lading attached to Marshall, or returning it with the bill of lading attached upon refusal of the purchaser to pay the same. It could not deliver the bill of lading to him upon any conditions or under any agreement that it should be returned and the money repaid should he thereafter be dissatisfied with the goods. To hold that Marshall could pay this draft as he did, and upon discovering that the goods did not comply with the seller's warranty, demand his money back, would be in effect holding that the assignee of the draft with the bill of lading attached was liable to answer for the quality of the goods, while it is held with practical uniformity in this country that under such circumstances the purchaser's remedy is against the seller, and the assignee of the draft with the bill of lading attached cannot be held for a failure in quality or a breach of warranty. Cosmos Cotton Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Birmingham, 171 Ala. 392, 54 So. 621, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1173, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 42; Central Mercantile Co. v. Oklahoma State Bank, 83 Kan. 504, 112 Pac. 114, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 954; Hawkins v. Alfalfa Products Co., 152 Ky. 152, 153 S. W. 201, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 600; Springs v. Hanover Nat. Bank, 209 N. Y. 224, 103 N. E. 156, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 241.

[2, 4] These authorities clearly establish the doctrine in this country that the bank which discounts a draft with a bill of lading attached is not, in the absence of bad faith on its part, answerable to the drawee for the performance by the assignor of the contract. It is quite true, as before stated, that Marshall was entitled to inspect these goods before receiving them. This is a right, however, that he was not required to exercise. He could pay the draft and take up the bill of lading if he desired, and rely upon the seller's warranty to protect him. This right of inspection he must exercise seasonably. He could not pay off the draft and deliver the bill of lading to the carrier, and then demand his money back upon finding that the goods did not meet his expectations. When the defendant bank delivered the bill of lading to him, it passed the title to the goods, and the title to the money passed to the plaintiff bank, and when Marshall delivered this draft to the carrier's agent, and accepted the carload of goods, he cannot be said to have accepted it for any qualified purpose, for, by delivering the bill of lading to the carrier, he discharged the carrier of liability in connection with the carriage of the shipment, and received to himself not only the title, but the possession of the property. When a bank receives a draft with a bill of lading attached, as did the defendant bank in this case, it makes itself liable to the owner of the draft if it delivers the bill of lading to the assignee without requiring payment of the draft; and likewise if it does require such payment before delivery of the bill of lading, it cannot withhold the money it thus collects from the party for whom it undertook to collect it.

The stability of commercial transactions of this character requires that the rights of the parties thereto be definitely and certainly fixed at each stage of the proceeding, and not dependent on any whim or caprice of either party. Every act done must have attached to it a definite and certain meaning and effect, regardless of what may have been the intention of either party. When Marshall, upon the refusal of the railway company's agent to permit him to examine the goods, paid this draft and surrendered the bill of lading to the carrier's agent, he became vested with the full title in the property. He waived his right to have an inspection of the goods before acceptance, and he cannot, after having waived the same, subsequently rely upon it. The doctrine of the liability of a bank, standing in the position of the defendant in this case, to the holder of a draft, for an unauthorized delivery of a bill of lading attached thereto, is fully recognized by the authorities. Michie on Banks and Banking, § 161, p. 1401; Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Ry. Co. v. North Texas Grain Co., 32 Tex. Civ. App. 93, 74 S. W. 567; Bank v. Cummings, 89 Tenn. 609, 18 S. W. 115, 24 Am. St. Rep. 618; Hobbs & Tucker v. Chicago Packing & Provision Co., 98 Ga. 576, 25 S. E. 584, 58 Am. St. Rep. 320. We are of opinion that the money now in the possession of the defendant bank is the property of the plaintiff, and that it had the right to maintain this suit to recover the same upon refusal of the defendant to pay it over.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HATFIELD v. HATFIELD et al. (No. 4140.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 4, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Fraudulent conveyances  $\S$ 259(1)—Bill to annul fraudulent deed, made to defeat judgment lien, held sufficient.

A bill to set aside and annul a voluntary and fraudulent deed, which charges with reasonable certainty a live judgment, in favor of plaintiff and against the grantor, rendered prior to such deed, and that in order to defeat the collection thereof the grantor and grantee and those holding under him combined and conspired together, and executed and recorded such deed, without any consideration therefor deemed valuable in law, and which bill prays that such deed be annulled in so far as plaintiff's judgment is concerned, and the real estate sold in satisfaction thereof, and for general relief, is sufficient, and a demurrer thereto should be overruled.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Action by Evaline Hatfield against Boyd Hatfield and others. Demurrer to bill sustained, and decree entered dismissing bill. Plaintiff appeals. Decree reversed, demurrer overruled, and cause remanded.

Stafford & Rhodes, of Williamson, for appellant.

LIVELY, J. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to, and dismissed, the plaintiff's bill, and she prosecutes this appeal.

The only question here is upon the sufficiency of the bill. The bill avers that plaintiff, in a suit for divorce which she instituted against defendant Boyd Hatfield in the year 1917, obtained a decretal judgment against him for alimony and suit money amounting to the sum of $386, which has not been paid; that while she and defendant Boyd Hatfield were living together as husband and wife they jointly purchased three lots, Nos. 56, 57, and 58, in what is known as West Williamson, and that she and her husband paid for and owned the same jointly, each having paid one-half the purchase money therefor, and each owning a one-half undivided interest therein; and that the deeds for lots 56 and 57 were made to them jointly by the owner of the property from whom they purchased, but, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, her husband procured a deed or contract for lot 58 to be made to himself, and had the same duly recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of Mingo county, a copy of which deed is offered as an exhibit therewith. The amount paid by them for lot 58 was $250, and on these lots they built a dwelling house, which was insured, and afterwards destroyed by fire, together with all the household and kitchen furniture therein. The bill further charges that, soon after the decree for alimony and suit money was entered against the defendant, her husband, he left the state of West Virginia and became a nonresident thereof; that after the divorce decree was entered, and after her decretal judgments were obtained, Boyd Hatfield, her former husband, conveyed the house and lots to defendant, Isom Blackburn, and transferred to him the insurance policy thereon, in both of which, the real property and the insurance, plaintiff had a one-half undivided interest, and that Isom Blackburn very soon thereafter conveyed the interest he had obtained from Boyd Hatfield to defendant York Hatfield; and the deeds are offered as exhibits. It is charged that York Hatfield, is a brother of defendant Boyd Hatfield, her former husband, and that defendant Isom Blackburn is an uncle of Boyd Hatfield, and the bill avers and charges that the conveyance from Boyd Hatfield to Isom Blackburn was voluntary and without any consideration valuable in law, as was also the conveyance from Blackburn to York Hatfield, and that each of said conveyances was fraudulent, and was made for the purpose of defrauding and preventing her in the collection of her said debt against Boyd Hatfield, and that defendants Isom Blackburn and York Hatfield, at the time the conveyances to them were made, knew that they were made for the sole and exclusive purpose of preventing the plaintiff from collecting her debt, and to put the property described beyond her reach, and that all of the defendants had full knowledge of the existence of plaintiff's debt. It is also charged that the transfer of the insurance was voluntary and fraudulent, and was for the purpose of preventing her from collecting her debt; that Isom Blackburn collected the insurance, amounting to $275, and that Boyd Hatfield collected the insurance on the household and kitchen furniture, amounting to $200, in which he was interested to the amount of one-half thereof. The amount of indebtedness which plaintiff claimed against defendant Boyd Hatfield, composed of her judgment for alimony and suit money in the divorce suit, and the one-half interest which she claims in the insurance money, amounts to $623.50. The prayer is that a decree may be entered setting aside, vacating, and holding for naught the conveyances which were executed by Boyd Hatfield to Isom Blackburn, and from Isom Blackburn to York Hatfield, as to the plaintiff's debt, and that the assignment of the insurance policy be set aside and held for naught as to plaintiff's debt, and that the one-half undivided interest in the real estate described, being the amount owned by Boyd Hatfield, be made subject to her debt and sold in satisfaction thereof, and for general relief.

While the bill is inaptly drawn, and the allegations therein are somewhat indefinite, it is reasonably clearly alleged therein that the plaintiff has a judgment against defendant Boyd Hatfield, and that at the time the judgment was rendered Boyd Hatfield was the owner of a one-half undivided interest in lots 56 and 57, and had the legal title to lot No. 58, in West Williamson, in Mingo county, at least a one-half interest in lot 58, and that, in order to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiff in the collection of her said debt, he conveyed his interest in said lots to his uncle, who, in his turn, conveyed the same to defendant York Hatfield, who is a brother of defendant Boyd Hatfield, her former husband; that such conveyances were made with the intent aforesaid, and with full knowledge of the other defendants, and that they participated therein; that the consideration moving in these conveyances was not valuable; and that all of these three defendants combined and conspired together to hinder, delay, and defraud her in the collection of her judgment. These allegations, if they be true, and on demurrer we must consider them to be true, are sufficient to justify a decree setting aside these fraudulent conveyances and subjecting the subject-matter thereof to the payment of the judgment. For the purposes of this appeal it is not necessary to pass upon the question whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to any of the insurance on the house and furniture. It is not perceived on what theory the circuit court sustained the demurrer. None is suggested in the record; and no appearance is made on behalf of the appellees. It may be that Boyd Hatfield has other property subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and which would be ample to pay the claim of plaintiff, and which is unincumbered and readily accessible to her demands, and that the court perceived no necessity in proceeding against the lots in question for that reason; but we cannot go out of the record. The conveyance is charged to be without consideration and fraudulent. Under the statute such conveyances are fraudulent per se. It reads:

"Every gift, conveyance, assignment, transfer or charge which is not upon consideration deemed valuable in law, shall be void, as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made," etc.

Plaintiff's right to maintain this suit under the allegations of her bill is so well settled by our decisions that we do not deem it necessary to refer to any of them.

We reverse the decree, overrule the demurrer, and remand the cause.

Decree reversed, demurrer overruled, and cause remanded.

WILBON v. BARNES et al. (No. 249.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

Appeal and error  $\S$  1002—Finding of jury held conclusive on question of agency.

In action for personal injuries against partners, defended by one partner on the ground that the other partner was an independent contractor for the work in which the injury occurred, a finding of the jury, on conflicting evidence, that driver of a motor truck was the agent of both partners, is conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Connor, Judge.

Action by J. W. Wilbon against George W. Howard and J. B. Barnes. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Barnes appeals. No error.

Civil action instituted by J. W. Wilbon against George W. Howard and J. B. Barnes to recover damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff in a collision between a buggy in which he was riding and an automobile truck driven at the time by one Bill Lawrence.

The defendant J. B. Barnes alone appeals from the judgment below, and the sole question presented is whether or not the driver of the truck, admittedly the agent of Howard, was also the agent of the appellant at the time of the injury. Howard & Barnes were partners in the business of buying and selling tobacco, but it is contended that Howard alone was responsible for the hauling of the tobacco, and that, with respect to this work, he was an independent contractor in his relations to the partnership firm.

Upon the single or dual agency of the driver, the evidence was conflicting, and the question was therefore submitted to the jury, with the following result:

"(1) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendants, or of either of them, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) If so, did plaintiff by his own negligence contribute to his injury as alleged in the answer? Answer: No.

"(3) Was the driver of the truck the agent of both defendants, as partners, at the time plaintiff received the injuries, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(4) What sum, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendants, or either of them, as damages? Answer: $4,500."

From a judgment on the verdict in favor of plaintiff and against both defendants, the defendant J. B. Barnes appealed.

J. R. Baggett, of Lillington, and Manning, Bickett & Ferguson, of Raleigh, for appellant.

Douglass & Douglass, of Raleigh, for appellee.

STACY, J. Counsel for appellant in this case have filed an interesting and elaborate brief, with citation of authorities, in support of the position that a member of a co-partnership may become an independent contractor, with respect to a given piece of work, in his relation to the partnership firm of which he is a member. Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Campbell, 116 Ill. App. 322, and Burns v. Michigan Paint Co., 152 Mich. 618, 116 N. W. 182, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 816, and note. It is contended that such was the position of Howard in hauling the tobacco, the partnership extending only to the buying and selling of the tobacco; and that he alone should be held liable for the negligence of the truck driver who was engaged in this work at the time of the plaintiff's injury. There was evidence pro and con on this point, but we think it is settled by the jury's answer to the third issue. The crucial fact has been found against the appellant's contention. Hence the legal questions debated before us do not seem to be presented on the record.

We have found no error, and the judgment below will be upheld.

No error.

STATE v. BYNUM. (No. 323.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

Criminal law  $\S$  1156(2)—Refusal to set aside verdict as contrary to weight of evidence not disturbed.

Lower court's refusal to set aside verdict as contrary to the weight of the evidence will not be disturbed by Supreme Court on appeal; such matter being within the sound discretion of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Daniels, Judge.

Hilliard Bynum was convicted of perjury, and he appeals assigning for error:

(1) For that his honor declined to set aside the verdict as contrary to the weight of the evidence.

(2) For that his honor entered judgment on the verdict. No error.

R. O. Everett, of Durham, for appellant. James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. The bill of indictment, the verdict, and judgment are formally correct, and, the only exception to the validity of the trial being on a matter in the sound discretion of the court we must affirm the judgment. The defendant was without the benefit of counsel in the court below, and for the reasons stated we are not at liberty to consider the positions so forcibly urged in his behalf in the argument here.

On the record, while it was entirely proper to submit the case to the jury, we find very little in the testimony to justify a conviction of wilful and corrupt perjury, and we deem it no impropriety to suggest that the facts as now presented to us would seem to justify a petition for executive clemency. We are confirmed in the view by the further fact that the careful, considerate, and able judge who tried the cause has imposed the minimum punishment allowed by the law for an offense of this kind.

No error.

STATE v. BRADSHAW. (No. 321.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

Prostitution ⇨4—Evidence held insufficient to prove guilt.

In a prosecution for prostitution, evidence held insufficient to bring defendant within the definition of prostitution or assignation in O. S. § 4357 et seq.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; Horton, Judge.

Clem Bradshaw was convicted of prostitution, and he appeals. Reversed.

Criminal prosecution tried upon an indictment charging the defendant with having engaged in immoral prostitution and unlawfully using a building for like purpose in violation of the statute. The defendant offered no evidence, but moved to dismiss the action or for judgment as of nonsuit under the Mason Act (chapter 73, Public Laws 1913). Motion overruled, and defendant excepted. From a verdict of guilty, and judgment of nine months on the roads, pronounced thereon, the defendant appealed.

The evidence was that defendant and another man, with two women, hired an automobile, in which they were driven to another town, where they arrived about 8 p. m., that the sheriff went to the back of the office of a tire company in such town about 10 p. m., found the building dark, knocked, pulled back the window curtain, and threw the light from his flashlight into the room, where he saw defendant and one of the women sitting four or five feet apart on separate chairs, fully dressed; that defendant stated he had entered the office to use the telephone with the permission of the owner, who, he said, would soon return; and that the character of the woman was good.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. The following is the whole of the state's brief:

"The defendant was tried and convicted at the June term, 1921, of the Alamance superior court, Hon. J. Lloyd Horton, presiding, of prostitution as defined in section 4357 et seq. of the Consolidated Statutes.

"Without analyzing the evidence, we think it is not sufficient to justify the verdict. It does not, we submit, bring defendant within the plain definition of prostitution or of assignation as contained in section 4357."

For the reasons assigned by the Attorney General, we think the defendant's motion for judgment as of nonsuit should have been allowed.

Reversed.

(182 N. C. 260)

THOMPSON et al. v. TOWN OF LUMBERTON. (No. 291.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Injunction ⇨85(2)—Enforcement of ordinance cannot be restrained.

Injunction does not lie to restrain the enforcement of an alleged invalid town ordinance.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨120—Intention in enacting ordinance to be ascertained only from the ordinance itself.

That the intention of the board of commissioners of a town in enacting an ordinance licensing and regulating automobiles was to levy a tax, and not to provide a police regulation, cannot be shown by extrinsic evidence, but the intention can be ascertained only from the face of the ordinance.

3. Licenses ⇨30—Injunction not granted against automobile licensing ordinance enforcement, although ordinance partly a tax measure.

Even though automobile licensing ordinance was enacted for the purpose both of regulating automobiles and to lay a license tax upon those not used for hire, an injunction will not lie against the levy of the tax, since the ordinance is at least in part a police regulation.

4. Licenses ⇨7(9)—Automobile licensing ordinance held valid.

Under municipal charter re-enacted and amended by Laws 1907, c. 343, §§ 45, 46, authorizing ordinances to secure peace and good order and prevent disturbances and disorderly conduct, held that a town could validly enact an automobile licensing ordinance providing for a fee of $5; such ordinance not being in conflict with any statute, and being reasonable, under Revenue Act of 1919 (Pub. Laws 1919, c. 189, § 5), as amended by Pub. Laws 1921, c. 2, § 29.

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Kerr, Judge.

Suit by W. O. Thompson and others against the Town of Lumberton. From judgment for plaintiffs granting a temporary injunction, defendant appeals. Judgment reversed, and action dismissed.

The commissioners of the town of Lumberton adopted the following ordinance:

"Section 1. No person or persons residing within the corporate limits of the town of Lumberton shall be allowed to operate a motor vehicle within said town until he shall have been granted license as a chauffeur or driver, as provided by this ordinance.

"Sec. 2. Every person desiring to operate a motor vehicle within the town of Lumberton shall file written application with the town clerk and treasurer, accompanied by a certificate signed by two reputable, disinterested citizens, certifying that said applicant is of good moral character, and that in their opinion has sufficient knowledge of motor vehicles and sufficient experience and training as a chauffeur or driver to enable said applicant to safely operate the same, and that applicant is at least sixteen years of age. If said certificate is sufficient to satisfy said town clerk and treasurer that the applicant is qualified he shall, upon payment of the fees as herein-after provided, issue a license, authorizing the applicant to operate motor vehicles within said town of Lumberton. If the certificate or other accompanying evidence does not satisfy said town clerk or treasurer that said applicant is qualified and entitled to a chauffeur's or driver's license, he may decline to grant the same, and it shall be his duty in such cases to file the said application and present it at the next meeting of the board of commissioners of said town, at which time the said board may either grant or refuse said license, as they may deem proper; provided that until the meeting of the town board applicant shall be allowed to operate his motor vehicle in the same manner as if said license had been granted.

"Sec. 3. A fee of $5.00 shall be paid by each applicant to cover the costs and fees of investigating the qualifications of the applicant for driver's or chauffeur's license and the expense of granting the same. The said license shall expire on June 30, 1922, but the same may be renewed from year to year by complying with the provisions of this ordinance. If as much as half of the fiscal year has expired at the time of application for license, then only one-half of the foregoing license fees shall be charged.

"Sec. 4. That every person violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined the sum of $25 for each and every offense.

"Sec. 5. That this ordinance shall become effective on June 30, 1921."

At the instance of the plaintiffs, taxpayers, a temporary injunction was issued and continued to the hearing.

Johnson & Johnson, of Lumberton, for appellant.

McIntyre, Lawrence & Proctor, of Lumberton, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. [1] An injunction does not lie to restrain the enforcement of an alleged invalid town ordinance. It has been uniformly held that equitable relief will not be granted in cases where there is an adequate and effectual remedy at law. Busbee v. Macey, 85 N. C. 329. It has also been uniformly held that an injunction will not be granted to restrain the enforcement of the criminal law except when it is necessary to prevent irrevocable injury or destruction of property or to protect the defendant from oppressive and vexatious litigation. In the latter case the courts will grant an injunction only after the controverted right has been determined in favor of the defendant in a previous action.

Every violation of a town ordinance is by statute a misdemeanor, and if the courts should issue an injunction against the enforcement of an ordinance, it would be an interference with the administration of the criminal law. When the defendant is put on trial for violation of the ordinance, he has full opportunity to test its validity. This has been often presented to the court, and the decisions are so clear and uniform as to leave the matter no longer debatable.

In Cohen v. Goldsboro, 77 N. C. 3, that town had adopted an ordinance forbidding the sale of fresh meat except under restrictions prescribed in the ordinance. The defendants were arrested and fined for its violation and as a result were forced to suspend their business. They sought to restrain the enforcement of the ordinance, and Reade, J., said:

"If the defendants have an unlawful ordinance, and have arrested and fined the plaintiffs, as they allege, the plaintiffs have complete redress in an action for damages. And as often as the arrest may be repeated they have the like redress; but we are aware of no principle or precedent for the interposition of a court of equity in such cases. The injunction is dissolved, and the case dismissed."

To this we might add that the defendant could set up the defense of the invalidity of the ordinance when arrested and put on trial and has the right of appeal should the matter be decided against him.

In Wardens v. Washington, 109 N. C. 21, 13 S. E. 700, an injunction was sought against the enforcement of an ordinance prohibiting the burial of the dead within the corporate limits of that town, except upon a permit from the town clerk, which could be given only upon a prescribed certificate from the attendant physician, and violation of the ordinance was made punishable by a fine of $50. The court refused to pass upon the validity of the ordinance, or restrain its enforcement, saying:

"It is unnecessary, however, that we pass upon the question * * * as to the power of the Legislature to authorize or to validate the ordinance in the exercise of the police power inherent in the state, for we have an express authority, if one were needed, that an injunction does not lie to prevent the enforcement of an alleged unlawful town ordinance"

—adding that the plaintiff had his remedy by an action for damages, and saying further:

"If the plaintiffs, or any one else, should violate the ordinance, upon a criminal prosecution for such violation the validity of the ordinance, and of the acts of the Legislature authorizing and validating it, would come directly and properly before the courts."

The same question was again presented in Scott v. Smith, 121 N. C. 94, 28 S. E. 64, where the ordinance sought to be enjoined made it unlawful to play baseball in town without the mayor's permission. The court said:

"If the ordinance is lawful and valid, as insisted by the defendants, the plaintiff has no cause of complaint and can maintain no form of civil action. If it is void, as insisted by the plaintiff, then he has misconceived his remedy, for a court of equity will not interpose when the plaintiff has a remedy at law by civil action for damages, in which, and in a criminal action also, the validity of the ordinance would be presented."

In Vickers v. Durham, 132 N. C. 880, 44 S. E. 685, the ordinance was attacked upon the ground that the statute under which the city proposed to condemn the plaintiff's land was unconstitutional. The court refused to sustain the injunction for the reason that the plaintiff had his remedy at law.

In Paul v. Washington, 134 N. C. 369, 47 S. E. 793, 65 L. R. A. 902, the plaintiff undertook to distinguish his case from the principles above cited upon the ground that he had no adequate remedy at law because of the well-settled doctrine that municipal corporations are not liable for torts committed by their officers when undertaking to enforce unconstitutional and void ordinances enacted in the attempted exercise of the police power, and also because the policeman who arrested the plaintiff was insolvent, and contended that, since neither the town nor its policemen could be held responsible in damages, the plaintiffs had no remedy except by injunction. On this the court ruled that the law had been correctly laid down in the above cases, and that an injunction was not the remedy to test the validity of a municipal ordinance.

In State v. Railroad, 145 N. C. 521, 59 S. E. 570, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 966, in which the whole matter was fully considered, the court held that it is well settled, both in England and in America, that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to interfere with by injunction or to restrain a criminal prosecution whether the prosecution be for the violation of a statute, or for an infraction of a municipal ordinance, and that this rule applies whether the prosecution is by indictment or by summary process and whether it has been merely threatened or has already been commenced.

[2] The plaintiff contends, however, that the intention of the board of commissioners in enacting said ordinance was to levy a tax, and not to provide a police regulation, but the intention can be ascertained only from the face of the ordinance itself. It has been uniformly held, without a dissent, that evidence cannot be received to explain or qualify an act of the General Assembly, and even a member of that body will not be permitted to aid the court by testifying as to the purpose of the governing body in enacting the statute. This would seem to apply equally to the passage of an ordinance by the law-making body of a town.

[3] The court found as a fact that this ordinance was enacted both for the purpose of regulating automobiles and to lay a license tax upon those not used for hire, and the plaintiffs contend, therefore, that an injunction will lie against the levy of the tax. But, if this finding of fact were adopted by us, still, the ordinance being in part a police regulation, the injunction would not lie.

[4] In view of the vast number of automobiles and the great danger from lack of adequate supervision in cities and towns, both from the danger of collisions and to pedestrians and to the morals of the community, there is hardly any subject which more imperatively demands the exercise of the police power. Last year in this country there were 92,000 injuries and deaths sustained in the operation of automobiles. This is an aggregate of casualties in a year nearly double that sustained by this country during the entire duration of the World War.

The ordinance in this case is not in conflict with any statute, and is authorized under the general provisions of the defendant's charter and is reasonable. The charter of defendant's town as re-enacted and amended by chapter 343, Laws 1907, contains sections 45 and 46, as follows:

"Sec. 45. Said mayor and board of commissioners shall have power to enact such rules, regulations, ordinances and by-laws as they may deem necessary to secure the peace and good government of said town, and to enforce the same by imprisonment, fine or penalty, and the ordinances enacted by said board, with the pains and penalties pertaining thereto, may be enforced within the corporate limits of the said town and for one mile beyond and around said corporate limits.

"Sec. 46. Said mayor and board of commissioners, in addition to the powers which they possess by law and which are conferred upon them by this charter, shall particularly have power to enact ordinances and to enforce same by imprisonment, fine or penalty, as follows: "To prevent vice and immorality; to preserve public peace and good order; to prevent and quell riots, disturbances * * * and disorderly conduct."

Without elaborating the instances in which the uncontrolled and unrestrained operation of automobiles would violate the public peace and good order and might tend to promote vice and immorality and increase disorderly conduct, it is clear that the defendant is authorized by its charter to pass this ordinance.

The plaintiff was doubtless relying upon the decision in State v. Fink, 179 N. O. 714, 103 S. E. 16, which held that under the Revenue Act of 1919 (Pub. Laws 1919, c. 189, § 5) the provision prohibiting cities and towns from charging any license fee for driving or operating automobiles greater than such tax was void. That decision was correct and compelled by the language of the Revenue Act of 1919, but the General Assembly in 1921 (Pub. Laws 1921, c. 2, § 29) added the following provisos to the section construed in State v. Fink:

"Provided, nothing herein shall prevent the governing authorities of any city from regulating, licensing, controlling of chauffeurs and drivers of any such car or vehicle, and charging a reasonable fee," and "Provided further, that any city or town may charge a license not to exceed $50 for any motor vehicle used in transporting persons or property for hire in lieu of all other charges, fees, and licenses now charged."

The effect of this amendment was to authorize the city to regulate and control the conduct of chauffeurs of automobiles and the drivers of all other vehicles and to impose a reasonable license fee, which we deem was not exceeded by the requirements of the payment of a license tax of $5. Even if this ordinance were enacted solely as a revenue measure, $5 is not an unreasonable amount to be levied as a tax and license fee on pleasure or other motor vehicles when $50 is authorized as a tax upon those motors engaged in transportation for hire.

Inasmuch as an injunction does not lie to test the validity of a town ordinance, we not only reverse the judgment, but must dismiss the action.

Action dismissed.

BROOKS v. ORANGE RICE MILL CO.
(No. 290.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Garnishment  $\S$  220—Trial  $\S$  234(3)—In proceeding to subject the proceeds of a draft to a debt, intervenor's ownership held a question for the jury.

In an action in which the proceeds of a draft were attached, an intervenor, claiming the proceeds as purchaser for value, evidence of intervenor held sufficiently equivocal, if not contradictory, to require a finding by the jury, and an instruction that, if the jury believed the evidence, they should find for intervenor, practically amounted to a direction of verdict, and was erroneous.

2. Bills and notes  $\S$  363—Payer of draft purchased for value holds absolute right in proceeds.

Where one holds a draft as a purchaser for value, the proceeds therefrom cannot be attached, in the hands of a garnishee trust company, for debt of the drawer.

3. Trial  $\S$  234(3)—An instruction that if the jury believe the evidence is inexact.

An instruction "if you believe the evidence testified to by the witness in the case" to find for claimant is inexact.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by J. W. Brooks against the Orange Rice Mill Company, in which the Orange National Bank intervened as claimant of the attached property. Judgment for intervenor, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Plaintiff, a citizen of this state, having a cause of action against Orange Rice Mill Company, a foreign resident corporation, instituted this suit in the superior court of New Hanover county, and sought to obtain service upon the defendant by attaching the proceeds of a certain draft in the hands of the American Bank & Trust Company of Wilmington, N. C.; it being alleged that said funds belong to the defendant. Thereafter, on March 29, 1920, the Orange National Bank, of Orange, Tex., was allowed to intervene and set up its claim of title to the proceeds of said draft. The cause then came on for trial upon the issue of ownership raised by the interpleader. There was evidence tending to show that the draft in question had been purchased by the Orange National Bank and that it alone was interested in its collection. But on cross-examination the cashier of the intervening bank testified as follows:

"We accepted this draft at the rate of 6 per cent. discount. No notation was made on the face of the draft to that effect. It was not the policy of our bank at this time to accept this draft with bill of lading attached at 6 per cent. discount, and treat the paper as cash, and become the absolute purchaser of it, releasing the Rice Mill from liability for nonpayment, with the possibility of losing the amount, or even the discount; if for any reason the goods were refused and the draft returned, the Rice Mill would take it up. We did not unconditionally release the Rice Mill when the draft was cashed. As I stated, in case of goods refused or draft returned, the Rice Mill Company would reimburse us. We bought it outright with that exception. The bank was to accept and discount drafts with bill of lading attached on parties against whom they were drawn, and to charge 6 per cent. interest on such drafts until paid and the funds placed in the bank's hands. The discount and the interest were the obligations of the Orange Rice Mill Company. In the event the American Bank & Trust Company does not pay this draft, we would not look to the Rice Mill Company to reimburse us to the extent it was not paid."

Witness was then asked, "Would you release the Rice Mill Company from all obligations in connection with Heyer Bros. transaction?" to which the witness answered, "Yes, legally."

At the close of the evidence, his honor charged the jury that "if they believed the evidence, testified to by the witness in the case," they would answer the issue in favor of the intervenor. Plaintiff appealed.

Robert Ruark and Wm. B. Campbell, both of Wilmington, for appellant.

Rountree & Davis, of Wilmington, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] We think the evidence upon the issue as to whether the intervening bank was an agent for collecting the draft in question, or a purchaser thereof for value, was sufficiently equivocal, if not contradictory, to require a finding by the jury, and that his honor's charge, which practically amounted to a direction of the verdict, was erroneous.

[2] Of course, if the intervenor held the draft as a purchaser for value, the proceeds derived therefrom could not be attached in the hands of the American Bank & Trust Company as the property of the Orange Rice Mill Company; but, on the other hand, if the intervenor acted merely as a collecting agent, the proceeds would belong to the defendant, and consequently they would be subject to attachment in the hands of the garnishee trust company. Worth Co. v. Feed Co., 172 N. C. 335, 90 S. E. 295; Markham-Stephens Co. v. Richmond Co., 177 N. C. 364, 99 S. E. 17.

[3] The plaintiff also excepts to the form of expression, "if you believe the evidence, testified to by the witness in the case," employed by his honor in charging the jury. This language is inexact, and while, in proper instances, it will not be held for reversible error, and should not be, unless the objecting party has in some way been prejudiced thereby, yet this court has taken occasion, in a number of cases, to say that a different form of expression is more desirable. Holt v. Wellons, 163 N. C. 124, 79 S. E. 450; State v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 508, 62 S. E. 1068; State v. Godwin, 145 N. C. 461, 59 S. E. 132, 122 Am. St. Rep. 467, and cases there cited; State v. Simmons, 143 N. C. 613, 56 S. E. 701; Merrell v. Dudley, 139 N. C. 59, 51 S. E. 777, and cases there cited; Sosamon v. Cruse, 133 N. C. 470, 45 S. E. 757.

For the error, as indicated, in directing a verdict on evidence from which different inferences may be drawn, we are of opinion that the cause must be submitted to another jury; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

STATE v. HAYWOOD. (No. 275.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §369(6)—Evidence of sales to others than person charged admissible.

Where defendant was charged in one count with unlawfully selling liquor, and in another with keeping liquor for sale, evidence of sales to others than the person named as purchaser in the first count held admissible under the second count.

2. Witnesses §414(2)—Evidence in corroboration of witness held competent.

In a prosecution for selling and keeping liquor for sale, statements of witnesses of prior declarations of another witness while on the stand and in corroboration of that witness held competent.

3. Witnesses §37(4)—Knowledge of general reputation essential qualification of witness as to good character.

In a prosecution for selling and keeping liquor for sale, evidence as to the good character of a witness for defendant could not be given by one who did not know the general reputation of the witness.

4. Intoxicating liquors §168—Both direct and indirect sales prohibited.

In a prosecution for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor, it is immaterial whether defendant sold the liquor directly to the person named as the purchaser, or indirectly through an agent.

5. Criminal law §1043(3)—Appellant confined to grounds of objection stated below.

An appellant must abide in the court of appeal by the ground of objection which was assigned at the trial, and cannot shift his ground or change his theory of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Kerr, Judge.

John Haywood was convicted of unlawfully selling and having liquor for sale, and he appeals. No error.

This is a criminal action, in which the defendant was charged in two counts of the indictment with, first, unlawfully selling liquor to A. T. Cooper, and, second, with unlawfully keeping liquor for sale, contrary to the statutes in such cases made and provided. He was convicted on the first two counts for selling and for having liquor for sale, and from the judgment he appealed.

E. G. Davis of Fayetteville, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). There was ample evidence to support the conviction of the defendant, who reserved several exceptions to the rulings of the court upon the evidence.

[1] The first four exceptions were directed to sales made to other persons than A. T. Cooper, the person named in the first count of the indictment, as the particular one to whom the sale was made. This testimony was competent and relevant as applicable to the second count, which charges the keeping of liquor for sale. The allegation therein could hardly be proven in any other way. Sales indiscriminately to any and every person who would buy is evidence, of course, of keeping liquor for sale. The defendant was thereby doing just what any man who is engaged in the forbidden act of keeping liquor for sale would do. He was the proprietor of a "grogshop," one of the great evils intended to be prohibited by the statute as demoralizing to the community and the prolific source of crime and many other evils.

The testimony offered by defendant, and the subject of his exceptions Nos. 5 and 6, was clearly irrelevant. The verdict of the jury could have no possible relation to the credibility of the witness, but, if so, the defendant got the benefit of it, as the witness testified that the verdict was contrary to his testimony in the case.

[2] Exceptions 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19 were to statements by witnesses of prior declarations of another witness, while on the stand, which were corroborative of that witness, and was so restricted by the court, or concerning sales of liquor to one Godwin, and this evidence was confined in its application to the second count as to keeping liquor for sale. It was manifestly competent and very relevant for that purpose.

[3] The exception No. 20 is entirely untenable. Irvin Simmons, a witness for the defendant, had testified substantially in contradiction of the state's witness A. T. Cooper as to the purchase of liquor by him from the defendant, and the latter attempted to support him by proving his good character, but this he failed in law to do, as the witness H. M. McKethan, whom he offered for this purpose did not know Simmons' general reputation, and his honor correctly held that he had not, therefore, been qualified to testify about it. State v. Perkins, 66 N. C. 126; State v. Gee, 92 N. C. 756.

[4, 5] It can make no difference whether the defendant sold the liquor directly to Cooper, or indirectly through an agent, or "go-between." The one act is just as bad as the other morally and legally. It comes most certainly within the prohibition of the statute. When Cooper stated, "I had another man to go and get it," he was testifying apparently to a fact within his own knowledge—a thing done by himself, and it was competent for him to do so. It was just as illegal for the defendant to sell to the witness' agent for him, as to sell directly to the witness. State v. Burchfield, 149 N. C. 537, 63 S. E. 89. But the specified ground of objection, upon his motion to strike out the answer above quoted, was that testimony of other sales of liquor by defendant was incompetent, but this, as we have said, is not the law so far as the second count of the indictment is concerned. It is contended by the defendant that this was evidence of a distinct substantive offense, and he cites State v. Shuford, 69 N. C. 486, as an authority directly in point, but it does not apply, as the evidence was not offered on the first count for the sale, but on the second count, charging that he kept liquor for sale and as to that count it was competent and admissible. An appellant is confined to the ground of objection to evidence which he first stated. He must abide in the court of appeal by the ground of objection which was assigned below at the trial, and not shift his ground or change his theory of the case. M. N. Nat. Bank v. Pack, 178 N. C. 388, and cases cited at page 390, 100 S. E. 615. This point of law decided in that case is not stated in the official headnote.

The testimony of Lacy Godwin was competent beyond any question. He was testifying that his father had sent him to defendant to buy liquor for him, and that he went and actually bought the liquor for his father. One of his answers was: "I went for the liquor twice at my father's request. I never bought it for myself, but for my father." He then stated: "It worked out that I paid him for it, and I did give him money—$5—and I got a quart of whisky." Learned counsel for the defendant contended in his brief that this testimony was prejudicial, and it was, but nevertheless was competent.

This is a case where the statute was palpably violated in any view of the facts, and, notwithstanding the very able and ingenious argument of the defendant's counsel, Mr. Davis, we are compelled to declare that no error was committed at the trial.

No error.

McGINNIS et al. v. RALEIGH TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION NO. 54 et al.
(No. 252.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

Injunction — 174—Continuance against labor unions till final hearing unauthorized.

Evidence, in action by employees and employers against labor unions and members, claiming interference with their work and business held not to warrant a continuance of temporary injunction till final hearing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Marguerite McGinnis and others against the Raleigh Typographical Union No. 54 and others. Temporary restraining order was continued till final hearing, and defendants appeal. Error.

Civil action to enjoin the defendants from certain alleged unlawful and wrongful practices.

The material allegations upon which the plaintiffs have come into equity and asked for injunctive relief are contained in the following paragraphs of the complaint:

"First. That the individual complainants above named are residents and citizens of the state of North Carolina, and are all engaged in doing work for the printing houses above named in the city of Raleigh, N. C.

"Second. That the printing houses above named are all corporations organized under the laws of the state of North Carolina, with their principal places of business in the city of Raleigh, N. C., with the exception of M. J. Carroll & Son, which is a copartnership, engaged in the printing business in the city of Raleigh, N. C.

"Third. That the Raleigh Typographical Union, the Raleigh Printing Pressmen's Union, and Raleigh Bookbinders Union are labor unions, with headquarters in the city of Raleigh, N. C., and the individual defendants above named are officers and members of said unions.

"Fourth. The individual complainants above named, in behalf of themselves and all other employees of the several printing houses above named, respectfully show unto the court:

"(1) That the labor unions above named and their officers, members and associates above named have entered into a conspiracy to drive these individual complainants from their positions as employees of the several printing houses above named, and to make it impossible for these complainants to work and live in peace in the city of Raleigh while they are engaged in their present employment.

"(2) That these individual complainants have done the defendants no wrong, and the said defendants have no grievance of any kind against these complainants. Some time in May, 1921, the unions above named demanded of the printing houses above named (which were then running as closed shops) that the number of hours for a week's work be reduced from 48 to 44. Upon the refusal of the printing companies to accede to this demand, the members of the several labor unions above named quit work and went on what is popularly known as a 'strike.' The printing companies offered in writing to submit all differences between themselves and their employees and the unions to an impartial board of arbitration, but this proposition was summarily rejected by the unions. Thereupon the printing companies gave notice that they would be compelled to run their shops with whatever labor they might be able to obtain, whether the laborers belonged to a printers' union or not, but also gave notice that the jobs of all former employees would be open to them if they returned within a given time. The defendants above named refused to return to work and have since then been making war on the printing houses and their employees.

"(8) That in pursuance of the plan, purpose, and conspiracy mentioned in subsection 1 above, the defendants have devised and are executing a systematic course of espionage, annoyance, intimidation, threats, abuse, and insults, which are intended to make, are calculated to make, and are making, the lives of these complainants and all other employees of the several printing houses above mentioned miserable, intolerable, and unendurable, and unless the defendants are compelled to desist from such conduct these complainants will be forced to give up their jobs and become objects of charity or else leave the city of Raleigh and seek employment elsewhere, and these complainants allege that they are informed and believe that it is well-nigh impossible for one who loses his job to obtain another in the present economic condition of the country.

"(4) In pursuance of said plan, purpose, and conspiracy, the said defendants (a) gather in large numbers around the places of business where complainants are employed, and when complainants finish their day's work and emerge from their places of employment, the defendants indulge in threatening gestures, insulting jeers and hisses, and in many ways annoy, disturb, humiliate and put in fear these complainants. (b) After complainants leave their several places of employment, the defendants constantly 'shadow' them. As soon as complainants leave their work, two or more of the defendants will trail them wherever they go. On the streets, in the stores, to their homes, to their work, in the day, in the night, always and everywhere they are pursued and persecuted by these defendants, sometimes with abusive language, sometimes with threats, sometimes in such numbers as to cause complainants to fear for their lives. (c) The defendants whenever and wherever they can find one or more of these complainants surround them and by words and gestures humiliate them and put them in fear. (d) The said defendants constantly and systematically call these complainants insulting names, such as rats, scabs, runts, Bowery bums, and other epithets calculated to humiliate and distress, and which do humiliate and distress, these complainants, and have a tendency to bring on breaches of the peace, and but for the forbearance of these complainants bloodshed and probable loss of life would result. (e) Said defendants are constantly and systematically threatening these complainants by saying in their presence: 'We'll get them yet!'

(193 S.E.)

"There are plenty of us to do it." "They had better not let us catch them walking home." "We will break his damn neck." "If this thing goes on, I will be in the penitentiary soon," meaning that they would perpetrate some crime against these complainants. (f) The young girls above mentioned as complainants are not free from the insult and abuse above set forth, but have been subjected by the defendants to all sorts of embarrassment and humiliation. As they pass along the streets they are jeered and hissed and scraped at and called 'kitty-cat.' In the drug stores they are sneered at and called cats. In the picture shows they are disturbed and annoyed. They are yelled at by defendants when they are a block away. They are shadowed and pursued as they pass along the streets, and unless they are afforded protection they will be compelled to leave the city of Raleigh.

"Fifth. This course of conduct has been so persistently and relentlessly pursued by the defendants that already more than 100 employees of the printing houses above named have been literally driven from their work and been forced to leave the city.

"Sixth. These individual complainants have no object or purpose in bringing this action other than to secure for themselves and all their associates the right to work and live in peace, as free American citizens, desirous of the privilege of doing an honest day's work for a fair day's pay, and to this end they invoke the protection of the law.

"Seventh. The printing houses above named complain and allege:

"(1) That they have read the complaint of their employees, and from observation and reliable information they know the same to be true.

"(2) That the defendants above named have planned and conspired to destroy the business of these printing companies for no other reason than that they decline to accede to the unreasonable and unrighteous demands of the labor unions, and are now exercising the right of every American citizen to run their business on the American plan, and to give employment to any man who applies for the same; this right being odious to and utterly denied by the defendants herein.

"(3) In furtherance of their said plan, purpose, and conspiracy to utterly destroy the business of these complainants, the defendants have gathered in large numbers in front of and near the places of business of these complainants, have used threatening words and gestures, have threatened to kill the officers and relatives and employees of these complainants, have pursued and taunted and hissed and jeered the employees of these complainants, and have endeavored to render burdensome and intolerable the life of every man and woman who dares to work in the employ of these complainants.

"(4) In further pursuance of said plan, purpose, and conspiracy to utterly destroy the business of these complainants, the said defendants have induced and bribed many of the employees of complainants to break their contracts that they have made to work for these complainants.

"(5) In further pursuance of said plan, purpose, and conspiracy to destroy the business of these complainants, the defendants have literally driven, by threats, annoyances, pursuits, and a relentless policy of 'hell-hackling' more than 100 employees of these complainants from their jobs and away from the city of Raleigh.

"The complainants have this day commenced a civil action against the defendants in the superior court of Wake county for the purpose of obtaining a perpetual injunction, and summons has been issued therein.

"Wherefore, these complainants pray the court that an injunction be issued against the labor unions above named, and against all their officers, members, aiders, abettors, and associates, compelling them to desist from indulging in any of the conduct above set forth, and to leave these complainants free to work and to carry on their business without molestation or annoyance of any kind."

The foregoing having been duly verified and used as an affidavit in the cause, his honor, E. H. Cranmer, issued a temporary restraining order, returnable before his honor, W. M. Bond, in the city of Raleigh on the 3d day of September, 1921. Upon the hearing the defendants filed several motions to dismiss and demurred upon the ground of a misjoinder of both parties and causes, and, further, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. All motions to dismiss and the demurrer were overruled, whereupon a large number of affidavits were filed by both sides; and, after a full consideration of the evidence, his honor continued the temporary restraining order until the final hearing. From this ruling, the defendants excepted and appealed.

Evans & Eason, R. N. Simms, Charles U. Harris, and Douglass & Douglass, all of Raleigh, for appellants.

William B. Umstead, of Durham, and Murray Allen and T. W. Bickett, both of Raleigh, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. Some serious and weighty questions of law are presented by the demurrer and the several motions filed in the cause; but we deem it unnecessary to pass upon them now, as we are convinced, from a perusal of the record, that the evidence adduced and offered on the hearing was not sufficient to warrant a continuance of the injunction. It will therefore be dissolved without prejudice to the rights of any of the parties.

Error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 19, 1921.)

1. Master and servant ¶286(28)—Negligence in failing to provide for signals on starting machinery for jury.

Where plaintiff was injured while repairing a dust chain in a sawmill, by the sudden starting of the machinery, evidence held to make the question of negligence of the employer in failing to provide for warning signals when starting the machinery one for the jury.

2. Master and servant ¶185(7)—Servant with duty of providing safe place to work is master's representative.

The duty of the master to provide and maintain a reasonably safe place to work is implied in the contract of hiring, and, if he commits such duty to any other servant, such servant is pro hac vice the representative of the master, who is liable to the same extent as if he had personally performed the negligent act.

3. Master and servant ¶185(23)—Failure to give warning on starting machinery imputed to master.

Where a repair man was injured by the sudden starting of the machinery, and a rule of the employer provided that machinery shut down for repairs should not be started without notice from the repair man that it was ready, such rule was equivalent to a promise that the employer would see that the machinery was not started while being repaired, the execution of which could not be shifted to another employee.

4. Master and servant ¶105(1)—Master's duty as to furnishing machinery and tools stated.

The duty of the master is not fully performed by simply doing that which is usually done, or furnishing machinery and tools known, proved, and in general use, but he must take such precautions in addition thereto as an ordinarily prudent person charged with a like duty ought to have foreseen were necessary and proper under the circumstances.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Leon Cook against the Camp Manufacturing Company and another for personal injuries. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Nonsuit set aside, and new trial granted.

E. K. Bryan, of Wilmington, and George R. Ward, of Wallace, for appellant.

Rountree & Carr, of Wilmington, and Stevens, Beasley & Stevens, of Warsaw, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. It appears that the Carolina Timber Company owned the sawmill at which the plaintiff was working at the time of the alleged injury, and the mill was being operated by its codefendant, the Camp Manufacturing Company. The plaintiff was employed to repair the machinery and chains and equipment attached to the fire room and the big engine, but he was not operating any of the machinery. Whenever any part of the machinery which it was the plaintiff's duty to repair broke down or got out of order, the plaintiff had authority to stop the engine running it in order to make the repairs, and was also required to notify the operators of such machinery that it had been stopped for repairs, and it was the duty of those operating the machinery to see that it was not thereafter started until notice from the plaintiff. This was the rule of the company under which the plaintiff was required to do his work.

The machinery in the sawmill proper was run by a big engine connected with which there were whistles to notify employees when the machinery was going to be stopped, and, after being stopped, when it would be again started. There was a smaller engine in another room which ran the dust chain in which the plaintiff was caught and injured. There were no signals attached for starting or for stopping the machinery operated by the small engine. This dust chain carried fuel to the boilers which generated steam for running both engines. The plaintiff was compelled to rely upon the observance of the company's rule for his protection while repairing the engine and machinery.

On this occasion the plaintiff on going into the room of the little engine which ran the dust chain discovered that the pilot chain which in turn drove the dust chain had been caught at some point in the dust house by an obstruction which stopped its moving and thus had broken the pilot chain. He also went to the men who operated the engine pulling the dust chain and told them he had shut down the dust engine in order to go into the dust house to make the necessary repairs to the dust chain there, and in accordance with the rules of the company he notified them not to start the engine and machinery connected with the dust chain until he had advised them that the repairs were complete and everything was ready for operation. He then went into the dust house, and, finding a lightwood knot had been caught by the dust chain which stopped it, he, with the aid of another employee, began to remove the lightwood knot. He had just succeeded in doing this, and while in the act of stepping from astride the dust chain, the operators of the dust engine suddenly without warning started up the dust engine, which caused the dust chain to catch his foot, and, winding around his foot and leg, it was only by grasping two posts he prevented himself from being ground up. His helper ran into the engine room and had the power turned off. The evidence further shows that shortly after the plaintiff had caused the engine to be shut down and notified the operators not to start the same, one of them went out of the engine room to a lumber pile, and, returning after a delay of some 20 or 30 minutes, was ordered by some one to turn on the power. He replied that the engine had been stopped for repairs to the dust chain, and asked if the plaintiff had come out of the dust house, and, being erroneously told that he had, the power was turned on, causing the injury to the plaintiff as above stated.

Upon this evidence the case should have been submitted to the jury.

[1] 1. It was the duty of the defendants, operating highly dangerous machinery, to have given the plaintiff a safe place in which to work. There was a system of signals for starting and stopping the machinery connected with the large engine, and if a similar system had been used in regard to starting and stopping the machinery connected with the dust chain by running a wire to the room in which the engine operating the dust chain was located, or a similar or a small whistle had been put on the steam pipe leading to the dust engine, notice would have been given to the plaintiff, which would have enabled him to escape this injury. The circumstances in evidence as to the manner of the injury are prima facie evidence of negligence in not equipping the smaller engine with a signal such as was placed upon the larger engine to give notice of its starting up. At least this was sufficient evidence of negligence to have been submitted to the jury.

2. In American Car Co. v. Rocha, 257 Fed. 297, 168 C. O. A. 381, it was held that, where a plaintiff was at work under a car which had been raised from its trucks and blocked up, his employer owed him a positive duty to warn him before the car was moved, which could not be delegated to another employee so as to relieve itself from liability for its negligence resulting in plaintiff's injury. This judgment by the United States Circuit Court reviewed and affirmed the judgment to that effect in the District Court. The appellant then moved in the United States Supreme Court for a certiorari, which was denied. 250 U. S. 663, 40 Sup. Ct. 11, 63 L. Ed. 1196.

In Collins v. Barner (App. D. C.) 268 Fed. 699, it was held that an employer under his duty to give the employee a safe place in which to work is negligent if the hoisting engineer in his employ starts an engine, regardless of conditions whereby an employee is injured.

In Ondis v. Tea Co., 82 N. J. Law, 511, 81 Atl. 856, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 777, it was held:

"When the place assigned the employee to work is safe for him while the machinery with which he is obliged to come in contact, but which he is not operating, is at rest, and which is liable to become of great peril to him when such machinery is put in motion, and a method of warning him of such starting by another employee who is in control of the engine has been the rule adopted by the company, the neglect of the latter to give the warning is to be imputed to the employer."

This is an elaborate opinion, concurred in by all the judges in that case, and is exactly on all fours with the case at bar.

[2] The duty of the master to provide and maintain a reasonably safe place for the servant to work is implied in the contract of hiring, and if he commits to any other employee or servant the duty of so maintaining and keeping a reasonably safe place for that purpose, then the agent to whom this duty is committed is pro hac vice the representative of the master, who is liable to the same extent as if he had personally performed the negligent act. Buchanan v. Furnace Co., 178 N. C. 646, 101 S. E. 518. To the same purport are Evans v. Lumber Co., 174 N. C. 31, 93 S. E. 430; Odom Lumber Co., 178 N. C. 134, 91 S. E. 716; Patton v. Lumber Co., 171 N. C. 837, 73 S. E. 167; Wooten v. Holleman, 171 N. C. 461, 88 S. E. 480; Midgett v. Mfg. Co., 180 N. C. 24, 103 S. E. 895.

[3] The evidence shows that, under the rules under which the plaintiff was working when the machinery was shut down for repairs, the person to whom the master had committed the running of the engine should not start up until the plaintiff notified the operator that the machinery was ready for running. This rule was a representation to the employee that the employer would see to it that the machinery was not started while the plaintiff was repairing it. It was equivalent to a promise to that effect the execution of which could not be shifted off to some other employee, and for damages sustained from a breach of the same, if so found by the jury, the employer would be liable.

[4] 3. The duty of the master is not fully performed by simply doing that which is usually done, or furnishing machinery and tools known, proved, and in general use, but he must take such precautions in addition thereto as an ordinarily prudent person charged with a like duty should have and ought to have foreseen were necessary and proper under the circumstances. Taylor v. Lumber Co., 173 N. C. 112, 91 S. E. 719; Dunn v. Lumber Co., 172 N. C. 129, 90 S. E. 18; Ainsley v. Lumber Co., 165 N. C. 122, 81 S. E. 4; Kiger v. Scales Co., 162 N. C. 133, 78 S. E. 76.

It was also earnestly debated before us whether, the sawmill being highly dangerous machinery, the owner could relieve itself from liability for the negligence of its lessee, and also whether the lease by the owner to the lessee, both companies having the same identical stockholders and officers, was such a lease as would protect the owning company from being liable for the negligence of the operating company. As the case must go back, anyway, it is not necessary to pass upon these propositions, as on another trial the evidence on these points may be more fully brought out, and possibly, if the parties are so advised, issues of fact may be submitted in regard thereto.

The judgment of nonsuit is set aside, and there will be a new trial.

STACY, J., concurs in result.

WALKER, J., stating the case for his dissent:

In dissenting from the opinion of the court and the order directing a new trial, I find it necessary to restate the testimony to some extent, so that the salient facts may appear as I find them in the record. They will be stated sufficiently to give plaintiff's case its full strength and the benefit of all material or relevant facts. (The italics below are mine.)

The plaintiff testified as follows:

"I went to the Camp Manufacturing Company, and Mr. Rose came over here and offered me a job and told me to go to Mr. Camp. Mr. Rowe had been down to see Mr. Camp. Mr. Camp wrote me, or the Camp Manufacturing Company did, and I was employed over there at the time. I then decided to accept the position with them and work for them. I had my conversation with Mr. John Camp about the employment. I was employed by Mr. Camp, of the Camp Manufacturing Company. I just had a letter from Mr. Camp, from him individually, about my employment. The letter wasn't signed individually, but it was signed Camp Manufacturing Company, and Mr. Camp dictated it. When I first went to work they paid me every two weeks, I believe. I got my pay envelope. It was marked on from the Camp Manufacturing Company. They just handed me the pay envelope. My time was kept. I never did get one with the Carolina Timber Company on it. * * * I was injured on the 13th of July, 1918. I was coming around the end of the dust house, between the dust house and the mill, and I noticed that the big chain that fed the cross-chain that went into the fire room and fed the chain that went to the boiler had stopped; in fact, the main chain that pulled the dust from the dust house; to make it short, I noticed that the pilot chain that drew the large chain was broken, and in order to fix this boiler chain I shut the little engine down, which was running. I did that because it pulls this dust chain, and the little pilot chain was broken. Before I went on to fix that little chain, I had the engine shut down. I would think it was a part of my duty to shut down the engine, if I wanted to repair the chain. It would not look advisable for it to run all the time when it was not doing anything. I had authority to shut it down to overhaul this chain; that is the little chain that pulls the big chain; and, being a practical man, I knew there was some trouble in the back end of the house, somewhere in the main big line of chain that little pilot chain dragged. And so I stepped to the boiler room door, and John Southerland and Henry Peterson were there. Henry Peterson was fireman and John Southerland was his helper. John Southerland was looking right at me, and so was Peterson. They knew positively something was wrong there, as they always knew. I told them, I says, 'John, don't start this engine up, because I am going to the rear of the dust house to see what the trouble is, and don't start it until I notify you, or come myself.' Henry Peterson was standing right there and heard it all. I meant it for both. Of course, Henry was the fireman. John was the operator of this engine, and he is the one that generally stopped and started it. John was the operator. He operated it nearly all the time. So I went to the rear end of the dust house. Henry was fireman; John was his helper."

Witness further testified that after making the necessary repairs he started to step over the chain and was caught and injured, and on cross-examination he said:

"John Southerland was helper to the fireman, who was Henry Peterson, and who looked out for the furnaces. He just pulled little chips from the head in the draw and let the dust run down and kept it pushed down with a stick. He looked after the large boilers. Wallace was the belt maker and looked after the belts. John Southerland was helper to Henry Peterson, was not hired by me, and I don't know anything about him. John Southerland was dust cutter. He went in the dust house and cut the dust; started the engine and stopped the engine whenever Henry told him he wanted dust, and whenever he thought they needed any dust. He was just Henry Peterson's helper, just dust cutter. He would go in the house and start and stop the mill engine; he had to do that to cut his dust. When John wasn't there, Henry Peterson did that. John was helping Henry Peterson. He was assisting Henry Peterson in operating the engine. My duties were to go around and see that everything was kept in running order. I was notified when there was anything wrong. It was my duty to keep things running, to keep them in good condition. I was not foreman. Mr. Rowe was foreman. John Southerland had certain things to do. Richard Wallace had certain things to do. Peterson had a certain job to do. They were all doing certain jobs in and about operating and running the mill. It was my duty to see that all these things were kept in fit, in good, order. I was not working in the same department with them unless something happened and I was called in. I was overseer of the same things they were doing, looking after the same machinery they were running."

John Southerland, witness for plaintiff, testified:

"I had been working there about two years off and on. Henry Peterson worked in the room with me. Henry Peterson's duties were—he was water carrier. My duties were to cut dust when he told me to, and every day or two when the big mill stopped I started up the dust engine and cut there; every morning piled up ashes out of the ash box, and did just anything he told me. Whatever Henry Peterson told me to do, I know Mr. Cook. I was right there when Mr. Cook got hurt. Always when he stopped the engine he would come to us and tell us not to start it up until he notified us. He came in there and told us that day, says, 'I have stopped the engine.' He had to go back to the back end of the dust house, and says, 'Don't start it until I notify you.' Pretty soon after he went in there and went to work I went out to the green run (meaning the yard where the green lumber was piled). I stayed up there, I reckon, 25 minutes; when I come back the steam was getting kind of low in the furnace, had burned up pretty well, and Mr. Henry told me to start up the engine and cut him some dust. I asked him was Mr. Cook gone, and he says, 'Yes; he has gone out,' and so I went ahead and started up the engine, and it run about four or five yards, and the belt commenced slipping on it, and would not pull, and so I prized it back and started it again, and I heard somebody holler, and I looked back in there and saw Richard Wallace run back in there, and I went there to see what the trouble was, and Mr. Cook was hanging in the chain, holding up there with his hands."

WALKER, J., dissenting from the opinion of the court:

The foregoing substantial statement of all the material testimony will suffice to present the plaintiff's case in its entirety and at its best. I am thoroughly aware of the oft-repeated rule that, on a motion to nonsuit, evidence should be construed in the most favorable light for the plaintiff (Brittain v. Westhall, 135 N. C. 492, 47 S. E. 616; In re Will of Margaret Deyton, 177 N. C. 508, 99 S. E. 424; Angel v. Spruce Co., 178 N. C. 621, 101 S. E. 384; Spry v. Kiser, 179 N. C. 417, 102 S. E. 708), and I will so deal with it. After doing so, I can find no evidence in the case upon which the plaintiff can ask for a verdict, as, in my judgment, there is nothing that shows any negligence on the part of either defendant.

The first assignment of error is the nonsuiting of plaintiff as to the Carolina Timber Company; and defendants contend there is no evidence against the Carolina Timber Company. The plaintiff offered in evidence a deed for the mill plant to the Carolina Timber Company, but did not see fit to offer any further evidence from the records or from witnesses who knew the relations between the Carolina Timber Company and the Camp Manufacturing Company.

It is clear from the testimony that Henry Peterson and John Southerland, who started up the engine, were fellow servants of the plaintiff, and their act was the proximate cause of the injury.

The recognized rule in England, which generally prevails in this country, and affirmed by this court, is declared to be that the term "fellow servant" includes all who serve the same master, work under the same control, derive authority and compensation from the same source, and are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades and departments of it. Kirk v. Railway Co., 94 N. C. 625, 55 Am. Rep. 621; Ponton v. Railroad Co., 51 N. C. 245; Rittenhouse v. Railway Co., 120 N. C. 544, 28 S. E. 922; Olmstead v. Raleigh, 130 N. C. 243, 41 S. E. 292; Hobbs v. Railroad, 107 N. C. 1, 12 S. E. 124, 9 L. R. A. 838. There is no evidence showing that the place was unsafe, that the machinery was defective, that the employees were incompetent, or that there was any other failure in the duty which the defendants owed to the plaintiff.

The statute denying the fellow-servant rule as a defence to railroad companies cannot apply in any event in this case. Defendant asserts that the effort of the plaintiff to make the Carolina Timber Company a defendant grows out of plaintiff's purpose to show the ownership of the railroad and thereby forbid to the defendant, Carolina Timber Company, protection of the fellow-servant rule, and it is argued by defendants' counsel that the fact of the plaintiff being so persistent in his effort as to the timber company shows that he is convinced that the party causing the injury was a fellow servant. It may be conceded that a lumber company operating a logging road comes under the provisions of this act if the injury occurs in the railroad operations. Hemphill v. Lumber Co., 141 N. C. 487, 54 S. E. 420; Bissell v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 123, 67 S. E. 259; Wright v. Railroad, 151 N. C. 529, 66 S. E. 588, 19 Ann. Cas. 384; Bird v. Leather Co., 148 N. C. 283, 55 S. E. 727; Liles v. Lumber Co., 142 N. C. 39, 54 S. E. 795. The Fellow Servant Act (C. S. § 3465) applies to all employees of a railroad company, whether working in the transportation or other departments. Sigman v. Railroad, 135 N. C. 181, 47 S. E. 420. But, as to lumber companies and other companies operating railroads, the act only applies when the party injured is operating in the transportation department. Twiddy v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 237, 70 S. E. 282, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 135, approved in Buchanan v. Furnace Co., 178 N. C. 647, 101 S. E. 518.

The fourth assignment is based upon the assumption that it was negligent not to have a whistle on the dust engine, when there was one on the large mill; the defendants contending that there is no evidence whatever that a whistle was necessary on the dust engine. This assignment of error is so vague that it is difficult to discuss it with reference to the testimony. The only reference to this matter appears on pages 30 and 31 of the testimony, as follows:

"When the machinery connected up with the big engine was going to be started up, after being stopped, they had a system of blowing whistles before they started it. They had no such system of signals in regard to the dust engine and machinery connected with it. * * * They could have installed a system of whistles for the dust chain machinery. Just had a smaller whistle than the one that started the big engine, run a wire across and tack onto the boiler and pull it, or have a wire to the engine, either one, just small, the same way they had of starting the big engine up stairs."

All that this means is that the sawmill proper had a whistle and blew it when the mill was about to be started, and that the dust engine, which was a subsidiary piece of machinery or equipment for the purpose of regulating the sawdust by discharging it into the furnace, did not have such a whistle. It might have been said with equal truth that there was no such whistle attached to the pump engine or any other subsidiary machinery which was operated from time to time when needed. There was no evidence that such a whistle was in customary use or was necessary as a means of safety, and before the plaintiff can establish this as negligence he would have to show that such equipment was an up-to-date equipment in general use, and that the defendant had negligently failed to put it into use here.

But the important and vital question to be considered is whether there is any evidence when it is favorably construed for the plaintiff, which justifies us in reversing the studied and deliberate ruling of the court below and ordering that the case must be submitted to the jury.

This is not a case where the owner of the mill and its machinery had appointed some one as vice principal, or his representative, to supervise the operation of the same, who was guilty of negligence causing the injury, which will be implied to his principal. The facts, while there was very much evidence in the case, are few and simple.
